Mr. Hoon: This matter has already been reported to the House but I repeat the information so that the hon. Gentleman is not in any doubt. The investigation by the US authorities was into events that took place between October and December 2003. As I have told the House already, the three British service personnel were at Abu Ghraib for a limited period after the events under investigation and did not, therefore, witness any of the events that have been the subject of so much speculation in the press—to which, from the way in which the hon. Gentleman asked his question, he is clearly trying to add. Moreover, the American investigation was already under way by the time that those three service personnel arrived at the facilities. Given that, it would be remarkable if they had seen any of those so-called techniques in use. They had no complaints and they did not report the use of such techniques to the American authorities because they did not witness their use. Nor did they report them to any UK authorities.

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk, West) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend confirm that all allegations of mistreatment by British troops of Iraqi citizens are thoroughly investigated?

Mr. Hoon: I can give that assurance. The moment that serious and substantial allegations are made, proper investigations have got under way. Those investigations continue. Should they lead to a situation in which it is judged by an independent prosecuting authority that charges should be preferred, that would obviously follow.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): After 30 June, when we will rightly pass authority for so much to the Iraqi council, will the Abu Ghraib detention centre and other detention centres be staffed by Iraqis?

Mr. Hoon: I have indicated to the House that those are matters that are still under discussion, but in principle the answer is yes. Authority will pass to the Iraqis to be increasingly responsible for their own affairs and it is obviously important that that is seen to be the case on the ground. However, I emphasise to the House that matters are still subject to negotiation.

Dr. Nick Palmer (Broxtowe) (Lab): I am sure that my right hon. Friend will agree that it is essential that we are seen to be behaving correctly in Abu Ghraib and elsewhere. In his discussions with our coalition partners, will he ask them to ensure that we are aware of any future allegations of systematic misconduct that may be laid against any member of the coalition?

Mr. Hoon: Certainly it is important that there is a full and frank exchange of information when such issues arise and I take note of my hon. Friend's suggestion.

7. Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) (Con): What arrangements have been made for counselling troops in units that have suffered casualties in Iraq. [173155]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): Military personnel deployed to Iraq receive pre-deployment and post-deployment briefing on mental health issues. Trained mental health professionals have also been deployed and are available to military personnel in theatre. However, psychiatric debriefing is not routinely offered to individuals or units who have been exposed to combat.

Mr. Steen: Surely when young servicemen lose colleagues in the theatre of war, they should not so much be offered as receive, from non-military personnel, guidance, help and support. They should be able to work through their anger and distress and that should not be recorded as a weakness by military personnel.

Mr. Ingram: There are extensive arrangements in place to deal with all those issues. Procedures were put in place after the last Gulf war that were found to have no real clinical advantage and as a result they were not continued. It is about ensuring that, if a request for help is made, it is made available. It is also about monitoring by senior officers and others in the chain of command of what is happening to those under their command. The way in which we handle such situations is very sensitive and they are taken seriously, but no significant complaints—or any complaints—have been made to date that would support the way in which the hon. Gentleman has raised that question.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): May I ask my right hon. Friend about the recording of casualties in Iraq? Does he feel that there is a moral, if not necessarily strictly legal, obligation on the occupying forces to record civilian deaths as well as military deaths; and does he feel that the failure to record Iraqi civilian deaths has an adverse impact on Iraqi people's perception of the occupying forces?

Mr. Ingram: The question was about the counselling of our troops. I do not know whether my hon. Friend is suggesting that their being asked to do certain things, then doing them, causes them additional stress.

On the counting of civilian deaths, Iraq is a most difficult environment in which to operate. Where face-to-face conflict has taken place, there may be no indication that a civilian casualty or death has occurred, but a body is then removed from the scene and buried almost immediately. Some people are saying that we should take those bodies out of the ground and examine them for medical and other evidence. That is a completely nonsensical approach.

This is a very difficult situation and we do our best to ensure that proper counting takes place. Indeed, we are currently trawling all our records to ensure that we have not missed any matters that may have been reported. We are trying very seriously to deal with this, but I hope that my hon. Friend recognises just how difficult the environment is.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): On behalf of my right hon. and hon. Friends, I associate myself with the Secretary of State's remarks about this morning's appalling outrage in Iraq.

The Minister knows that in addition to the casualties in Iraq from the initial war-fighting phase and the ongoing peacekeeping support operation, several members of the British forces have tragically been killed in accidents. What facilities for counselling are available to their families? Given that our forces are effectively on duty in Iraq for 24 hours a day, does he agree that the partners of any British troops killed in Iraq should be entitled to a full war pension?

Mr. Ingram: We have identified some shortfalls in the way in which the counselling of families is approached. That is why the point-of-contact approach of those who report injuries or fatalities to families has been looked at again to see whether there is a more appropriate way of dealing with such situations and to ensure that all personnel who have to carry out an undoubtedly very difficult task are appropriately trained and understand the sensitivity of the issue. It is a learning process, and we have taken on board some valuable lessons in recent months and years. That process can never rest, because we are likely in future to turn up new problems that we must revisit. We have to try to get it right at all times and to understand the sensitivities involved.

As regards pensions, I will write to the hon. Gentleman.

8. Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): If he will make a statement on his assessment of the reports by (a) the International Committee of the Red Cross and (b) Amnesty International on the role of British troops in operating prisons in southern Iraq. [173156]

11. Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): If he will make it his policy to ensure that all reports received from Amnesty International and the International Committee of the Red Cross concerning the behaviour of British forces are drawn immediately to the attention of Ministers. [173159]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The Ministry of Defence receives millions of individual items of correspondence each year. Clearly, it would be impractical for Ministers to see it all, and we must therefore rely on officials' judgment to select those items that require ministerial attention. Some correspondence and reports from organisations such as those mentioned in both questions will fall into this category; others can be dealt with by officials. However, I would normally expect Ministers to see the kinds of reports that were mentioned.

I have seen two reports from the International Committee of the Red Cross that deal with the role of British troops in operating detention facilities in southern Iraq. One raises two serious issues affecting UK armed forces that had been dealt with well before the report was received; the other is a more recent working paper.

I am not aware of any Amnesty International reports that deal specifically with the way in which we operate our detention facilities, but it has reported allegations of abuse in UK custody that have been investigated and replied to. Two recent reports from Amnesty make serious allegations about the conduct of UK personnel more generally, covering the period since British troops went into Iraq. Those are being investigated and will be dealt with in the same way.

Mr. Barnes: The Secretary of State's reply is somewhat different from the one given by the Minister of State during the debate on Thursday, which, as regards Amnesty International, was merely centred in a one-page letter sent about seven months ago about one incident. Should not reports from Amnesty International be seriously considered by the House? Traditionally, Amnesty International has been held in the highest regard by the labour movement, so what it has to say should be taken on board and examined.

Mr. Hoon: I emphasise that we have received a number of reports, letters and a dossier from Amnesty International—some from the UK section and at least one letter from the Italian section. Each was replied to, once appropriate investigations were completed; for example, the most recent letter we received from Amnesty prompted us to conduct yet a further investigation of all our files relating to Iraq to establish whether Amnesty had raised any new matters in its correspondence. One of the problems that we have faced with that particular organisation is that it has recycled many previous cases in new items of correspondence. Nevertheless, we treat each of those matters very seriously and give each the appropriate investigation.

Mr. Luff: The Secretary of State's attitude to this question today is rather different from that of his Minister of State last Thursday. In the words of the popular song, "Sorry may be the hardest word", but would not the Minister have been well advised to use that word last Thursday rather than seeking to twist the word "report" away from any recognisable dictionary definition of it? Would not the Secretary of State, too, be well advised to say sorry to our troops in Iraq for his failure to put proper procedures in place to ensure that he and his Minister of State were fully aware of accusations, ill founded or well founded, made against those troops by reputable international organisations?

Mr. Hoon: I do not accept that for a moment. I am sure that if the hon. Gentleman understood more about the way Departments operate he would thoroughly understand that Ministers have investigated those matters, in detail and at length, whenever allegations have been made at an appropriate stage.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Could the Secretary of State help me? I am very, very confused as to what happens to reports from the International Committee of the Red Cross. The reports are obviously serious and important and come from an international organisation of enormous repute, so can he tell us what has happened to those officials who apparently decided either that Sir Jeremy Greenstock did not need to see the reports or that they were to be sent to joint staff headquarters, the Foreign Office basement, or wherever? What procedures have been put in place to ensure that in future Ministers—Ministers—see such reports when they are produced?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend asks a fair question about the situation. We ask officials to exercise their judgment. When officials in the Ministry of Defence saw the report they judged, in the light of the two serious allegations concerning UK soldiers, that those matters were well in hand; indeed, investigations had begun about five months before. Nevertheless, as I made clear in the answer that I have just given the House, it is important that Ministers see such reports and appropriate action has been taken to ensure that that happens in the future.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): It is surely unacceptable for the Secretary of State to try to use his officials as a bombproof shelter for him and his fellow Ministers. Is it not a fact that anybody with any appreciation of the situation in Iraq must know that the worst thing for coalition aims is that abuses of this sort rally the population behind the insurgents? It should have been blindingly obvious that those reports should have been at the top of the Secretary of State's agenda; and his failure, and that of his colleagues, to treat them with due gravity is partly responsible for the fact that, having won a military campaign, we are now losing the political settlement afterwards.

Mr. Hoon: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman discuss with those of his Front-Bench colleagues who have some experience of government what happens when officials assess reports. In this case, I have taken appropriate responsibility. I am not—as the hon. Gentleman is—seeking to blame officials. Officials looked at the report and made their judgment. I accept that they must exercise their judgment and that Ministers are responsible for their judgment. That is what happened in this case, and no matter the amount of effort by the Opposition to turn this into some sort of ministerial responsibility as far as the actual decision is concerned, it simply will not wash. The hon. Gentleman should talk to those who have been in government. We can all recall occasions on which Conservative Members have had to come to the House and apologise for their failures in government, so the hon. Gentleman really ought to know better.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): Does the Secretary of State agree that the work of the Red Cross and Amnesty International in highlighting abuses across the world is held in very high regard on both sides of the House and that there is an urgent need to investigate these allegations? However, does he also agree that they remain allegations and that, until they are proven otherwise, it is of great disservice to the troops who are still serving in Iraq and to their families back home to pretend otherwise?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I thank him for that note of common sense in this debate, a note of common sense that the Opposition have sadly been incapable of demonstrating on this issue, as they are determined to score very poor political points. It is important that the people against whom allegations are made be given the opportunity of responding to those allegations and that thorough investigations be conducted. That is precisely what the Government set out.

Persian Gulf (Deployments)

10. Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): How many British armed forces personnel are deployed to the Gulf region. [173158]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): There are some 10,000 British armed forces personnel deployed to the Gulf region.

Patrick Mercer: I am grateful to the Minister for that answer, but may I refer him to the reply that the Secretary of State gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson)? Despite what the Government say, a number of units have received unofficial warning orders to go to the Gulf as reinforcements. One of those units is that fine regiment, the Black Watch, which neither I nor any of my colleagues would dream of talking down. The fact remains that colleagues and friends of mine in that regiment tell me that, because of Government indecision, they are having to train almost in secret for these operations and they are making very unfavourable comparisons with precisely the same level of Government dithering that went on before the war started last year. Will the Minister now come clean and give our soldiers the warning orders that they require so that they can be launched properly prepared and properly trained into dangerous circumstances?

Mr. Ingram: I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman, given his experience of the Army—if certainly not of government. If he is alleging that we do not properly train our service personnel and that we put untrained personnel in harm's way, he has forgotten everything that he knew when he was in the armed forces. I do not know whom he has spoken to who says that that is now our approach. We will always train our personnel to the best of our ability and their abilities. Once any decision is taken to deploy our troops, the best and most available troops will be ready and trained to take on whatever tasks are available. We saw that to great effect in the recent deployment to Kosovo.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The House would agree that the breathtaking incompetence verging on treachery that was displayed by certain sacked newspaper editors has imperilled large numbers of British troops not only in the Queen's Lancashire Regiment but elsewhere and has, therefore, made greater deployments to southern Iraq more likely. Specifically, will the Minister comment on the suggestions that, as Spanish troops are withdrawn, the sphere of responsibility of British forces will be widened to include Najaf province and Najaf city? What would the implications of that be?

Mr. Ingram: We have made it clear all along that an issue has to be dealt with because of the withdrawal of Spanish forces. That area is now covered by US forces, and we have said that how we deal with the issue in the longer term must be the subject of discussions within the coalition. I am sure that my hon. Friend understands the reasons for that. If and when we announce any change to our posture, the House will be duly notified, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said.

Iraq

12. Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): What (a) special and (b) specific training has been given to non-Royal Military Police soldiers who are being employed as guards in detention camps in Iraq. [173160]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): Specialist handling of detainees by non-Royal Military Police soldiers is provided by members of the Adjutant-General's Corps (Military Provost Staff)—the AGC (MPS)—who receive training relevant to their role running the military corrective training centre in Colchester. The expertise of the AGC (MPS) is in the field of custodial care.

The United Kingdom is bound by military law to include the law of armed conflict in military training programmes, which includes the handling and treatment of prisoners of war. All personnel are trained to observe the values and standards expected of the British Army, which includes the concepts of decency and respect for others. During pre-deployment training all units are briefed on procedures for dealing with prisoners of war and, since October 2003, each combat unit is mandated to have eight to 10 senior non-commissioned officers trained in the handling of prisoners of war.

Mr. Robathan: Up to a point, that is a good answer, but can I probe a little further? As I understand it, a large number of people employed as prison guards in the detention camps, who are guarding not prisoners of war but civilian detainees, are not from the Adjutant-General's Corps. For how long is the ordinary infantry soldier, who did not join to be a prison guard, trained? How many ordinary infantry soldiers are acting as prison guards? For how long are they expected to act as prison guards?

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman asks some impossible questions—I mean, how long is a piece of string? On the basis of what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said about the new provisions post-30 June, we will, of course, alter some of the characteristics on which his questions are based.

On the extent of the training, the hon. Gentleman will know from his experience that the training process runs right through from phase 1 to when people may be required to undertake that custodial role. They are made aware of the culture into which they are going and the nature of the approach that they have to adopt towards anyone who is in their custody, which is to accord them the highest respect, both in human rights terms and in other ways.

Our detention centre has an extensive programme that takes account of all that. It is why the ICRC's second report, which has been mentioned, said after that inspection that the conditions are fairly good. We cannot go further than that because we do not discuss the detail of ICRC reports, but I am confident that we are putting in a lot of effort. That is why we have put an additional resource in the hands of combat units that may arrest people by giving each combat unit senior non-commissioned officers who have specialist knowledge and skills.

Civil Service Relocation

13. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What (a) civil service and (b) military responsibilities he plans to relocate from London and the south-east to the northern regions of England. [173161]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The Ministry of Defence continually examines ways of improving military capability and value for money for the taxpayer, including the size and location of our estate. We are now undertaking further examination of where estate rationalisation may be possible, and we will, of course, take account of the Lyons Review.

Hugh Bayley: Will my right hon. Friend pay tribute to the important role performed by the Defence Vetting Agency? Does he recall how efficiently the agency created its new headquarters at Imphal barracks in York and the assistance it got from the York Inward Investment Board, or york-england.com as it now calls itself? Will the MOD continue to work with the York Inward Investment Board on the possibility of bringing more jobs to Yorkshire?

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend is right. The Defence Vetting Agency is a good example of the transfer of staff to the regions, in this case York. He refers to york-england.com, which is very active in ensuring that there is a collective view on how the opportunities that Yorkshire and the northern region for which it has responsibility can best be served. There was a meeting between MOD personnel and york-england.com at a seminar on 5 May, and relocation opportunities were discussed in the light of the Lyons report. Those ongoing contacts will be maintained.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): To assist the Minister with that task, should he not be aware of the number of military personnel and civilian personnel at the four existing defence establishments in the Vale of York? Will he therefore reconsider his reply to me and give me those figures at the first available opportunity?

Mr. Ingram: I do not have the figures to hand. There is a significant military presence, with a good number of military bases, within York and the immediate surrounding area. I think there are about 14,000 military personnel in and around the York area. I shall write to the hon. Lady with the precise figures.

Gibraltar

15. Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): What role the armed forces will play in the 300th anniversary celebrations in Gibraltar. [173163]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): As I was able to set out on my recent visit to Gibraltar, the armed forces are playing a full part in commemorating Gibraltar's tercentenary this year. Bands of the Royal Marines, the Royal Engineers and the Royal Air Force, the Royal Gibraltar Regiment and other military units from the United Kingdom, Royal Navy ships and the Royal Fleet Auxiliary are taking part in a total of more than 20 events throughout the year.

Mr. Hoyle: Will my right hon. Friend restate his commitment to Gibraltar and ensure that it remains an overseas territory?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend campaigns tirelessly on behalf of the people of Gibraltar and I commend him for his efforts. I am delighted, not least in this tercentenary year, to commit myself and the Ministry of Defence, on behalf of the Government, to continuing good relations with the people of Gibraltar.

Wind Farms

16. Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): What his policy is on the positioning of wind farms near military ranges. [173164]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The Ministry of Defence fully supports Government policy and targets for renewable energy. We do not oppose wind farm developments unless the safety of MOD personnel or the public, UK defence systems or our operational capability appear to be adversely affected. That applies to both onshore and offshore developments.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: Is the Minister aware that there is a helicopter range just off the coast of Somerset, and that West Somerset district council is about to receive an application for 12 wind turbines, 300 ft high and 128 ft across, just down the coast from the range? Has the Minister not thought what damage could be done, first to the helicopters and secondly to the wind farm, should things go wrong?

Mr. Ingram: I have. As I made clear in my answer, we have to ensure that there is compatibility between these twin objectives. I am advised that we have received applications for some 15 wind farm developments in Somerset; all the 11 objections raised were connected with radar interference, and none related to interference with range activities. It is not only the Ministry of Defence that is concerned about radar interference; civilian operations can also be affected by wind farms. We have to weigh our clear objective on renewable energy against the way in which wind farms can affect military or civilian overflights.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): In that case, does my right hon. Friend recognise that it would be helpful if the Government were involved in the research on the effect on radar of wind farms at sea? It is clear that sufficient work has not yet gone into ensuring that we are well aware of the impacts of those structures, both on shipping and on radar installations.

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend is very experienced in these matters, and I bow to her greater immediate knowledge. She may have seen some research that I have not seen. All of us in the Government must make sure that we have a guaranteed approach that takes into account all the points of scientific and practical interest which must be resolved. I am sure that those who have direct responsibility for carrying out the risk research will hear what my hon. Friend says, and I know that she will continue to pursue Government action on the matter.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): The Government have just announced a major increase in the deployment at RAF Scampton. Star Energy has made an application to site half a dozen wind turbines, each as tall as Lincoln cathedral, within half a dozen miles of that major RAF base. Will the Minister explain his strategy? Will his officials take an interest in the matter? Is there a minimum distance requirement connected with radar or operational safety with which he can acquaint the House? This is obviously a matter of the utmost importance.

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman is right: it is a matter of the utmost importance that when we are relocating activity, in this case in the RAF, we take account of the region into which it is being moved. New applications for wind farms are covered by the response that I gave to the previous questions: we need to make sure that there is compatibility between the twin, or in some cases multiple, objectives that the Government are trying to deliver. We therefore take an interest in these matters. A decision has been made about RAF Scampton and is in the process of being finalised, and any change to the environment is something in which we would take a close interest.

NATO

17. Mr. John MacDougall (Central Fife) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the issues that will be discussed at the Istanbul NATO summit in June. [173165]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The summit at Istanbul will address NATO's current operations. It will also offer the opportunity to strengthen NATO's partnerships with other countries and continue the drive to transform the alliance and its capabilities. In addition to the Heads of State and Government meeting, Defence Ministers will meet to review progress and direct the further reform of NATO.

Mr. MacDougall: Does my right hon. Friend recognise that the summit is taking place at a vital time for both NATO and the wider world—a time when NATO and UK forces are involved in Afghanistan and the Balkans? Will he comment on NATO's role and value in the international environment?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for asking that question and making important points about the future commitment of NATO. It is vital that we sustain and support its existing responsibilities, while recognising that NATO itself must reform to deal with the new types of threat that we face around the world. I am pleased that the UK has been leading the way in that process. Istanbul is a major way stage in that reform.

[11TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Iraq

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.31 pm

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife): I beg to move,

That this House notes with concern the deteriorating security situation in Iraq and the Middle East and the impact on public opinion in Iraq of the reports of mistreatment of Iraqi citizens and detainees; believes that progress in Iraq is only possible if the role of the United Nations is expanded and enhanced and the transfer of sovereignty to the Iraqis on 30th June is real and visible; recalls that on 18th March 2003 when this House endorsed military action against Saddam Hussein it did so on an understanding that progress on the road map for a peace settlement between Israel and the Palestinians would be a priority for Her Majesty's Government; expresses its disappointment that recent events have made the achievement of a negotiated two state solution more difficult and less likely; recognises the bravery and professionalism of British armed forces serving in Iraq in difficult and dangerous circumstances; calls upon Her Majesty's Government not to commit any further troops unless requested by United Kingdom commanders in Iraq for the purposes of securing the safety of British forces and the fulfilling of Britain's legal obligations under international law towards the inhabitants of Iraq; and further declares that any such troops should remain under United Kingdom operational command and within the area currently under United Kingdom control.

It is worth recalling that we went to war against Iraq on a threat and a promise. The threat was that of weapons of mass destruction, and the promise that of progress in the middle east peace process. But neither threat nor promise has been fulfilled. No weapons of mass destruction have been found, and none appears likely to be found now. The Iraq survey group has disappeared from view and its head has resigned. The road map has been rolled up. Unilateral action by Mr. Sharon has been approved and a negotiated settlement in the middle east seems further away than ever.

There is more. The coalition of which the United Kingdom is a member is shamed and embarrassed by the treatment of detainees while in the custody of the United States, and we may yet suffer domestic shame and embarrassment when current inquiries are completed. Here in the United Kingdom, there is no acceptable explanation of why Ministers did not see communications from the Red Cross and Amnesty International. The handover date of 30 June now depends on the efforts of Lakhdar Brahimi and the United Nations—the same United Nations that was sidestepped by the coalition in spring 2003. There is some irony there, which will, no doubt, not be lost in Manhattan.

Violence in Iraq is on the increase, as British troops found at the weekend when they had to bayonet their way to safety. The tragic death this morning of the head of the Iraq governing council is yet another demonstrable success for terrorism. In the minds of many Iraqis, the army of liberation is delivering much less than it promised. At Falluja, the United States has had to acknowledge the failure of the doctrine of decisive force. Thousands of Iraqis have died since March 2003, but we do not even afford them the dignity of keeping an accurate estimate of their numbers.

It is indeed a brave new world, and it is hard not to be angry—angry for Britain and its reputation; angry for the brave young men and women who are serving in difficult and dangerous conditions in Iraq; angry, too, for a House of Commons that was persuaded to support military action on a flawed prospectus and, as we now know, with no clear strategy for the aftermath of conflict.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): We were told last week—the reports were, no doubt, inspired by the Government—that extra troops were to be deployed to Iraq, perhaps in Najaf. However, there were reports this weekend that, on the contrary, we were no longer in for the long haul and that we were talking about withdrawing troops before 2005–06. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that the Government owe the House an explanation of their strategy and of what we are planning to do with a country for which we have taken responsibility?

Sir Menzies Campbell: There is no way to answer the hon. Gentleman's question other than in the affirmative. I shall set out some conditions that are appropriate in the event that additional troops are thought necessary, but he has put his finger on something that I hope the Secretary of State will explain, not just to the House but to people outside.

It is hard not to be angry that, in the name of a coalition of which the United Kingdom is a member, detainees have been subject to degrading and inhumane treatment, for which no one takes political responsibility. Asking Private Lynddie England to take all the blame seems a little unfair.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree with the proposition that, if the United States Government deny people in Guantanamo bay their civil and legal rights, it is perhaps not surprising that junior soldiers feel the same way, and that that is a severe indictment of that Administration?

Sir Menzies Campbell: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has made that point on previous occasions in the House and I have supported him on some of those occasions. There are still British citizens in Guantanomo bay and they are entitled to due process and a trial according to the accepted principles of law. If no such trial is available to them, they should be returned to the United Kingdom so that we can consider whether or not there are adequate grounds for prosecution.

I am angry about these matters, not because I was deceived, but because my scepticism and that of many others is increasingly justified. I am angry because our relationship with the United States, put into sharp focus in recent times, should be a partnership of influence, and we should not be so subordinate that we often appear to be subservient. What sort of relationship is it if we are actively discouraged from public criticism of the US Administration and their ultimate responsibility for the humiliation or, as one writer put it, debauchery towards the Iraqis in their custody? In the House, we have to rely on the feline ambiguities of the Leader of the House.

Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central) (Lab): While concurring with the sentiments of the right hon. and learned Gentleman about Guantanamo bay and the mistreatment of detainees there and in Iraq, does he not agree that all decent people in the House and beyond hope and pray for peace and democracy in Iraq? Is it not distasteful that his party is putting success or failure in Iraq at the top of its Euro-election campaign agenda, so that real failures such as the assassination this morning or imaginary failures such as the forgeries in the Daily Mirror are desirable to fuel electoral success? Is that not shameful opportunism when there is a need for genuine debate?

Sir Menzies Campbell: I have not met a single elector who objects to the issue of Iraq being raised in relation to the European elections. In the course of the campaign, I have met many people who wish to raise the question of Iraq and Britain's role. They wish to express their anxiety about the nature of present events and the long-term consequences for the United Kingdom.

What sort of relationship allows Members of Congress more licence to criticise the Bush Administration than it does the British Government? The harsh, unpalatable truth for Washington is that only the United Nations can save us all. All the coalition eggs are well and truly in the UN basket. If Brahimi fails, what is the alternative strategy? I do not have an answer to that question, but those who took military action against Iraq ought to have one, because it is by no means certain that the efforts of Lakhdar Brahimi will be successful.

Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood) (Lab): Ambassador Brahimi has been asked to appoint an interim Government who are truly representative of the Iraqi people, and we all hope that he succeeds. There is more hope if he appoints that Government rather than the coalition, but that does not address the problem of troop withdrawal. We have not said that if the interim Government ask us to withdraw our troops we will do so; we have said that we hope that that would come about. Mr. Brahimi had the same authority in Afghanistan, but he had no authority over the US troops, and the situation in Afghanistan is deteriorating. His authority to appoint an interim Administration does not necessarily mean that we will get an exit strategy for our troops, but that has not been made clear.

Sir Menzies Campbell: My view is that it would be difficult for a provisional Government, appointed by Lakhdar Brahimi, to exercise the sort of responsibility that the right hon. Lady suggests, but I am in absolutely no doubt whatsoever that, when we get to the stage of a democratically elected Government of the Iraqi people, that institution must have total responsibility for the conduct of Iraq. Indeed, at that point, I would say that the United Kingdom and others should begin a phased withdrawal of their troops. The responsibility for Iraq, given to the Iraqi people, must be whole and complete.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby) (Lab): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Menzies Campbell: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I will continue.

In New York, we should be arguing for a Security Council resolution that is maximalist, not minimalist—arguing along with France and Russia for the maximum transfer of authority to the provisional Government—but the transfer of sovereignty to the Iraqi people must be about substance, not simply ceremony. The raising of flags and patriotic music will be no adequate substitute for real authority.

The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short) mentioned the exit strategy. Let me suggest principles that should most certainly apply. First, all our effort should be directed to supporting the United Nations in establishing a provisional Government, to whom as many functions as possible should be transferred. Secondly, once a provisional Government have been established, all our efforts should be directed to supporting the United Nations in the preparations for the elections. Thirdly, as soon as an Iraqi Government have been democratically elected, under United Nations supervision, United Kingdom troops should begin a phased withdrawal.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): The right hon. and learned Gentleman will be aware no doubt that the Iraq governing council, no less, has accused the United Nations of massive institutional fraud over the oil-for-food programme—a fraud that is estimated to be about $64 billion. Bearing it in mind that that fraud has directly enriched Saddam Hussein and his supporters, undoubtedly involves members of the Security Council and, indeed, the UN itself and has probably provided money to fund the very insurgency that our troops are now fighting, does he believe that the UN is an entirely suitable body to carry out that task?

Sir Menzies Campbell: I ask the hon. Gentleman to suggest an alternative. I do not know that there is any queueing up, and I do not know that there is any alternative strategy on offer either. He is quite right to point to the disgrace of the fraud in relation to the oil-for-food programme. Perhaps he should consider whether he is entitled to say that members of the Security Council may have been involved—that is a rather sweeping statement—but he is certainly right to highlight the fraud. I for one am most certainly disappointed that the extent of the fraud was so considerable and that moneys may well have been diverted in the directions to which he has referred, but if he has an alternative to Lakhdar Brahimi, let us hear it, because it is only in him, in the United Nations and in the Secretary-General of the United Nations that any prospect rests of keeping the date of 30 June, chosen not for its intrinsic merit, but rather for its importance as a signpost in the American domestic political campaign. That date can be kept only if the United Nations ensures that it is kept.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): The one thing that puzzles me about the line of argument that the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his fellow Liberal Democrats advance is that the United Nations—while it may or may not have some moral authority, depending on one's point of view—has no resources other than those provided by its membership. There is no army or police force belonging to the United Nations. Where are the army and the police force that he wants and needs to enhance the security situation in Iraq, outside the current coalition? There are no volunteers who will simply put on blue berets and come and do the job that he wants them to do.

Sir Menzies Campbell: I do not think anyone has suggested a blue beret force in the circumstances of Iraq.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): Who is going to do it?

Sir Menzies Campbell: Exactly. As the hon. Gentleman says, who is going to do it? It is not possible to have a blue beret force, but we could have had a Security Council resolution in the same terms as that which was adopted for the first Gulf war, which provided that all necessary means should be used for the expulsion of Iraq from Kuwait, which accepted that the United States would be in command, but which insisted that that force had to report back and be subject to the authority of the Security Council. That most certainly would have been a much more politically attractive solution than the one that was arrived at, of a self-generating coalition going in the circumstances that we now know and side-stepping the United Nations.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that there are a number of countries with distinguished United Nations military service that have said that they would be happy to commit troops in a circumstance that was fully authorised by the United Nations—countries such as Pakistan, Indonesia and Malaysia, which have a particular credibility in the Muslim world? Would that not be an attractive proposition, to try and get the maximalist United Nations mandate that is propounding, and help us move with international credibility to a new phase of peacekeeping?

Sir Menzies Campbell: There is no doubt that if such countries were to become part of a coalition authority, they would require a maximalist United Nations resolution, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not suggesting that there is the possibility between now and 30 June, for example, of putting together a UN force with blue berets. In my judgment that is not practical. That is why I have referred not only on this occasion but on others to the advantage of an arrangement similar to that used in the first Gulf war.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): I am touched by the right hon. and learned Gentleman's faith in United Nations resolutions. How would he answer constituents of mine, refugees from Iraq, who said that if one mistake was made, it was in the first Gulf war, when we stopped at the border in compliance with the UN resolution?

Sir Menzies Campbell: If I may say so, I do not think that the hon. Lady was in the House at that time. She would not have found much support for that view. She would not have found much support for that view from President Bush's father or from Mr. John Major, who was the Prime Minister at the time. The consequence of doing what she suggests is that the coalition that had been created for the expulsion of Iraq from Kuwait would have broken up. In addition, the Iraqi forces at that time were much more effective than those we found when the military action took place last year and there would have been the risk of very substantial casualties. The arguments against going to Baghdad in 1991 were overwhelming at the time, and in my judgment have not been diminished in any way since.

Mr. Wareing: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree that if the occupation continues after 30 June, and all that the Iraqi people are being offered is another appointed Government—appointed by whoever—that will be viewed by the Iraqi resistance in rather the same way as the Vichy regime was viewed by the French resistance in wartime France?

Sir Menzies Campbell: But it is not practical to have elections between now and 30 June. That is the date of the agreed handover to a provisional Government. [Interruption.] It might meet the hon. Gentleman's point if there were a sufficient and detailed commitment to—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Allow the right hon. and learned Gentleman a hearing. It is unfair to him when there are so many conversations going on.

Sir Menzies Campbell: What would meet the hon. Gentleman's point would be if it was clear that the move towards elections was serious and was being undertaken; that there was voter registration and that the necessary institutions were being established. But I do not think that it is possible to achieve what he would like to achieve in the time available.

As soon as an Iraqi Government have been democratically elected, UK troops should begin a phased withdrawal. But in the meantime, I am firmly of the view that we should commit no further forces to Iraq unless at the request of British commanders on the ground; unless for the purpose of securing the safety of existing British forces in Iraq; unless for the purpose of fulfilling legal obligations incumbent upon us under international law, including, if necessary, a fresh resolution from the Security Council; unless any such troops remain under United Kingdom operational command; and unless any such troops are deployed within the area currently under United Kingdom control.

There should be no question of British forces extending their role and responsibility in Iraq. There should be no question of British forces providing a substitute for any forces that may have been withdrawn by other coalition members. We have made more than an adequate contribution. I suspect that many hon. Members think so; I am certain the whole country thinks so.

Operational command of such troops should remain with United Kingdom commanders. General Sir Michael Jackson, with characteristic frankness, a fortnight ago described differences in doctrine between ourselves and the United States and we have seen illustrations of those differences. We should not put our forces into a position in which they may have to choose between following an order or following their training and their instincts.

It is now commonplace for some to argue for immediate withdrawal. To those I say this: consider the consequences of that. Inevitably, terrorism and violence would flourish and instability could easily spread throughout the region. But more significantly, the United Nations' effort, which is the only political track presently available, would be fatally undermined.

To be against immediate withdrawal is not to be in favour of an open-ended commitment. The Iraqi people must be given the responsibility for themselves and their government as soon as possible. I commend the motion to the House.

3.52 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"welcomes the work being done by the UK and its Coalition partners to establish stability and security in Iraq; regards any mistreatment of Iraqis by Coalition forces to be unacceptable; recognises the bravery and professionalism of British forces in Iraq in assisting the Iraqi people in rebuilding Iraq; applauds the work of the UN Secretary-General's special adviser, Lakhdar Brahimi, for his contribution to helping establish a sovereign Iraqi Interim Government which will assume power by 30th June; and supports the Government in its efforts to secure a new Security Council resolution and deliver the wishes of the Iraqi people for a sovereign, stable and democratic Iraq."

On behalf of the Government, I should like to repeat our regret following the death this morning of Izzedine Saleem, president of the Iraq governing council. Our thoughts are with him and with his family at this terrible time, to whom we extend our condolences.

Izz al-Din Salim was a tireless advocate for Iraq and for its people. He was exiled from his home by Saddam Hussein and, until last year, lived in London, where he worked as a writer and activist in the service of his people. When the former regime fell, he returned to Iraq as head of the Islamic Dawa party in Basra, where he earned the respect of local people and the coalition.

Izz al-Din Salim's death is an enormous loss to Iraq. It is too early to say whether this morning's attack was specifically targeted at him. In any event, it is a further tragic demonstration of the callousness of the minority who seek to challenge the rule of law and undermine the establishment of a democratic, peaceful Iraq. It demonstrates why we are determined to deal with those who perpetrate these criminal acts of terrorism. It demonstrates that these attacks are against the Iraqi people themselves, just as much as against coalition forces. We are working with the Iraqi people, and together we will succeed.

Izzedine Saleem's death also demonstrates why the coming months are critical for the future of Iraq.

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley) (Lab): I join my right hon. Friend in offering my condolences to the family of Mr. Salim. I spent half an hour talking to Mr. Salim last Thursday. He was a gentle scholar who had contributed a lot to the governing council and to the future of a democratic Iraq. It was said earlier that his death was a triumph for terrorism, but it is the complete opposite. It will be a triumph for terrorism unless we stay the course, and Mr. Salim and all the members of the governing council, and all those who are fighting for the future of a democratic Iraq, would, I think, feel exactly the same. We must stay the course.

Mr. Hoon: Like me, my hon. Friend has met a number of members of the governing council, which is united in its determination to resist terrorism and criminal acts. I emphasise that the attack was against the Iraqi people, whom we cannot afford to let down, and I entirely support my hon. Friend's point.

We are attempting to transfer authority, after decades of tyranny, to an elected, representative Government in Iraq. I specifically refer to the transfer of authority, rather than simply sovereignty, because sovereignty resides with the people of Iraq and cannot be taken from them, although their rights have frequently been usurped over the years.

On 30 June, authority in Iraq will pass to the Iraqi interim Government; the extent of the authority that we will be able to hand to them has been subject to recent debate. On 1 July, the coalition provisional authority and the Iraqi governing council will dissolve. The interim Government will, however, initially limit themselves, by confining their work to the effective day-to-day administration of Iraq's affairs, which is only right. Decisions about Iraq's longer-term future should be left to the elected transitional Government—as every Iraqi to whom I have spoken agrees. That is why we are moving forward with that strategy, and the Iraqi people should have the opportunity to choose those who will decide their future.

Donald Anderson (Swansea, East) (Lab): To what extent will the interim Government have strategic control of the new multinational force after the transfer of sovereignty?

Mr. Hoon: I hope that my right hon. Friend will accept that I will deal with the precise security arrangements in a moment. Obviously, some discussions about the precise level of control remain, but I assure him that we are alive to the issue. We will try to find a sensible solution that meets the needs of coalition forces and secures their safety, but recognises that authority has properly passed to the Iraqis.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): I have received several e-mails from constituents over the past few days claiming that the British Government are about to send 4,000 extra troops to Najaf. Will my right hon. Friend confirm or deny that point?

Mr. Hoon: Again, my hon. Friend anticipates a passage in my speech that I shall reach in a moment. As I have done on a number of occasions, I assure her and the House that the Government have taken no decisions on any number of extra troops. I will inform the House in the usual way as soon as any such decision is taken, if it is taken.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): My right hon. Friend says that the nature of the Iraqi Government is a matter for Iraqis. Does he have a view on whether that Government should be secular? Would he be concerned if religious parties were to form a Government next January?

Mr. Hoon: In a different context, my hon. Friend would be the first to say that the nature of any Government should be a matter for the people in question, and that is my answer to him.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): On the constitution and an elected Iraqi Government's right to decide the nature of the state, is it true that, once elected, the Iraqi Government will not have the right to rescind previous changes such as the wholesale privatisation of the public sector in Iraq?

Mr. Hoon: An Iraqi Government will consider such matters when they are established with democratic legitimacy conferred by elections. The interim Government's main task, acting under the transitional administrative law that we and the Iraqi leaders worked so hard to agree, will be to prepare the ground for full elections to a transitional assembly around the turn of the year. For the first time, Iraq will have a representative body chosen by all its people that works for the country as a whole. The assembly will be responsible for choosing a transitional Government and for preparing a constitution in time for general elections towards the end of 2005.

Clare Short: Ambassador Brahimi made it clear that elections cannot be held without security. If an interim Government are appointed, there may be so much chaos that elections are not possible. Does my right hon. Friend share that worry, and what should be done?

Mr. Hoon: I do not share that worry, but it is a risk that we have to address. That is why our forces, alongside Iraqi forces, are working so hard to deal with the security situation. I am sure that my right hon. Friend would support them in their efforts to do that precisely to allow elections to take place in accordance with the schedule.

It has always been our intention to involve the United Nations in the process. We are working towards a new Security Council resolution. We expect it to be agreed before the transition and to emphasise the new arrangements for full Iraqi authority. Any new resolution will take account of the views of United Nations Security Council members, other international partners and, most important, the Iraqi people. We expect that it will clearly mark the next stage in the transition towards democracy in Iraq, confirm the mandate of the multinational force and specify the future role of the United Nations, including support for the political process and assistance in preparing elections.

Mr. Hogg: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that one of the strategic purposes of the resolution must be to attract other countries, which do not currently do so, to provide soldiers for Iraq? Consequently, the language and the nature of the resolution must be drafted with that principally in mind.

Mr. Hoon: I would regard that as an incidental advantage of such a resolution; I would hardly describe it as the main reason for it. If, as a result of passing a new Security Council resolution, other countries are willing to deploy their forces to Iraq, I will strongly support it. I am sure that that also applies to the Iraqi people.

United Nations international staff are already operating in Iraq and in the region. One team, headed by Lakhdar Brahimi, has been consulting Iraqis on the formation of the interim Government; the other, headed by Carina Perelli, has been examining options for the electoral process.

We also believe that the United Nations has a vital role to play in preparing for elections and giving advice on the constitutional process in 2005. We would welcome United Nations involvement in the full range of humanitarian and reconstruction tasks in Iraq. We very much value the United Nation's constructive attitude towards Iraq's future, expressed by the Secretary-General down. It is all the more commendable following the terrible tragedy that the United Nations suffered last August.

Regrettably, as we make both political and economic progress, some continue to oppose the process: former Ba'athists, terrorists and others willing to use extreme violence, sometimes for personal gain. I assure the House that we will not allow the violent few to hold hostage the prospects and fortunes of the many Iraqi people who want peace and progress. We are determined to do what we can to provide security in Iraq, for it is only within a secure and stable environment that reconstruction and political life can flourish.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for saying that. It will be essential to have troops on the ground to ensure that that happens. I have constituents who are currently serving in Iraq and are worried about the possible extension of six months to nine months. Will he answer that point?

Mr. Hoon: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman was not present during Defence questions, when I dealt with that. There is no reason at this stage to extend the usual tour of duty for British soldiers in Iraq. However, if circumstances on the ground make it necessary, we will have to make that decision. However, no such decision has yet been made.

Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): The continuing violence must hugely worry civilians in Iraq. I realise that it is not Government policy to count the number of civilians killed and injured, but will coalition forces undertake that now, or in future under the authority of the United Nations, to build confidence among Iraqi civilians that things are getting better, not worse?

Mr. Hoon: As I believe was suggested earlier, it is extraordinarily difficult to count precisely the numbers killed or injured when engaging coalition forces. Perhaps I could give my hon. Friend an example from recent events. Yesterday, British forces were attacked in al-Amarah with 15 mortar rounds. I am pleased that they were able to respond effectively. Two British soldiers were wounded and several militia—we estimate 30, but that is necessarily an estimate that cannot be made with great precision—were killed. The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) came pretty close to suggesting that British forces in that position were required to go back into danger and ordered to count the dead bodies of those who had attacked them in the first place. I simply appeal to him to be realistic.

Sir Menzies Campbell: If that was the inference that the right hon. Gentleman derived from what I said, let me say that I did not intend in any circumstances to give that impression. There is, however, a legitimate question as to whether we keep a count of the civilian casualties, because of their nature and because of the consequences for public opinion in Iraq and elsewhere in the middle east.

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. and learned Gentleman leapt to his feet in a passable display of indignation, but I wonder how he would, in practice, do what he suggests. It is all very well to make these suggestions, but somebody actually has to do it. I have said that we do our very best to make a reasonable estimate of the number of casualties, but when soldiers come under attack, they return fire. They cannot be expected to go back and count precisely how many people they have killed.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): If the Secretary of State were to instruct troops to go back to count the casualties, does he think that people would believe the numbers that were given?

Mr. Hoon: I think that we have probably dealt with this issue in sufficient detail, although I see that another hon. Member is anxious to intervene.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): I am rather disappointed that, in the debate so far, we have been so negative about the role that UK troops have played in Iraq. I believe that we have done a magnificent job. Will the Secretary of State advise the House of the role that he foresees over the next six weeks and beyond 30 June for British forces, who I believe are the finest in the world? We need to say that, to give them encouragement for the very difficult work that they are undertaking. I have a great belief in our forces.

Mr. Hoon: I entirely agree. I was rather allowing the facts of the engagement I mentioned to speak for themselves. British forces came under attack from an overwhelming force. They were ambushed and responded in kind, achieving a considerable military success, at a cost of two lightly wounded British casualties. That was a remarkable success. I also agree with the hon. Gentleman's other observations about the abilities of Britain's armed forces.

This weekend, Basra and Nasiriyah saw a number of attacks against the coalition resulting in injury to three British soldiers and the loss of one Italian soldier. Right hon. and hon. Members may have seen reports over the weekend of a failed mortar attack against British forces in Basra that resulted in three Iraqi civilians being killed and three more wounded. This tragic incident highlights once again the indiscriminate nature of the attacks being carried out, not only against coalition forces but against the Iraqi people themselves.

The Falluja brigade has been formed from former Iraqi soldiers. It is a temporary organisation designed to provide security in the town, patrolling alongside US forces. Our objectives in Falluja remain unchanged: to ensure that armed groups can no longer intimidate local people and to confiscate heavy weapons from lawless insurgents. In Najaf, we should remind ourselves of what lies behind the recent tensions. Iraqi prosecutors investigating the murder of a senior cleric, Ayatollah Abdel Majid al-Khoei, have strong grounds for the arrest of a number of suspects linked to al-Sadr, including al-Sadr himself.

In the meantime, al-Sadr's illegal militia have been harassing local people in several cities, including Basra and al-Amarah, unlawfully occupying public buildings and terrorising women on the streets and in universities. We have attempted to disarm al-Sadr's militia peacefully and, when necessary, by force. Our efforts are having some success. We judge that al-Sadr's support, while vocal and violent, is indeed limited and may well be on the wane. In both Falluja and Najaf, we continue to seek political solutions where possible and will, of course, respect the nature of the holy sites.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): What care is being taken not to damage the great shrines at Najaf and Karbala? Apart from any cultural considerations, risking such damage really is playing with Shi'ite fire.

Mr. Hoon: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend about the sensitivity of the holy sites, which is why we are taking great care to respect them. This also seems relevant to the attitude of the Shi'a towards al-Sadr himself, because the overwhelming majority of them do not support or approve of his behaviour. In that disapproval lies the political solution that I have set out.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I listened with interest when the Secretary of State said that, in certain parts of Iraq, the Government and the Army will seek to find political solutions. To what extent are the Government determined to apply the lessons learned in Northern Ireland—some of which have been very useful and constructive—to the situation in Iraq? Or does he feel that there are no comparisons to be drawn?

Mr. Hoon: There are never exact comparisons, but I certainly believe that British troops on patrol in Iraq daily apply the lessons that have been learned so painfully over a long period in Northern Ireland. The other, wider point to make is that there will not ultimately be a military solution to this kind of crisis. Whatever security action we take on the ground has to be supported and complemented by an appropriate political process. That is precisely the strategy that I am setting out on behalf of the Government.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con) rose—

Mr. Hoon: Perhaps I may make a little progress. I have given way a number of times, although I will give way in due course.

Security sector reform is a crucial part of our strategy to allow the Iraqi people to rely less on coalition forces. We are making strong progress, and our armed forces are playing a vital role. As the House will recall, I announced last year that we would send extra forces to Iraq for just that task. They are supported by civilians from the United Kingdom and by contributions from our allies, and are doing an excellent job. It is not just the coalition in Iraq that recognises the importance of this work for Iraq's future. A substantial police training centre for Iraqi officers is operating in Jordan and producing large numbers of graduates each month. Other countries have also privately offered help, and we are exploring their proposals.

There are now close to 80,000 trained Iraqi police, as well as tens of thousands of other security personnel, including border guards, facilities protection staff and civil defence forces. In the British area, more than 12,000 police have been recruited, and we have trained some 8,000, either in Jordan or in the police training centre that we established with our Danish coalition partners. Six battalions of the Iraqi civil defence corps—some 5,000 people—have been recruited, trained and equipped, as have 5,000 border police, which is some 60 per cent. of the assessed requirement. Raw numbers, however, can seldom provide the full picture.

On the ground, real, tangible progress has been made, with Iraqi police on patrol across the country. Those police are an enormous credit to Iraq and have shown great bravery and resolve in the face of vicious attacks. For example, after the recent terrorist outrages in Basra, which killed more than a dozen schoolchildren, the Iraqi police stabilised the situation and are now investigating. The Iraqi Ministry of Health, which has fully passed to Iraqi control, provided medical care on the scene.

Tony Baldry: The Secretary of State is describing the action that has been taken on security and military grounds, but it is quite clear that one of the problems that we have had in Iraq is the concept of the coalition forces being occupiers. The UN resolution refers to them as occupiers. All of us in the House are supposedly politicians, and we know that we have to win people's hearts and minds. Will he give the House some idea of the thinking and the work that is being done to win the hearts and minds of Iraqi people, so that they cease to see the coalition as occupiers and regard us as part of the process that will lead sooner, rather than later, to their liberation?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's observation. He will know, probably as well as I do, that the word "occupier", which is not the happiest word in this context, is one that we are required to use by virtue of the Geneva conventions. It sets out our status. Obviously, that will change on 30 June, which is why we are working in such a determined way towards that date. However, he is also right, in the sense that we are helping with the reconstruction of Iraq. The coalition provisional authority reports that around 20,000 reconstruction projects have been completed—building Iraq's infrastructure, generating jobs and getting its economy moving. The United Kingdom is involved in some 2,700 of those projects, and every day the quality of life in Basra gets better.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): Following the same theme as my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), this is a very valuable description of the security situation, but it seems to be in pursuit of a totally unchanged political policy. I detect no tone of any change. After June, as we get a UN resolution, what attempts are going to be made to internationalise the problem? Does the Secretary of State agree that we need the support of the Russians, the French, the Muslim countries, if we can get it, and perhaps some Asian countries? Are other countries going to be involved in the political resolution, or will that remain totally in the hands of the occupying forces and people who are free to contribute troops and money, if they wish to join in?

Mr. Hoon: At least two of the countries that the right hon. and learned Gentleman mentions—Russia and France—will have to sign up to the Security Council resolution, so they will be engaged in a debate, and indeed in the political process set out in any new Security Council resolution. As I indicated to the House earlier, one of the incidental benefits of such a resolution is the possibility of more countries providing troops on the ground and, therefore, more countries being prepared to engage in the reconstruction effort.

That is crucial in providing employment for Iraqis, which gives them a stake in the development of their country and which is proving remarkably successful. I can give the House a long list of achievements. About 90 schools have been refurbished in our area of responsibility and a further 140 refurbishment projects are under way. We have completed 65 general health projects, 16 hospital projects and 32 health centre projects. A programme is under way to refurbish something as mundane as petrol stations in southern Iraq. Some 21 berths in Umm Qasr port are open to deep-draft ships. A grain-receiving facility has been renovated and can now process up to 600 tonnes of grain an hour. A whole range of projects has been set up across the country to deliver precisely the improvements asked for.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): Should not my right hon. Friend correct the misleading impression given by the former Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), that only British and American troops are in Iraq? I have just come back from Budapest, and I know that Hungary has troops in Iraq under Polish command, whom it will continue to keep there. Some 27 other countries have troops in Iraq. Should not that fact be spread more widely by the Government to counteract the propaganda that only Britain and America are there?

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that 30 countries are providing troops and sharing security responsibilities as they work closely alongside Iraqis. I would be willing to see that figure enlarged by other countries providing forces to Iraq.

There has been speculation in recent weeks that more UK forces may be on their way to Iraq, either to replace Spanish troops who have recently left or to provide more command capability. In fact, US forces have replaced the Spanish contingent. As far as our own area is concerned, we judge that we have sufficient forces in Iraq, although we always keep that under close review.

We are considering, with partners, the levels and disposition of forces in the context of the crucial period we are now entering, from the establishment of an interim Government through to the election of a transitional assembly and Government early next year. We have not yet reached any conclusion on what that may mean for our own military contribution. If we decide to make any significant change, we shall, as I have already indicated, inform the House in the usual way.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): Winning hearts and minds is one of the important things that British troops have to do. Recent events have made that far more difficult because of stories appearing in newspapers that have proved to be false. I am the Member of Parliament who represents Fulwood, which is home to the Queen's Lancashire Regiment. Does the Secretary of State accept that the great anguish and frustration felt by members of the regiment and their families has been relieved by the fact that the stories proved to be fake? Will he assure the House that the Daily Mirror is fully complying with the investigation now taking place so that those who are culpable may be brought to justice and so that everyone may know that what was published in the newspapers over the past two weeks put the lives of our servicemen, which were already at stake, under even greater tension?

Mr. Hoon: I, too, have received strong representations from the hon. Gentleman's constituents and from those of surrounding constituencies that provide recruits for the regiment. The Mirror group has certainly said that it will fully co-operate with the investigation, but I have not yet seen the results of that.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con) rose—

Mr. Hoon: I must make progress. A great number of hon. Members want to speak, but I shall give way to the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. I wish to raise a matter on which he may need some notice before replying, but which is germane to the debate.

A story is running on the wires, on Associated Press in particular, that a roadside bomb containing sarin nerve agent has exploded in Iraq near a United States military convoy. Brigadier-General Mark Kimmitt said:

"The Iraq Survey Group confirmed that a 155 millimetre artillery round containing sarin nerve agent had been found. The round had been rigged as an IED (improvised explosive device), which was discovered by a US force convoy. A detonation occurred before the IED could be rendered inoperable. This produced a very small dispersal of the agent."

There were no casualties.

As we are constantly talking about weapons of mass destruction, I thought that the right hon. Gentleman should have the chance to take advice on that incident and inform the House of the background to it.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for setting out that information for the benefit of hon. Members. I have been in the House since business started today, so I have not had an opportunity to receive that information. In due course, no doubt, I shall be able to verify it. It certainly indicates the kind of risks and threats that coalition forces face and the extreme lengths to which some fanatics who oppose us are prepared to go to cause loss of life.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hoon: I really must make progress and reach a conclusion, so I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me if I do not give way.

I regret that allegations in recent weeks about the conduct of some coalition forces have marred our record in Iraq. No one who saw those photos from Abu Ghraib could fail to be shocked. The President of the United States and the United States Defence Secretary have apologised for any mistreatment, and I am fully confident that the United States' investigations will be comprehensive and thorough. Mistreatment of prisoners is wholly unacceptable. In an environment where insurgents are prepared to murder police officers, humanitarian aid workers, civilian contractors and innocent children, our own standards cannot be allowed to fall. Allegations have also been made against UK forces and they are investigated as soon as they are received.

Hon. Members have rightly raised concerns about the effect that recent allegations will have on our standing in the Islamic world. I can assure the House that we are considering how we can ensure that we make it clear to the Iraqi people how seriously we take these charges, and how determined we are to deal with them. The governor of Basra, however, whom I met only a few weeks ago, has said that he has not registered a single allegation of human rights abuses by British forces.

We will continue our mission in Iraq. I have no doubt that when we succeed—and succeed we shall—the lives of ordinary Iraqis will be improved beyond anything they could have dreamed of under Saddam Hussein. We are making further progress every day. It would be wrong of us to falter now.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD) rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the Secretary of State has finished.

4.21 pm

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con): I, too, wondered whether the Secretary of State had finished or was giving way yet again.

I welcome the debate, although it is a disgrace that it is not being held in Government time. Had the Government had the courage to initiate such a debate, and as Iraq is not for them or us a cynical European or local government election issue, we could have had a full day's debate on this important and urgent matter.

As both the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) and the Secretary of State indicated, this debate is being held in the grim shadow of the tragic assassination today of Izz al-Din Salim by those who still seek to prevent the peaceful return of Iraq to the Iraqis. They must not be allowed to succeed.

I shall start with two comments. First, we were right to support the Iraq war. The threat posed to international peace and security was acknowledged and real. Iraq and its peoples needed rescuing from Saddam. Those two facts were not going to change and if we had not done it last year, we would still be looking to do it in the future, at almost certainly greater risk and cost. It is worth remembering that, if the Liberal Democrats had had their way, Saddam would still be murdering his people, still destabilising that volatile region, still posing a threat to international peace and security and still requiring to be dealt with.

Clare Short: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: I give way to the right hon. Lady, who voted for the war in the Cabinet.

Clare Short: We do not have votes in the Cabinet. We do not have much discussion, either. Everyone tends to justify their own actions, but surely the lesson is that being willing to use force to back up the authority of the UN to support the people of Iraq in getting rid of Saddam Hussein, perhaps by indicting him, could have been done more carefully, in a more considered way and with more international co-operation. The people of Iraq would be much better off if that had happened. Should we not all face up to that and stop trying to justify every position that we have taken in the past?

Mr. Ancram: I will take a lot from the right hon. Lady but I find it difficult to take that when she stayed in the Cabinet throughout the war, regardless of the fact that there had been no second UN resolution.

Support for the war, however, does not and cannot entail placid acceptance of everything that has followed. That support cannot—nor should it, in a democratic Parliament—inhibit us from criticising the conduct and drift of the post-conflict programme.

Secondly, the Prime Minister hit rock bottom last week when he inferred that our criticism of him was a criticism of our armed forces. We have always made it abundantly clear that we not only support the effective and courageous manner in which our armed forces are carrying out their responsibilities in Iraq in the face of great difficulties and dangers, but are immensely proud of their professionalism and dedication.

The whole House will share my disgust at the malicious attempts in some quarters to damage the reputation of our armed forces in Iraq by making untrue or faked allegations that also endanger their lives. With the editor rightly gone, I hope that the Daily Mirror lessons have been well and truly learned. Of course, where there are serious and genuine allegations of abuse, those responsible must be rooted out and dealt with firmly and effectively. We can have no time for such people.

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton) (Lab): The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that at the time when war was embarked upon, Iraq represented a real danger to other countries. Can he tell me of any country, apart from Israel, that recorded in any international forum any threat that it felt itself to be under from Iraq?

Mr. Ancram: The words that I used were, "The threat posed to international peace and security was acknowledged and real." That is because during the previous 12 years, 17 United Nations resolutions had been passed under chapter VII of the UN charter, which relates to threats to international peace and security and which allows, under article 43, for military action to be used to deal with such threats.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Ancram: I want to make a little progress. This is not our debate and I am conscious that many hon. Members want to speak. Those who know me will be aware that I am usually very generous in taking interventions.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke rose—

Mr. Ancram: However, I shall give way to my old friend, the former Chancellor.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful for that privileged treatment and I shall try not to abuse it.

Given that I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend that our attitudes today cannot be determined by whether we were in favour of the war in the first place, does he agree that even if the war was justified, the present situation has been made infinitely worse by the painful lack of planning for what was to follow after the occupation and the incompetence with which the interim Government have at times conducted themselves in trying to impose security on the country? Is it not important that the House should address itself to the problem that we now face: how do we get from being an unpopular occupying force to being part of a genuinely international effort to create a stable Iraq?

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. and learned Friend has either been reading my mind or reading my notes from a distance, because he pre-empts what I am about to say.

This debate is important because of the crisis of public confidence that has been brought about by the lack of direction, lack of candour and general incompetence in the Government's handling of Iraq. That has its roots in the Prime Minister's refusal to hold a proper inquiry into the Government's use, in the run-up to the war, of intelligence on weapons of mass destruction. It has been further deepened by the incredible failure of the Prime Minister and his senior colleagues to keep abreast of the serious reports on prisoner abuse by the Red Cross and Amnesty International, and by the extraordinarily conflicting reasons for that failure that were given in the House last week—including, as hon. Members may recall, the Secretary of State for Defence saying that he had not read the Red Cross report because it had been given to the Government in confidence. That is compounded, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) says, by the Government's failure a year ago to set out a clear post-conflict plan—for which, incidentally, I had been calling since the debate in this House on 24 September 2002.

Strategy is still being developed on the hoof. Last Wednesday, the Foreign Secretary chose to announce—not in this House, but on "BBC Online"—that British troops would leave Iraq if the new post-30 June interim Government asked them to do so. Having called for the transfer of power to be real, not cosmetic, Conservative Members welcome that announcement—but why was it not made in Parliament and why was it not made earlier? There remain other unanswered questions that I shall come to shortly.

Today, we find Downing street apparently briefing about—hon. Members can choose their phrase depending on the newspaper that they read—"gear changes" and "new exit strategies". To me, exit strategies are redolent of failure at a time when we need a clear, positive plan with a clear end game for achieving our overall objective: to return Iraq to the Iraqis under a representative and democratic Government.

If we are to understand the strategy, we first need to know the full details of the handover on 30 June. To whom will it be made and who will have been responsible for making that decision? Given the role of the United Nations representative in the handover, what will be the role of the coalition in the run-up to the handover?

We believe that, even in the remaining six weeks, there is still a need for a high-powered United Kingdom political representative in the coalition, working alongside General McColl on the military side, to ensure that the UK political voice is clearly heard and heeded.

We need some answers now, to show that the handover will be a real transfer of sovereignty. How does the Foreign Secretary's statement on withdrawing UK troops if requested by the interim Government conform to what I understand was the crucial Brahimi agreement with Ayatollah Sistani, which was reported in Sir Jeremy Greenstock's article in The Economist on 7 May, namely, that the unelected Government who will emerge from the handover and precede elections will not have sovereign freedom to affect the future of the Iraqi state? How is that consistent with saying that they can decide whether coalition forces stay or go?

We also need a clear security strategy to restore public order and stability in Iraq, not least, as has been said, because of the forthcoming elections next January. What will be the position of our troops if we are asked to remain after 30 June? Will they be, in the old phrase, "in aid of the civil power" at that power's request? What is a realistic assessment of when Iraqi security forces will be capable, in terms of numbers and training, to impose and maintain the necessary degree of security? Despite the fact that the Secretary of State told us again today that no decision has been made about whether further deployments of British troops will be needed, what is the likelihood of a requirement for more UK troop deployments and in what capacity? We should at least be given an indication.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that it is one thing if further troops are necessary at the behest of British commanders to secure the safety and positions of British forces, but that many of us would be gravely concerned if there were to be an open-ended commitment for the deployment of British troops anywhere in Iraq at any time?

Mr. Ancram: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that question. He, too, must have such good eyesight that he can read my notes. I was just coming to a point that has been discussed over the weekend and raised in the debate: whether the House should vote on future deployments. I am firmly of the view, which I suspect is shared by my hon. Friend, given what he has just said, that the House should never try to second-guess operational decisions or requirements on the ground. However, where a decision is to be taken that would substantially or materially change the nature of our military involvement, which could include a request to undertake operations that are outside our current area or not under our command, seeking the opinion of the House would probably be justified. That does not indicate that we would oppose such deployment, but that we should want to consider it on its merits.

Paul Flynn: I welcome the statement that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has just made. Does he agree that the information that he gave the House earlier shows that there has indeed been a substantial change in the level of danger into which we are sending our troops? Does he also agree that a valuable precedent was established when the House voted to send our soldiers to Iraq to kill and, tragically, to be killed? Is it not clear that many of the assumptions on which those decisions were based were false and that there is a need for a new decision if more troops are to be sent?

Mr. Ancram: I do not accept that our troops were sent to Iraq to kill and be killed; they went there to restore stability and democracy in that sad country after many years of a vicious and evil regime. I have said what I said about voting. I very carefully judged my words and do not want to add or detract from them.

We need a credible economic strategy to create employment and to remove a major cause of resentment, which is itself a recruiting sergeant for dissent and worse. Lack of income is fostering enormous resentment in various parts of the country. As Jeremy Greenstock wrote, the guiding slogan for the coalition should be "security and jobs, stupid".

What plans are there to promote a comprehensive, long-term, job-creating investment programme? What plans are there to ensure a credible humanitarian strategy? For instance, what is the current situation in the hospital in Basra in relation to reported shortages of personnel and equipment?

Would not reconstruction be more acceptable locally if it was bottom-up rather than applied top-down?

We also need to ensure that anything that is done by the coalition that is not consistent with the objectives for which we went to war ceases. The objective of removing the threat posed to international peace and security by Saddam Hussein has been achieved, but the objective of creating a stable, democratic and prosperous Iraq is not yet achieved.

Mr. Hogg: My right hon. and learned Friend needs to be very careful. The stated purpose for going to war was to ensure compliance with United Nations resolutions. I did not happen to agree with it, but that was the stated purpose. No doubt the restoration or creation of democracy was an intended by-product, but it was not the lawful justification for the war.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. and learned Friend has, on many occasions, made the case against regime change. The terms of the United Nations resolutions acknowledged and recognised that Saddam Hussein was a threat to international peace and security and was required to be dealt with. That was the justification upon which we backed the decision to go to war. Indeed, I understand from the Foreign Secretary that that was also the position that he took at the time.

We should, however, acknowledge, as the Secretary of State for Defence did, the substantial body of work of reconstruction that is actually being carried out in Iraq. Electricity is now more equitably distributed and more stable than it was under Saddam Hussein, who used to feed most of it into Baghdad for political reasons. Basra alone now receives 21 hours electricity each day, and the sweet water canal system that provides drinking water to 1.75 million residents of Basra city has been renovated. The number of telephone subscribers, including mobile users, is 33 per cent. greater than it was before the war. Some 2,500 schools have been refurbished and 70 million textbooks have been reprinted. Almost all of Iraq's 240 hospitals are functioning, more than 1,200 clinics are open and more than 3 million children under the age of five have received vaccinations. That is solid progress and we should recognise and welcome it.

As several hon. Members have said, however, we must recognise what is undermining those efforts. In the vital battle for hearts and minds, perception matters. How the coalition is perceived matters, so how the coalition acts matters, too. There is a difference between what is seen as an army of liberation intent on restoring the state to its people and what is seen as a conquering army with all the heavy-handedness that can accompany that. I am always wary of commenting from afar on specific military actions without experiencing the real threat on the ground and the nature of the insurgents that are being faced. Nevertheless, I believe that the military conduct of United Kingdom forces has, in this regard, been exemplary.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ancram: I shall not give way again because, as I said, many other Members wish to speak in the debate.

There is no doubt that confidence right across Iraq has been shattered by the horrific incidences of prisoner abuse, particularly in the Abu Ghraib prison. We roundly condemn them. Such behaviour has no place in the conduct of the army of a democratic state. They are not only unacceptable in themselves, but highly damaging to the coalition's credibility in Iraq. One thing that would help to prevent further such abuses is, independent monitoring of all detention facilities in Iraq. When the Minister replies to the debate, can he specifically confirm that all and every part of coalition detention facilities throughout Iraq are open to unfettered inspection by the Red Cross? I repeat: all and every part of coalition detention facilities. Perhaps he can also clarify whether, after 30 June, responsibility for these detention facilities will pass from the coalition to the interim government.

I come finally to the underlying theme of this debate—the Government's relations with the United States. I bow to no one in my belief that our special relationship with America is crucial to our national interest. I believe in a true partnership with America, based on shared values, shared traditions and, frequently, shared interests. Shortly, Europe will be reminded of what, 60 years ago, the United States, as liberators, did for our war-ravaged continent and the debt of gratitude that we owe to them. Our relationship, however, must always be, as it always has been, a partnership in which frankness is at the core.

We are constantly given the nudge and the wink that that is the case for the Prime Minister, but we are never given the evidence. Even the closest of allies have differences of opinion and emphasis. A candid friendship, except when confidentiality is essential, should not be afraid of such differences—and the advice that follows on from them—being known.

The Prime Minister, however, seems to have established a new doctrine of international relations. He never admits in public whether the differences even exist, let alone the discussions he has had on them. That reticence is not necessary. Margaret Thatcher let Ronald Reagan clearly know of her displeasure at the United States invasion of Grenada in 1983. She quickly made her concerns known after the Reykjavik summit in 1986 between Presidents Reagan and Gorbachev. How can the British people ever know what influence a British Prime Minister has brought to bear on our American allies if he never discloses it? Is it surprising that people wonder whether any influence has been brought to bear at all?

Although the outlook in Iraq is, for the moment, bleak, we must never fall into the Liberal Democratic trap of just being negative. With them in power, Saddam would still be in place, he would still be murdering and he would still be threatening. Thank goodness he is not. Of course, things could be better. If the Government had planned more effectively when we pressed them to, if they had not dithered on the way forward and if they had not been so incompetent in keeping a grip on what was happening in Iraq, things today would be better. However, although time is short, we can still get it right. The cause we fought for was right and the objectives at which we are still aiming are right. For the sake of the people of Iraq and of international peace and security, we must ensure that they are achieved.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I remind all right hon. and hon. Members that Mr. Speaker has imposed an eight-minute limit on all Back-Bench speeches.

4.41 pm

Mrs. Barbara Roche (Hornsey and Wood Green) (Lab): For very many Jewish people of my generation, the major influence has been the holocaust and the second world war. That has certainly influenced my political views. The enduring view of that conflict and the holocaust is that the international community of the day knew what was happening in the concentration camps and knew that the train lines were carrying Jewish people and others from all over Europe to their certain death and destruction, and failed to act. That is an abiding issue for me, my community and many others. Similarly, in recent times, the failure of the international community to take any action until it was far too late led to the genocide and holocaust in Rwanda. I use the word "holocaust" advisedly. I hardly ever use it because to use it in a loose way defiles the memory of those who died.

For me, the Saddam's regime was horrific. I also represent a constituency with an enormous number of Iraqis, including many Iraqi Kurds. My hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd), with her great experience of the situation in Iraq, spoke so well of their plight. The husband of one of my constituents—a very brave woman—was an officer in Saddam's army. He was a dissident. He was called in. He was tortured. While he was being tortured, his wife was brought in and raped in his presence. After the rape, he was executed. She managed to get out of the country. We subsequently managed to get her children out of the country and into this country. She is a brave and wonderful woman.

Getting rid of Saddam Hussein was the right thing to do. That is why the events of recent weeks are so disturbing.

The accounts of what happened and of what was done by the American forces are absolutely dreadful. There are two accounts of those events. Either it is claimed, "We were only obeying orders"—a claim that again has an awful resonance for those who remember the events of the last century—or, as I now believe, institutional torture was authorised at a very high level. None of us who saw those pictures—there are probably more to come—can stand by and let that torture happen. I certainly cannot, and I suspect that the whole House cannot. That means that we, on behalf of the Iraqi people, have to make it clear to the Americans in the strongest possible terms how we feel about events. It means that Donald Rumsfeld has to resign now and the practice of using private contractors in Iraq for intelligence purposes must cease. Given what we have heard over the weekend, it also means that we need to ask the Americans if it is correct that filming took place of other appalling incidents in Guantanamo bay involving British citizens who were detainees there.

These dreadful events have overshadowed the magnificent contribution that so many of our British armed forces have made in the most difficult circumstances. There is no doubt that major acts of reconstruction are taking place and that our forces, with their long experience of engaging with civilian populations, have sought to win the hearts and minds of the Iraqi people. There is obviously a great deal of self-sacrifice on behalf of those people, and I congratulate our forces on that. We must be under no illusion, however: with the Americans' recent record, none of that message will get through, either to the Iraqis or to the public in this country. That is why we have to protest in the strongest possible terms.

What does that mean? We cannot simply desert the Iraqi people—that would be wrong—but on 30 June we have to hand over the maximum amount of authority to the Iraqi interim Government. That interim Government must be seen not as a puppet regime but as an interim Government who truly reflect the Iraqi people. We must make sure that the interim Iraqi Government have control over the security forces in Iraq if the country is to prosper and survive. The UN has to have the maximum power and control, and we all need to use our best endeavours to bring that about. On the deployment of troops, we of course need to listen to what British commanders on the ground are telling us, but we must also take into consideration the will of the Iraqis and the interim Iraqi Government, and we must do that in consultation with the UN.

The situation is so grave that this is not the time to seek narrow political advantage—it is too serious for that. We all have to resolve to work together for the Iraqi people. Iraq is a country with a brave, intelligent and able population, where parliamentary democracy once flourished. We must do everything possible to help it and to restore it, but, more importantly, we must do all that we can to give the Iraqi people control over their own lives and destinies.

Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon) (Con): I would say to the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche) that if there is a moral imperative on countries such as ours, where human rights are respected, to intervene in countries where they are not, there is an awfully long list of the latter—and that that was not the justification for the war. Saddam Hussein's was a particularly unpleasant regime, but there are many more unpleasant ones around the world—for example, in Sudan, where rather more people are being killed.

From the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) we heard something of an "I told you so" speech. I suppose he is entitled to make such a speech in the circumstances, but I am not sure that it was terribly helpful. From the Secretary of State, we heard an "It's all going according to plan" speech, but it clearly is not—if there was ever a plan in the first place. Those such as I who supported the war from the start—I still do—are deeply troubled by the fact that there seems to be no effective plan. We keep making the same mistakes and do not learn from them.

Now, we hope that on 30 June, Mr. Brahimi will somehow bail us out of the problems that we have encountered. Why it has taken us until 15 months after the end of the war to reach the point of handing over power to a more representative Iraqi Government—or transitional authority, or whatever it is to be called—I simply do not know. We persevered for more than a year with a group of people who were largely selected by the United States and who did not have the confidence and support of the Iraqi people. That caused problems, and the actions of some of the American forces, their interrogation techniques and some of the ways in which we have set about enforcing security, have exacerbated those problems.

However, we have to start from where we are. Whether or not one supported the war, there are two objectives that we should want to achieve. The first is to leave behind a reasonably peaceful Iraq where the rule of law is respected, at least to some extent, and which is starting down the road to democracy. We now have a duty to try to leave that behind us. The other policy objective is related to one of the reasons why I supported the war: I believed—perhaps "hoped" is a better word—that a reformed Iraq might act both as a beacon and as a rebuke to other countries in the region whose Governments are pretty awful.

None of the 22 Arab countries has anything resembling a working democracy; in none is the rule of law respected; and all are giving rise to a brand of Islamic terrorism that presents a serious danger to us. It is difficult to escape the conclusion that the rise of Islamic fundamentalism and terrorism is connected with the nature of the regimes in those countries. I am not suggesting that we could set up Jeffersonian democracies in Egypt and Saudi Arabia tomorrow, because I suspect that the people would elect Mr. bin Laden and his lieutenants. That is a measure of the problem facing us. However, if we do not start down that road, the existing regimes will be overthrown by Mr. bin Laden and his lieutenants and we will face worse than the ayatollahs in Iran for a generation to come.

Reform in the middle east is desperately needed. If we can leave behind us an Iraq in which the rule of law and human rights are observed and which is something approaching a democracy, it might reinforce our efforts to secure reform in the region. That is the only way to get long-term stability in the region and long-term security of our interests.

Clare Short: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that democracy will not be achieved in the middle east until the Palestine-Israel situation is resolved? The reason why the US supports oppressive regimes in Egypt, Jordan and other countries is that their peoples are so angry about the suffering of the Palestinians that democracy would give rise to countries that are hostile. If we resolve the Palestine-Israel situation and get all weapons of mass destruction out of the region, a process of democratisation can start. Without such resolution, that process cannot start.

Mr. Maples: I have said a great deal in the House and elsewhere about the middle east peace process. I have strong views, which I have taken up with the Prime Minister in writing and in speeches. However, I have only eight minutes and cannot deal with the subject now, save to say in defence of the United States that nobody could have tried harder to bring about peace in the region than President Clinton did in the last year of his Administration.

We have to try to leave behind us a stable and, hopefully, democratic Iraq. We are relying heavily on Mr. Brahimi to give some authority to the transitional administration and to ensure that it has a large measure of credibility and support among the population—more than the governing council, which was established by the provisional authority.

It is worth viewing the security threat in that light. The security threat comes in part from criminal gangs, in part from supporters of the old regime and in part from Islamic terrorism. The latter is, to some extent, sustained by Shi'ite clerics and by outsiders, but it also has overtones of nationalism—resentment of the presence of American troops. If the new authority has greater credibility and support, the security threat will diminish. Arabs, and Iraqis in particular, will deeply resent terrorists killing other Iraqis who have the support of the local population. Now the killers' excuse is that the governing council is the puppet of the United States and that its members are collaborators.

I do not buy that as a reason for killing them, but nevertheless I accept that it may have some political resonance. If the governing council, which clearly has the support of the people, is moving towards the implementation of a constitution and preparations for elections within a year or so, there is a chance that the security threat will diminish. Iraqi security forces will increasingly have the authority and political support to deal with the threat. If terrorism is seen as an attack on home-grown politicians, they will have the backing of the population of their home country in trying to deal with it.

It is difficult to see that happening without the presence of coalition forces beyond 1 July. We said that we would leave soon after that date, but I hope that we did not mean what we said, because there would be no chance of leaving behind us a stable Iraq. There are clearly forces bent on chaos or civil war, which is not in our interests and will certainly not send the right message to the region. As for sending more forces to Iraq, I would expect that to be done only if our military commanders wanted it. They should be sent only to the Iraqi region for which we are responsible and should be deployed in sufficient numbers to be commanded by a senior British officer, not parcelled out among other commands in Iraq.

If the threat is reduced, there is a chance of achieving stability in the region, which is a prize worth hanging on to for a bit longer. To those who say that we should abandon the enterprise because it reinforces failure, I would reply that the consequences of failure, whether reinforced or not, are terrible for the credibility of British and American foreign policy; for the credibility of our threat to use force; and for our long-term objectives. If we back off now, the message across the region will be, "Britain and the United States do not like this at all, but they are not going to do anything about it." That message, however, will suggest to people in those countries who are in favour of democracy and human rights that there is no support outside the region for what they want to do, thus handing the region over to two forces—the forces of the status quo, which are undemocratic, corrupt and nepotistic, and the forces of extreme revolution in the hands of Mr. bin Laden and his supporters.

[Mr. Maples]

It is worth reflecting on the consequences of abandoning our policy, both for us and for our alliance with the United States. If we leave the US alone in its enterprise it will probably retreat into isolationism. Most of Mr. Bush's critics in the House feared that he would pursue that policy when he was elected, but now they are criticising him for pursuing an interventionist policy abroad. British foreign policy and defence are built on our strong alliance with the United States and to abandon that alliance will leave us floundering in the middle of the Atlantic without the security of European defence co-operation, about which the present Government, the previous one and I share some scepticism. We have no alternative but to try to see the enterprise through and I believe that the objectives are worth pursuing.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): In that fateful vote on 18 March 2003, I supported the Government's deployment of troops. That was the first time ever that the House of Commons was allowed to vote on the deployment of troops and the Government should receive credit for that. It is also important to remember that they won that vote with a very substantial majority. Given subsequent events, however, some people have asked me whether I would vote the same way again. Two or three newspapers have phoned me to ask that very question, but I have not seen the results in print because—I suspect—they did not get the answer that they wanted.

I would do exactly the same again—I told them that—because those of us who voted in favour thought very long, hard and carefully before doing so and we knew exactly what we were doing.

Like all hon. Members and everyone beyond the House, I abhor the torture and humiliation of the Iraqi prisoners and I say so, but I also abhor the execution of Nick Berg. Not everyone says that, by the way; not everyone who condemns the other torture condemns that as well. However, the torture—albeit awful—is of a totally different order and extent to the vicious murder of thousands and the torture of many more by the Saddam Hussein regime, to which the mass graves testify.

Of course the situation in Iraq is difficult. There is sabotage by external terrorists who do not want us to succeed. Criminals are inevitably exploiting the situation. Thankfully, Iraqi opinion is turning against extremists and terrorists, and we should be pleased about that. I got the impression that the Liberal spokesman wants everything to go wrong to prove that he was right and so that he can say, "I told you so."

Mr. Dalyell: It was not the critics in the House, but Senator Edward Kennedy who described the Abu Ghraib prison as "under new management"—but the same as Saddam. It was Senator Kennedy, not us.

Mr. Foulkes: Of course, Senator Kennedy is a well-respected man; he has his own history to deal with.

As well as the sabotage and the criminal elements, thousands of children are being educated at school. Many ill people are being treated in hospitals. Oil and water are flowing again, in spite of attacks. Electricity supply is restored. Of course that does not hit the headlines, but it is the increasing reality in Iraq.

In this extremely difficult situation, where do we find the Liberal Democrats? As usual, they are on the bandwagon of opportunism. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) can sigh and moan, but it is true. Not just in the House of Commons, but on the stump in the European elections, they are showing cynical opportunism. As we heard from their spokesman today, they are coming up not with a solution, but with constant, carping criticism, undermining the morale of our servicemen and women.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): May I tell the right hon. Gentleman that I have visited Iraq since the start of conflict and the troops there have told me that they have been very grateful to Liberal Democrats and others who have been putting their side of the argument? May I remind him that the Liberal Democrats pointed out that our troops did not have the right kit and the right boots when the right hon. Gentleman's Government sent them to war to fight?

Mr. Foulkes: When the hon. Gentleman was talking to those troops, he did not understand the irony that they were using to make their point. They are a cleverer lot than he gives them credit for. He and the Liberal Democrat foreign affairs spokesman have taken a very interestingly different line on that from time to time.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Foulkes: No, I am not going to give way.

In contrast to the Liberal Democrats, our troops are helping not only to keep the peace in difficult circumstances, but with reconstruction and rehabilitation. The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) did not even mention or recognise that, let alone give them credit for it; nor did he come up with any constructive and practical suggestion for the way forward. Indeed, he spoke like the lawyer he is, to put a straitjacket on our troops. If it is necessary to reinforce our forces for effectiveness, for their safety or to extend their tasks, the Government should do so.

At least the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not call for immediate withdrawal. I suppose that we should be thankful for that small thing, although some—including my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), who, given his time in office, ought to know a great deal better—call for that immediate withdrawal. That is the height of irresponsibility. It would result in a bloody, all-out civil war, in which thousands of people would die, and the danger of a return to dictatorship.

Mr. Kilfoyle: It is rare for me to defend my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), but my understanding of what he said is that he hoped that after elections there would be a withdrawal, not an immediate withdrawal after 30 June.

Mr. Foulkes: I bow to my hon. Friend's correction. Perhaps I shall have to correct my remarks in relation to my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston. I shall check the record. There are some who are calling for an immediate withdrawal, which would certainly result in bloody civil war, as I said. That, incidentally, is not just my view. It is also the view of leaders of socialist parties whom I met at the Socialist International executive in Budapest on Friday, and not all of them supported the intervention by Britain, the United States and the other countries that supported us. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd) said in an intervention, we must stay the course. That was a telling phrase. Following the assassination of the leader of the governing council, it is even more vital that we reaffirm our intention to do so.

I conclude where I started. One of the world's worst dictators has gone. Some people have said—as did the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples)—that there are many other dictators. At least there is now one less. Because we cannot get rid of them all does not mean that we should not get rid of one of them. I am glad to see that the hon. Gentleman agrees with that.

Now, Iraq is moving, albeit hampered by terrorists and by the faint-hearted, towards democracy and prosperity. That is something of which the House and our Government should be proud. I support the Government in their determination to see it through.

5.6 pm

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park) (LD): The previous speech was most enjoyable, in the usual Dr. Pangloss style of the right hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes). We heard, as usual, that all is for the best in the best of all possible situations.

It is important for the House to examine the reasons we were given a year ago for going to war with Iraq. Weapons of mass destruction, we were told, were ready within 45 minutes to destroy us. Dossiers were published to support that view. In my family, where there are three scientists—albeit two medics and a geologist—those dossiers were looked at carefully and thought to be extremely faulty and very bad science indeed. I wonder whether there are any scientists at all in the Cabinet if they could accept the sort of rubbish that was peddled at the time.

Nevertheless, many in the House accepted those dossiers and the reason given. We know that there were no weapons of mass destruction. If there were, where are they now? We do not hear the Government speculate very much on where they might have gone. The whole situation in Iraq has been such a shambles over the past 12 months; if the Government were so sure that there were weapons of mass destruction, it is extremely worrying that we have no hint of where those weapons might be now.

We were also told, as Dr. Pangloss reminded us, that human rights were being abused and that Saddam Hussein was a monster. I entirely agree. That means it is even more important that our campaign should have been conducted in the most impeccable way, and that there should have been faultless behaviour by the Americans and ourselves in Iraq. The reverse has been true.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): Can the hon. Lady imagine what would have occurred if photographs of abuse in prisons, which was far worse under Saddam Hussein, had come out? If such photographs had been available during Saddam Hussein's regime, they would have been used as part of the humanitarian justification for the invasion of Iraq.

Dr. Tonge: The hon. Gentleman makes a point, but I am getting a little tired of hon. Members saying that the human rights abuses allegedly being committed by the Americans, even if not by our troops, are somehow better or not so bad as those committed by Saddam Hussein. Abuses of human rights cannot be graded. The abuse of human rights is an absolute. We no longer have any moral authority. I was reminded of that last week while we were tackling the Sudanese Foreign Minister on the abuse of human rights in Darfur when I noticed faint smiles on the faces of the Sudanese delegates. It is difficult to claim the moral high ground when such things have been going on in Iraq.

We were also told that somehow Iraq had a connection with world terror and Osama bin Laden, but since the invasion of Iraq world terrorism has increased. The supporters of Osama bin Laden, who had no previous connection with that country, are now in there. We in Britain are more at threat than we were a year ago when we went to war.

Mr. Dalyell: Osama bin Laden did have a contact with Iraq, and the contact was that on two separate occasions he made serious attempts to assassinate Saddam Hussein. That was the relationship.

Dr. Tonge: I rather suspected that the hon. Gentleman would make that very intervention. He has said that many times.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): The hon. Lady will perhaps appreciate the intent of my intervention when I say that the question of the moral authority of our troops under the Ministry of Defence and the Secretary of State for Defence is entirely different from that of Saddam Hussein and his regime, in that here we investigate the allegations and act on them when they are proved. I challenge the hon. Lady to say that Saddam Hussein would have done the same.

Angus Robertson: Why did the abuses happen in the first place?

Dr. Tonge: As the hon. Gentleman says, why did they happen in the first place? Who gave the authority for American soldiers to abuse soldiers in this way? Was it just because the same thing was happening in Guantanamo bay? Why were the British Government so weak and feeble in trying to get our citizens out of Gantanamo bay? It rather suggests that they are colluding in American treatment of prisoners of war.

Liberal Democrats have been accused of being opportunist, but on the doorstep people say that they have been told lies about weapons of mass destruction by the Government, that at the very least Britain has colluded with human rights abuses in Iraq, and that we have endangered the safety of British citizens by increasing terrorism. The Government should be ashamed of their record in the past year, and if they have no shame, I am ashamed on their behalf—truly ashamed.

[Dr. Tonge]

The Prime Minister could save his soul. We have heard very little about the middle east peace process, which is mentioned in the motion. The Prime Minister could save his soul and his Government by breaking with George Bush and Ariel Sharon and by using every means to put pressure on Israel to withdraw from the territories of Palestine that it has occupied since 1967. That is a key issue that has not been addressed this afternoon.

If the Minister were to tell us that the offered withdrawal from Gaza is a step in the right direction, I would merely laugh in his face given what has been going on during the last week with the bulldozing of houses, sometimes with people in them—a scorched-earth policy—and the killing of leaders in that area before withdrawal is even considered.

When the Minister replies, cannot he acknowledge the visit of the delegation from the Palestinian assembly, which is in Britain this week, and accept once and for all that the road to peace in Iraq and the wider middle east, as well as the road to solving the threat of terrorism in this world, still lies through Jerusalem?

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): The sadistic abuses in Iraq revealed in the past week or so have undoubtedly set back hearts and minds in that country and throughout the region. We must thoroughly investigate how such acts could take place in the very prison where Saddam had his torturers and murderers. I find it difficult to believe that those who carried out the abuses and worse did so without the knowledge of senior officials and that they acted on their own initiative.

In order to ensure that people in the middle east, especially in Iraq, understand how seriously the issue is taken in the United States, the best course of action would be for the Secretary of State for Defence and his deputy to resign. That would show that when America says that it is sorry, it really means that it is sorry, and that the person in charge takes responsibility.

Chris Bryant: If my hon. Friend means that Donald Rumsfeld should resign, I agree with him, but he did not make that clear and seemed to suggest that the British Secretary of State for Defence should resign. Does he distinguish between systematic abuse by American soldiers, which is abhorrent to those Labour Members who, like me, have been members of Amnesty International for many years, and the incidents involving British soldiers, which may have been one-offs?

David Winnick: No comparison is possible between what the Americans did and the allegations against British soldiers, which should be investigated. I hope that I made it clear that the United States Defence Secretary and his deputy should go, and go quickly.

I do not regret supporting the destruction of Saddam's regime. The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) described that regime as "unpleasant"; it was not only unpleasant but outright murderous, and should have been dealt with much earlier. I was in the House when the controversy occurred over whether military action should be taken to liberate Kuwait. Some of my hon. Friends opposed that action, and I am not sure what the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) would have done had she been in the House. In 1991, I hoped that Iraq would be liberated, but I accepted that that was not possible because the coalition would have fallen apart. Had such action been possible, it would have been justified.

Lord Ashdown, the former Liberal Democrat leader, took the lead in urging action to stop the Serbian crimes in Bosnia and Kosovo. He was right, but some Labour Members—perhaps me, for that matter—were a little slow, and the Prime Minister has gone out of his way to praise the way in which the former Liberal Democrat leader understood the need to deal with the crimes that were being committed. Action was taken rather late in the day, but if Milosevic and his cronies were guilty, how much worse were the crimes of Saddam? If one supported what was done in Kosovo—some hon. Members did not—how can one object to action to destroy the regime in Iraq, which was far worse, far more criminal and far more murderous?

Mr. Keetch: Twelve months ago, Liberal Democrat Members did not rule out military action against Iraq in all circumstances. We said that it was not the right time and that the inspections conducted by Hans Blix should be allowed more time—what is more, Hans Blix also believes that he should have been given more time.

David Winnick: The Saddam regime had from 1991 onwards to comply. If Security Council members, including this country, had acted more effectively, we would not have got into the position that we reached. I made it clear at the time that, apart from weapons of mass destruction—Hans Blix was by no means satisfied that there were none, and the hon. Gentleman agrees with that—on the ground of human rights alone, I agreed with my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche) that we were right in the action that we took.

I agree with much of what the hon. Member for Richmond Park said about Palestine. I recently had a debate on the subject in Westminster Hall. The actions of the Israelis over the past few days were deplorable. We have seen on television Palestinians forced out of their homes, those homes bulldozed and the people forced to live in tents. The more the United Kingdom speaks out against Sharon's actions, the better things will be. I am pleased that more than 100,000 people in Israel demonstrated their distaste and dislike of and opposition to Sharon's policies. I support a sovereign Palestinian state, which should come about as quickly as possible. I made my views clear, as the hon. Lady knows because she listened to me, only a few days ago in Westminster Hall.

Mistakes were made after the liberation of Iraq and far more should have been done to provide basic facilities. I believe that there was a slowness and that we did not explain our intentions to the people to Iraq. That did not help. I agree that the United Nations should be given a far more active political role in preparing the future of that country. The deadline of 30 June must remain but it should be only the first step towards an Iraqi Government, who need far more legitimacy than the current governing council.

I supported the action last year and, as I have said, I make no apology for the way in which I voted in March 2003. However, I believe that there is a danger that the longer the occupation lasts the more suspicion will grow in Iraq and the region that the United States in particular wishes to stay for a long time. There is a danger that the occupation will be perceived as indefinite and that every excuse will be found to continue a military occupation. People in Iraq who are not terrorists or insurgents and said that it was right to take action to destroy Saddam's regime as well as those in the wider middle east will conclude that it was not simply a question of ousting Saddam. All sorts of conspiratorial theories will be presented that the action was a means of turning Iraq into a satellite of the United States or the coalition. There is great political danger in an indefinite occupation of Iraq.

Once the 30 June deadline is reached and the governing council is given more legitimacy, I hope that every step will be taken to ensure that the Iraqi Government's political role is given far greater emphasis than is currently intended. In so far as it is possible, I hope that more countries, especially Muslim countries, will be included in the transitional period. We all want the same outcome: a sovereign Iraq, a country that is not occupied and an elected, democratic Government with legitimacy. Those are the objectives for which my colleagues and I voted last year. That is why I emphasise that we must be very careful, not only because of the current terrorism, to ensure that the occupation has a limit and that the people of Iraq can rule themselves without outside occupation or interference.

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): As this nightmare unfolds on our televisions and we watch women, men, children, civilians and contractors dying daily, it is worth remembering again why the House sent in the troops. At least we had a vote on the issue, as the right hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) said, but the picture that was painted at the time was that weapons of mass destruction existed and presented a threat. Do the Government—does anyone—still believe that that is true? What happened to the 1,400 people who constituted the Iraq survey group? If they had found anything of note, the Government would be trumpeting their report. Why the silence? The right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) mentioned one round—is that it?

When those who opposed the war questioned the Prime Minister, the reply was often, "At least we have captured Saddam Hussein", as though that alone justified military action. The Government cannot have it both ways. We are in a coalition, and I must remind the Government that it was US soldiers who captured Saddam. If the US forces' success on that occasion is something that we want to share, we must also accept that they, as part of the coalition force, have been accused of shameful actions, and that some of them have perpetrated almost indescribable acts involving prisoners in Iraq. We cannot say that that has nothing to do with us, because it has been done in the name of the coalition.

We were given four reasons for going to war: the threat of weapons of mass destruction and the non-compliance with UN resolutions; the fight against terror; the humanitarian crisis; and Saddam's reign of terror. People say, "At least Saddam's reign of terror is over", but if that vote on weapons of mass destruction were to be repeated today, now that we know that the 45-minute threat related only to battlefield weapons and that the two trucks that were supposedly mobile laboratories were in fact sold to Iraq by us for meteorological purposes, there is no way that we would go to war based on the dodgy dossiers, the dodgy evidence, the Prime Minister's word or anything similar, because trust in the Government has gone.

The argument moved on to the fight against terror as a reason for going to war, but the terrorists have been fuelled by recent events. Those who wanted to portray the west as inhuman now have all the recruiting material they need. They have material—including photos and videos—to last them a long time. Donald Rumsfeld sends a shiver down my spine; what must he do to those in Iraq?

Hon. Members mentioned the reconstruction plan and said that the humanitarian grounds were reason enough for going to war in Iraq, but Iraq is not yet the relatively wealthy country that it should be. Before any trouble, it had a standard of living similar to that of Spain or Portugal, but it has not yet returned to that position. The end of Saddam's reign of terror has been cited as the only success, but the toppling of a dictator would never have won international support as a reason for going to war. If that was the reason that we went to war, we should be at war constantly.

What next? There must be either an exit strategy or more troops. The present situation is a nightmare. If the troops were pulled out tomorrow, the country could implode. Any terrorists not in Iraq would make their way there, and Osama bin Laden would probably be among the first. Civil war could break out. The Kurds might see an opportunity to establish their own homeland. Those who are suffering most would continue to suffer. Would sending more troops alleviate that?

The only way forward is to involve other countries through the UN. If that does not happen, we and the USA will have to send more troops just to protect those who are already there. I have already mentioned the consequences of pulling the troops out. We are left between a rock and a hard place. We must get other Muslim and Arab nations brought in on their terms, so that they can play a part in the drive for peace. We and the American Government are part of the problem as well as part of the solution. We cannot move the troops out today because that would make things worse, but if they stay indefinitely it will inflame an already dire situation.

How many more people must die on each side before this comes to an end? We need to hear what the Government plan to do next. We heard earlier from the Secretary of State that we cannot estimate the number of casualties, but on this day, the anniversary of the battle of Monte Cassino, at which it is estimated that 200,000 people died, surely we can estimate the number of civilian deaths in Iraq.

5.29 pm

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): I think that we should get away from two simplistic approaches to developments in Iraq and what needs to be done. One comes from those who supported the invasion, but who excuse or explain most of what has occurred since as not a great problem, or claim that it is outweighed by the severity of the Saddam Hussein regime, and say therefore that what has taken place is basically okay. My right hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) expressed such a view. We need to get away from and beyond that.

At the other extreme, there are those who opposed the war, who might be in danger of damning almost everything that has happened since, or of using what Wittgenstein called a one-sided diet of examples all the time about what is wrong in terms of humanitarian and other considerations, and who might say, "I told you so." It is as though things have not developed or moved. In both those camps, there needs to be shift and movement.

I was pleased to hear the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (David Winnick), because no one has been more strident than he has in defending the right to invade Iraq. He strongly emphasised his deep concerns over what has been revealed about humanitarian problems—not just those on the American side of the coalition, which need to be investigated fully and properly and acted on and which arise from Amnesty and Red Cross reports. He also stressed that there had been problems, that things had not gone right all along and that we were not always clear in connection with those. I think that there are those on both sides who recognise that we are in a different situation once the attack has taken place, and it is very important that we respond to changing developments.

I opposed the war, but I am keen to see the reconstruction of Iraq and its development into a free society with civic institutions and free provision. In that I associate myself—I can do a little bit in certain areas—with the new Iraqi Federation of Workers Trade Unions, which is a free trade union movement that works in difficult circumstances. It is challenging many trade unions in the Arab world, many of which are state controlled and, to some extent, replicas of what existed under the Ba'athist regime. The federation is not all that acceptable within Arab territories, and there is a still a remnant of Ba'athist trade unionism, which existed in Iraq and needs to be confronted.

The federation does not do too well in dealing with the Americans, because the Americans are interested in the redevelopment of Iraq in terms of their own vision, so their capital interests in that connection are to the fore. Trade unions are therefore a difficulty if they are going to be free, because they represent the workers who want to get into such things.

The federation challenges various people, but it has great difficulties because of mass unemployment and other problems. Just as things were developing nicely, with the International Labour Organisation involved in the United Nations office in Baghdad, the bombing took place last August and all that was lost. All the federation's connections became difficult. Those who are working in that area should say to the Government and those who supported the invasion that some of us who opposed it and would defend that position nevertheless might have something to offer and to say about these changes.

I am the most unlikely person in the world to vilify the armed forces in southern Iraq. I did my national service in Basra back in 1955–56. It was a peaceful period, but I understand what life is like there and the problems, even if there has been a great transformation since. At least I understand the heat of the midday sun that the forces will face. I hope that the Government recognise that some of us are not just taking what seem to be predictable positions.

Chris Bryant: My hon. Friend is making some telling points. Does he believe that there is not as big a difference between the two sides on this matter as many people would assume? Most people want British troops to leave Iraq as soon as possible. The division between us is on how soon that can happen.

Mr. Barnes: There are differences in the way in which the argument is put forward in different camps. One problem is point-scoring, one side against the other, which means that extreme positions are taken. The fact that some of us opposed what was taking place from a certain analysis and a certain background also means that we shall not just surrender to the position of those who supported the invasion. We want people to realise how tough the circumstances are and that there are some things that we are unlikely readily and easily to get. United Nations' involvement would be tremendous, but without it there might still be things that we could argue for and encourage the Government to do, as long as people realise that we are also in the game.

The point is often made that Britain is not to blame and that the problem rests with the Americans. What has been revealed about abuse falls very much within the American camp, but that does not absolve us. The Americans are our allies. We joined them. What are we working towards with them? If they were on the edge—they seemed to be at one time, although they seem now to pulling back—of further invasions of Syria, Iran and Korea, the clear lesson is that they are not fit people for us to be associated with, at least under the current regime, when it comes to entering any other military adventure anywhere in the world.

The special relationship between the UK and America should give us an opportunity to speak about what has happened so far as Rumsfeld and others are concerned. If The New Yorker is correct to say that Rumsfeld ordered a loosening of the rules under which military personnel could squeeze information out of detainees, we should react to that. If, as The New York Times says, rough treatment is par for the course in American prisons and part of the culture there, that too should influence us seriously. We should direct our minds to engaging in such serious matters without continually listening to point-scoring in the Chamber from one side against another. We should try to work together while still recognising the limits to that and the fact that we may speak from different positions.

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton) (Lab): The road to peace was mentioned several times earlier in the debate. The road to peace in Iraq seems to be a journey through a vale of tears that will go on for some time. It is one of those journeys where we know where it began but do not know where it will finish. When we embarked on the war, which I still consider to have been illegal and immoral, the then Chief of the Defence Staff expressed his misgivings about embarking on such an operation without a clear exit strategy.

That remains the case to this day.

Before those with a different view on the war criticise me, I put on the record that, like everybody else, I have nothing but admiration for the forces on the ground and the exemplary way in which they have performed their task. They did not ask to go to Iraq: they have been placed there, and they will do their job in their usual professional way. Our dilemma concerns our destination and what it will mean for the soldiers on the ground, as well as the wider issues.

I despair whenever I hear the Government present their case. We heard it again in this debate and in Defence questions. Every time a Government spokesman refers to Iraq, we hear the same circumlocutions, euphemisms, diversions and inaccuracies that present a wholly misleading case. One of my favourite, pithy aphorisms is from Noam Chomsky, who said that whoever captures the language captures the argument. It is important to look at the language that is used. For example, we have heard much about sovereignty, but what does that actually mean? If we hand over sovereignty on 30 June, can we do so in any real sense if the new authority will not have any control over its own security forces? Indeed, the official Opposition would be up in arms if it were suggested that the United Kingdom did not have true sovereignty over its own defence and foreign policies because it was part of Europe. We can at least be certain that whatever takes over in Iraq on 30 June will not be sovereign in any way that we would recognise.

Another word that is bandied about is "contractors", which has become an all-embracing term for the privatisation of war. For example, let us take the terrible murder of Nick Berg. He was a television aerial and dish erector and had gone to Iraq to make a few quid. He could legitimately be described as a contractor, but many of the other contractors are nothing more than mercenaries. They are former special service operatives performing highly specialised, highly paid and highly dangerous jobs. They accept the money for the job, and they are not in the same bracket as those who are trying to restore the civilian infrastructure.

Let us not forget that we went into this shambles in Iraq because of an unholy alliance between the Government and Conservative Front Benchers. Today, we heard an exchange in which the shadow Foreign Secretary gave the Secretary of State for Defence the latest news on weapons of mass destruction and shells with sarin gas. By definition, a shell is a battlefield weapon, but they have again altered the meaning of WMD so that it covers just about anything. We should not forget that the reasons for war given in this House revolved around the pivotal issue that there were weapons of mass destruction, but we have still failed to identify or provide any as evidence.

Mr. Keetch: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the alleged WMD containing sarin nerve gas was—according to General Kimmitt—found several days ago? It was a very small shell, it was ineffective and whoever rigged the round to explode appears not to have known that it contained a nerve agent. That is hardly the kind of weapon that we were warned about in the run-up to war.

Mr. Kilfoyle: No, it is not, but many of us argued not only about the definition of weapons of mass destruction, but the likelihood that any would be found anywhere in Iraq, given that we had been bombing them for so many years and had taken out any worthwhile defence and military facility. That is not to say, "I told you so"—it is a matter of record.

Mr. Robert Marshall-Andrews (Medway) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend reflect on what the Foreign Secretary said about the fact that Saddam had a choice? He could either give up his weapons of mass destruction or be deposed. The logical conclusion is that if he had given up his weapons of mass destruction we would not have deposed him and he would still be there under the sufferance of the British Government. In those circumstances, how can it possibly be argued that WMD were our principal reason for going to war?

Mr. Kilfoyle: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend. Like the Foreign Secretary, he is a lawyer, and he is used to the contortions of that sort of legalistic argument, which does not hold any logic for reasonable people. More importantly, as is evidenced by poll after poll, it does not convince the people of this country, who are less confused than the Government appear to be.

The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) commented on the number of Iraqi dead. When I tabled questions about that to the Ministry of Defence, I received a rather brusque answer. We all get used to being told, in effect, to mind our own business. I was given the same dismissive response when I asked about liaisons with non-governmental organisations that attempt to gauge civilian casualties in such conflicts. I was left with the clear impression that the issue is an irrelevancy. I do not consider the death of anybody, civilian or soldier, an irrelevancy to be marked by that sort of answer.

As it stands, the perception of our own efforts in Iraq is inextricably linked with the impressions of the American military. I do not think for one moment that our soldiers are guilty of the systematic and systemic abuse that seems to be the case with American troops, but that is not how it will seem to people on the ground. We should dispense once and for all with the myth that people who point to such abuses are endangering our troops. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche) said, the logic of that is that we should all keep quiet. People who knew about the holocaust kept quiet, and it went on regardless. When abuse takes place, it is one's duty as a citizen, an individual and an elected representative to speak out about it—it cannot be hidden.

[Mr. Kilfoyle]

Where do we go from here, given that we are in this mess and have to deal with this shambles? I am not one of those who believe, as was suggested earlier, that my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) had called for an immediate withdrawal—he did not. His argument was clear and unequivocal, and I tend to agree with it. There should be a clear timetable for withdrawal. As the Government are so keen on targets, I do not see why we could not set a target for our withdrawal by saying that it would take place after the election of a Government in January.

Alongside that, we should take a firm view on engaging further troops in the field. As The Independent remarked today, putting troops in because commanders on the ground deem it necessary in order to conduct necessary operations within their current remit or to effect their withdrawal is different from an American commander asking for more troops to make up for shortfalls elsewhere. If the Americans want more troops, let them put them in. I hope to heaven that that is not needed, but we should not widen the remit of our soldiers' existing commitments in Iraq.

If we are to get any sense of where we need to go in this horrible situation in which we find ourselves, the most important prerequisite is for the Government to come out of denial and recognise that what they did was wrong. They might have done it for the best of reasons—their case involves a lot of post facto rationalisation which does not convince many in this House, and is not convincing the British people—but there is nothing wrong with saying, "We may have gone down a certain road with the best of intentions, but let's recognise that we got it wrong and need to go in a different direction." As long as they maintain the myths about weapons of mass destruction—as do Conservative Front Benchers—and keep trying to justify the unjustifiable, they will only find themselves deeper and deeper in the morass.

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South) (Lab): My contribution will refer to the opinions of young soldiers who have just returned from Basra and to my beliefs about insurgents, militias and radical clerics, whether from outside or inside Iraq.

Last week, some of my daughter's former school friends returned from Basra on leave. I was privy to their conversations but did not take part as I was keen to listen to what the young people were saying. They were pleased to be home and said that although life in Basra was difficult, things had got significantly better during their tour of duty. They described the difficulties, but equally they talked about the other side of things—they said that they were winning hearts and minds and felt more and more involved with the ordinary, everyday life of the Basra community. They were known and welcomed by local people.

I found the conversation interesting because I rarely hear such comments either in the press or in the House. One of those young people was 21 and the other was 23; they showed no fear about returning to Iraq and said that they would be pleased to go back after their six-week leave. They made it clear that the children and young people would be waiting for them to take part in tournaments, football matches and all sorts of everyday community activities.

The British armed forces are exceptional in their involvement in the development of stable communities, with the Iraqis determining how that activity will be undertaken. Although I have not been to Iraq I have visited Bosnia, where ordinary folk told us again and again, "Please keep your armed forces here, they have given many of us the belief that our grandchildren will be able to grow up in our country."

In their conversation with my daughter, those young people were making it clear that they are developing peaceful relationships with ordinary people that will endure. They would appreciate it if that were recognised. Of course, they are not involved with the prison service; they are based in Basra and Umm Qasr, working with ordinary people. I was pleased to hear them say that they were looking forward to their return to Iraq.

It is not just young people who are making such statements. I have a close colleague in the Territorial Army, who is somewhat older than those young people. He, too, has served in Iraq, in a medical team, and he told me that on the whole the coalition forces and their activities were warmly welcomed. Although, obviously, there were inordinate difficulties, Britain was seen as a fair nation; when things went wrong they were investigated and appropriate action was taken. People did not talk about the creation of a sovereign state, but it was clear to him that Britain's involvement was helping them to believe that one day the rule of law would be established and their lives would be secure.

I have always been involved with the British armed forces and their deployment, so it saddens me to hear so much criticism yet so few references to the value that we give in so many countries in so many parts of the world. Of course, I do not underestimate the grave consequences of acts perpetrated by a few who, whether in communities or in prisons, carry out indecent and disgraceful acts. That is not just a dereliction of duty; those people bring disgrace to the armed forces and to our country. However, those disgusting and unauthorised acts are perpetrated by only a few and it is my belief that, ultimately, they will not undermine the ability of our coalition troops to create—as they did in the Balkans—an open, law-abiding society.

I also want to refer to the acts of the insurgents, some of whom have connections with al-Qaeda, radical Shi'a clerics or Islamist extremists. They are determined to scupper the introduction of the rule of law or an open democracy, because they know that, in such a society, they would have to pitch in and fight for the support of ordinary folk, and they would not get that support. Al-Sadr and his Jaish-al-Mahdi militia are a fierce fighting force, as everyone with military connections is aware.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): The hon. Lady refers to the rule of law, but is not the coalition's case for the importance of the rule of law undermined when the United States fails to respect the Geneva conventions in Guantanamo bay and when we hear reports that the abuse of prisoners may not have been isolated acts but part of a wider culture with links high in the US Administration?

Ms Taylor: I agree with much of what the hon. Gentleman says, but I am not prepared to say that such behaviour is part of the way of life or conduct of the British armed forces. I am dismayed by those serious allegations against the Americans.

Our forces know that al-Sadr and his militia are laying in wait for them and will ambush them. People outside understand that, but we need to say it in this place, too. Such militias will bomb our forces indiscriminately with rocket-propelled grenades. They whip up emotion and manipulate the poor to fight with them and die for "Moqtada". Our very young British forces have to fight against such people and win hearts and minds in their communities. We cannot hold discussions and negotiate with those insurgents; they will not even talk to moderate Shi'a clerics. They want only to deliver their own agenda—for them that is the only agenda.

Our armed forces are young, but they are extremely professional and competent and I hope that everyone in the House will make that statement again and again. I hope that on 30 June we shall see the establishment of an Iraqi governing force. I hope that reconstruction will take place with United Nations involvement. However, it is important to remind the House that we deployed a NATO force in the Balkans because the UN was unable to deliver peace in that region. When we talk about the value of the United Nations we should also acknowledge that there is no easy way to deliver peace in such countries; only a serious, careful and constructive force can deliver.

I believe that we were right to deploy and I hope that in years to come—perhaps in only a year—we shall see significant benefits. Our troops can see them now; let us acknowledge that fact.

5.59 pm

Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood) (Lab): I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) that our debates on Iraq put a terribly optimistic gloss on the situation in that country—an interpretation that is quite different from what we hear at public meetings and in discussions with groups of citizens all over our country. People are extremely worried about the situation in Iraq; they understand that things are deteriorating and becoming more violent and that insurgency is spreading to the south and will endanger our troops. Yet, in this place, the discussion is complacent, as though we are talking about a few local difficulties and if we carry on as we are everything will be all right.

That is deeply worrying, because the situation is getting worse, and it is not all right. We need a responsible exit strategy in the interests of our troops and the people of Iraq.

I must say that the way in which the Secretary of State for Defence dealt with the question about the failure to make any calculations concerning the number of Iraqi civilian deaths was disgraceful. As everybody who takes a responsible view of these matters knows, Iraq Body Count is trying to make such an estimate and is looking at more than one published source to try to reach an accurate figure. Its estimate—it recognises that it cannot be totally accurate—is that as many as 11,000 Iraqi civilians have lost their lives, and the numbers go on rising. On top of that, 6,000 to 8,000 Iraqi soldiers died in the war, and many of them were young conscripts. More than 700 United States troops and civilian workers who worked in their support have died, as have 67 UK troops, including some civilians who were working in their support.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): Does the right hon. Lady agree that the Secretary of State mischievously confused two things—making an assessment of Iraqi casualties, and making an assessment of Iraqi casualties in circumstances in which British officers would be put at risk? They are two quite different things, and not doing one is not a case for not doing the other.

Clare Short: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. To say that we can only go in to count the casualties after we have escaped from danger is to make a joke out of a very serious matter. The truth is that, when our political leaders speak, they too often express more distress when the person killed is from our armed forces, or an ally, appearing to belittle the loss of life among Iraqi civilians. That is quite wrong and very dangerous. The failure to count the number of civilian deaths is part of that. Obviously, it is possible to see how many people went to hospital, how many people lost their lives and how many people were buried. It is possible to make estimates which, while they would not be entirely accurate, would suggest that we were taking the situation seriously.

There is another aspect of the debate in the Chamber, but not in the country, that I find enormously worrying. In the country, there is an intense political mood and more interest in debating politics than I have seen for a very long time, but there is derision about Westminster. People are buying political books, having political discussions and attending meetings while despising what goes on in this Chamber. We in this Chamber should look at ourselves and listen more carefully to what people out in the country are saying.

Hon. Members repeatedly say that we must not turn away from the Iraqi people and go when the job is half done. But what are the Iraqi people telling us? They are making their views clear in poll after poll conducted by responsible American organisations. I should have thought that any poll taken in Iraq would have an urban bias and would not reflect the views of the poor who are not on the phone. The polls show that, while the overwhelming majority of people are glad that Saddam Hussein has gone, they think that the situation in their daily lives is worse than it was when he was there. We should be shamed by that and take it seriously, because that is what the Iraqi people are telling us. They are also now saying—it is a change in their position—that they want the coalition to leave immediately. That is what they say in response to polling undertaken by responsible American organisations. It is a little odd for Members of this place to say that we must behave responsibly towards the Iraqi people and stay when the people of Iraq say that they would like us to go. I do not mean that we should just walk away and leave chaos behind, but we should look for a rapid exit strategy. That is what the Iraqi people want us to do, and it is what we should do.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes): those of us who had strong views about the rush to war should not say that we have been vindicated by the mess that there is now in Iraq. We have to go forward from the situation we are in. In response to the cheap remarks from the shadow Foreign Secretary, let me say that although, as everyone knows, I was very critical of the rush to war, like the Liberal Democrats' spokesman on defence I was not against the threat of the use of force. I thought that it was necessary to threaten the use of force and to be willing to contemplate using it to back up the authority of the United Nations. However, under the doctrine of just war—both the legal teaching and the Christian teaching, which is very like Islamic teaching—we should have exhausted all other means. We did not exhaust all other means, so I was prepared to leave the Government. I said that I would leave the Government, but I was persuaded by the Prime Minister—he pleaded with me—to stay, in order to help with the reconstruction. We reached an agreement on the basis of three things.

The first of those things was publication of the road map, and the Prime Minister used the threat of resignations to get the road map published. We now know that the process was not sincere, but the position looked more hopeful at the time. I was also promised a UN mandate for reconstruction and that we would internationalise reconstruction. I left the Government when those promises were broken. I make the point now not so that I can talk about my position, but to make the House face the reasons for our difficulties with the UN's authority in Iraq.

The difficulties did not arise because the UN failed. When hon. Members talk of the UN failing because members of the Security Council cannot reach agreement, they distort reality. The UN Security Council is an instrument of its members and it cannot make decisions if its members will not come together and agree internationally on how to move forward.

The UN was ready and had made preparations to take the lead in helping the Iraqi people create an interim Government, as it had helped in Afghanistan, Mozambique, East Timor and Kosovo. That is the international system for post-conflict situations. However, the United States was not willing to give the UN the authority that it normally has—as, for example, in Afghanistan—in selecting the Iraqi interim Government. The UN was put in a subservient position, and the Security Council did not want another row because the UN's authority was already being diminished. The Security Council allowed the US to have another resolution, but it was told that it would not have international support on that basis.

The lesson is that there must be a sincere commitment to giving the UN the proper authority. Then we should say that we will leave as soon as possible, and whenever a legitimate Iraqi Government ask that of us. Under the auspices of the UN, we should be replaced in Iraq by international forces who will come in under a proper mandate. The Pakistanis have made it clear that they would accept that, and the Spanish withdrew because there was not a proper UN mandate.

We need a responsible exit strategy for the sake of the people of Iraq and for the sake of our soldiers. Instead of that strategy, what we have is vague talk about a "vital role" for the UN. Those words were given to us after President Bush visited Hillsborough, but meant nothing because we had a UN resolution for post-conflict Iraq that put the UN in a subservient position. Poor old Sergio Vieira de Mello went in against his better instincts to take on the role and lost his life.

We must mean it when we say that we will give the coalition's authority away, and we must make it clear that we want to leave. The Iraqis do not believe that that is our wish. They have read the work of the Project for the New American Century and seen that, before they took office, senior figures in the Bush Administration wanted permanent bases in Iraq. The situation is serious and deteriorating and our Government are not putting forward a responsible exit strategy. If we fail to get out and the quagmire gets ever worse, we will rue the day.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): I have three reflections to make on the debate.

It is helpful to consider how this all started. In the second or third debate after 11 September, I remember getting very angry because Conservative Members were then suggesting that we should perhaps attack other countries rather than just going into Afghanistan. I said at the time that an invasion of Iraq would be wrong. However, support for broadening the scope of the attacks came from more than just the odd Conservative Back Bencher. Conservatives launched a broad attack on the Government, saying that they were not doing a proper job because they were not backing America—not fully behind Uncle Sam. They argued that we should support Uncle Sam whatever he wanted to do. If the Government made the mistake of thinking that they would easily persuade the House of the case for a war in Iraq, they did so because they were not just helped but pushed into taking that stance by the official Opposition.

The Secretary of State for Defence spoke at length about contractors and gave a long list of all the good works—much good work has certainly taken place—and projects that have been completed.

I noticed one significant omission—the electricity supply—which surprised me. The oil supply was not mentioned, either. I was part of the armed forces parliamentary group that visited Basra a year ago. We saw at first hand how important it was to get the electricity supply up and running. It is not simply a case of providing electricity so that people can turn on lights and watch television. Electricity is not an optional extra for Iraqis; it is an essential. The water is not necessarily safe to drink and has to be boiled, which is generally done on an electric ring. Without electricity, the Iraqis have to scavenge timber, which we saw when we were there, so that they can make a fire to boil the water so that it is safe. They were so desperate to find wood that they went to the munitions stores and emptied mortar shells out of wooden boxes and on to the ground so that they could have the wood to boil their water.

I hope that, in his response, the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs will remedy that omission and give us a full detailed briefing on the electricity supply. In particular, perhaps he can tell us what repairs have been undertaken, and to which power stations. The one thing that puzzled me when we were there was that no work was being done on the power stations, which were designed and constructed by the Russians. Surely we could have said to the Russians, "Why don't you come and help repair the power stations? You've got the parts. It's all your technology. You can get them up and running fast."

When we left the country, the contracts had not been let. Indeed, I do not think they were let until the end of last year. It will be interesting to know how many of the power stations are up and running. To complicate matters, the Russian design is complex. It is based on interlinked power stations and it only takes one of them to be down to have a knock-on effect on the others. So getting just one up and running is not enough. They all have to be got working to an extent to guarantee the electricity supply.

Why was there a delay in granting those contracts? Perhaps one of our problems is that we have lost the peace and have spent a long time trying to put in the resources necessary to build the infrastructure. There is a lack of planning. Last September, we asked Ministers from the Department for International Development about the number of police who were in Iraq to help. At that time, I think we had managed to send two police officers out to help build up the police force. Even though that is now being done, the fact is that valuable time was wasted—yet we wonder why we are struggling with the peace today.

We have heard much about the abuse of prisoners. What is remarkable about the Secretary of State's remarks earlier today; about the response by the Minister of State to questions asked by myself and others last Thursday; about the Prime Minister's response to a question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) on Wednesday; and about the debate at the beginning of last week is that whenever the abuse of prisoners is raised, Ministers' reply is, "We knew all about it. It's okay. We didn't need to see the report. It was all being dealt with." The questions are not simply about what is happening in the British-controlled area, but about what the Government knew about the abuses carried out by the Americans. Perhaps the Under-Secretary can categorically tell us when the Government were advised of abuses by American forces in their detention centres. When the Government became aware of those abuses, what did they do? The Minister of State said:

"We are each concerned about what the other does in those circumstances".—[Official Report, 13 May 2004; Vol. 421, c. 51.]

We heard the "we" word from the Secretary of State: "We are doing this, we are doing that, jointly, as the coalition."

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that a coalition is occupying Iraq and has command? There is an administrator and a British deputy administrator, both of whom apparently did or did not see, and did or did not read, the report by the International Committee of the Red Cross.

Richard Younger-Ross: Yes, it is a coalition. That is why the Secretary of State used the "we" word. In the light of that, why did the Minister of State say that he would not respond to questions on what the British knew about the American abuses? If we knew about those and the Minister is concerned, as he stated in Hansard he was, how were those concerns expressed to the Americans? Was there a memo? Was there a telephone call in which someone said, "George, what's going on? There's something wrong. Can you let us know?" Perhaps the Under-Secretary will advise us on that.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): May I have this opportunity to talk quietly on one subject to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs? It is about America. There are two Americas, whatever the Foreign Secretary said, and the view of one on this subject is very different from the view of the other. I spent the past 16 days not in Washington, which is a sort of cauldron, but in the middle west, in Kentucky, Missouri and Kansas, where there has been a tectonic shift—I think that that is the expression—in opinion. I do not know what information the Foreign Office is getting from its embassy in Washington, although the ambassador was one of the architects of the policy on Iraq, but there is a striking change of opinion in the middle west. It is not only the American dead who are coming back, but a massive number of those who have been wounded, either severely or not so severely, and who have possibly been saved by the skills of modern medicine, whereas in previous wars they would have died. The numbers are significant.

There is also growing and massive discontent in the United States about those who have been sent to Iraq who are members not of the regular forces, but of the national guard. They never thought that they would see service outside Oklahoma, Nevada or wherever. Those people—untrained—are being sent into the blistering heat and difficult, edgy conditions. Those of us who have been in the services can imagine what it must be like, and my heart goes out to the troops.

Much has been said about how we should stay the course. I just wonder whether the Americans will stay the course. I do not normally quote from newspapers in the House, but on the plane coming back I saw the Saturday leader in The New York Times. Under the headline "America Adrift in Iraq", it states:

"Six weeks of military and political reverses seem to have left the Bush administration doing little more in Iraq than grasping at ways to make it past November's presidential election without getting American troops caught in a civil war. The lowering of the administration's expectations might be therapeutic if it produced a realistic strategy for achieving a realistic set of goals. Unfortunately, there appears to be no such strategy, only odd lurches this way and that under the pressure of day-to-day events."

Many others in the United States are far more critical than we in Britain have seen them to be. They have watched interrogations by Senator Kennedy and Senator Carl Levin. One gets the feeling in the United States that they are not going to last the course.

[Mr. Tam Dalyell]

It is my candid view that we must get out as soon as possible. If I am asked by the Government Chief Whip or anyone else why I am voting for the Liberal Democrat motion, it is simply because I listened carefully to every speech in the debate.

Sir Brian Mawhinney (North-West Cambridgeshire) (Con): It is a matter of record that I am one of only two Members who has served in Northern Ireland as a Minister for over six years. During that time, particularly when I was the Minister responsible for security, I had the opportunity to observe closely the work of the British Army, and I yield to none in my admiration for the work that they do. I saw them when they were fighting, and I saw them relating to local people who did not want them to be there.

I say that by way of background to the two points that I want to make. I stand in this debate as someone who has become very confused. I take comfort from the fact that I am probably a pretty good representative of the people in that regard. I want to pinpoint two confusions, both of a fundamental nature, because until they are resolved it is difficult to envisage the nation gathering together around a policy.

The first confusion is that we are now being told that we went into Iraq to get rid of a bad man. There is no debate about the fact that Saddam Hussein is a very, very, very bad man, so to the extent that that is true, there is some substance to the statement. Yet I do not ever remember a debate in the House in which we were asked, "If we are going to go to war to get rid of a bad man, who votes for Saddam Hussein, and who else might we consider having a go at?" My personal view is that, had there been such a debate, Robert Mugabe would have been pretty high on the list, but there was no such debate. So to be told now that what we are really doing in Iraq is getting rid of a bad man adds a layer of confusion to public opinion, but the Government do not appear to understand the confusion that they are creating.

Dr. Pugh: Adding to the confusion, though, must be the right hon. Gentleman's Front-Bench colleagues. I recall the shadow Foreign Secretary saying, in effect, that if we had not taken out Saddam Hussein this year we would have had to do so another year. That did not seem to be predicated on whether he had weapons of mass destruction; it seemed to insinuate that, since he was Saddam Hussein, at some time we would invade Iraq.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: It may well be that at some point we would have had to invade Iraq; that is not the debate. I do not have a crystal ball, and the Liberal Democrats are the last people to whom I would turn for one. I am talking about how we got where we are today, and why there is a mood of unease in my constituency and in the country more widely. None of that, and nothing that I am saying, undermines the support that my party has given to the Government on this issue. However, if the reason for going to war in Iraq is changed, without an explanation that the people can understand and identify with, the consequence is confusion.

There is another confusion. My clear understanding is that one of the fundamental reasons for our going to Iraq is the fact that we, and the world, were threatened by weapons of mass destruction. There are many people who would like to move the discussion beyond that point, but I have to tell the House that I have not yet been able to get beyond that point. There is no debate about the fact that the Government said that weapons of mass destruction were at the heart of the policy decision, which I supported. I make no apology for doing so, and in the same circumstances, were they to be repeated, I would make the same decision. I will tell the House what was one of the key factors in my thinking.

My Prime Minister and my Foreign Secretary—I do not mean by that that I support them, but particularly in the context of war and peace they are my Prime Minister and my Foreign Secretary—two of the most senior Privy Councillors in the land, stood at the Dispatch Box and told me, a reasonably senior Privy Councillor, that we needed to go to war because of weapons of mass destruction. I am confused because I do not know how long I am supposed to give the Government before the argument based on weapons of mass destruction ceases to have any credibility whatever. I have put my case in careful terms because I am trying to give them as much of the benefit of the doubt as a senior Privy Councillor should give the Government in the context of war and peace.

I have shared that view with the House because I think that I am pretty normal. I think that I am a good representative of the British people at this time. The argument about weapons of mass destruction was made, and it is now being brushed under the carpet. A new argument is being made, and people are saying, "Excuse me, but that was never the basis on which we went into Iraq."

My party supported the Government. I say again that I believe it was right to do so and, in the same circumstances, I would vote again with the Government—and I believe that my party would. I am not trying to rewrite history; I am trying to get at why there is so much unrest and unhappiness in the country. Of course, it is in part because of the terrible attacks and the death and destruction, although I think that the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor) was absolutely right to point out that there is a lot of good news, which does not, as we both know, always mean newspaper news. Much is being done that is good and to the benefit of the local people, yet there is a problem.

I say to the Government that sooner or later they are going to have to come clean with the British people. I say it in those terms because, unless and until they do, they will have great difficulty in putting together broad-based support for whatever will constitute the exit strategy: the role of British troops, coalition troops and others in an Iraq where the power has been transferred. These are serious matters, and I agree with the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short) that, just occasionally, we in the House need to understand that if we talk in one framework and the rest of the country is talking in a different framework, almost as though we were in parallel universes, we do no service to the country and to our constituents. It is for that reason that I have tried to get to the heart of what I believe is causing a lot of the confusion in our country.

Mr. Robert Marshall-Andrews (Medway) (Lab): Those of us who opposed this conflict before March 2003 foresaw and foretold a number of things that were undoubtedly right. There were things that we did not prophesy.

We foresaw—and we were right—that there were no weapons of mass destruction. That did not require the gift of prophecy; there was no evidence that there were weapons of mass destruction. We foresaw that thousands of Iraqis would die and that hundreds of British and American troops would die with them. That, too, was not difficult. We foresaw, and warned, that there would be no proper planning for an evacuation of Iraq in a post-Saddam world, and for that too the gift of prophecy was not necessary.

What none of us foresaw was the state of Iraq now, a year after the invasion. None of us foresaw that, after a year, thousands of Iraqis would be in prison with no civil liberties, no rights to a judicial process and no access to advice, and without their parents, children and families being informed of their existence in those prisons.

We could not have foreseen that. I would not have prophesied it, because I would never have believed that it could happen during a British occupation.

Still less did we foresee that in those prisons there would be torture and abuse on a systematic scale. We did not foresee that naked men would be dragged by leashes and chains. We did not foresee that they would be chained to doors and beds and threatened with dogs. We did not foresee that our own prisoners would be hooded. None of that we foresaw. If we had said that that would happen, we would have been regarded—and I would have agreed—as ranting nonsense and attempting to stop a war by grossly overstating and overestimating the dangers. Yet all of that has come to pass, and it has come to pass on our watch.

There has been not one word of contrition in respect of what has happened on our watch. It was known to the Minister of State and to the Secretary of State for Defence for months. It was known that there were reports from the Red Cross. It was known that there was concern about the state of Abu Ghraib prison. Yet during all the accounts and the adulation of what happened in Iraq, nobody came to the House to tell Members that there was a problem that needed to be dealt with; nor has there been any explanation of the failure to do so.

Mr. Hoon: I have set out clearly and precisely when I first became aware of the Red Cross reports. I hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman is not challenging my word on that subject.

Mr. Marshall-Andrews: The Government were aware of the matter at least as early as February, and probably as early as September last year. I have attended every single debate on the subject—more, I think, than the Secretary of State has—and I cannot remember one single occasion when the House was made aware of the problems that were coming before the Government at the time. When we did hear an explanation, it was an extraordinary one: the documents that were provided did not contain the necessary number of words and clauses or have attached to them the necessary appendices to enable them to be treated as dossiers or reports—whatever that may mean.

In truth, no ministerial responsibility has been seen in this House. It is a sad thing to stand here and say that. What we have seen, however, and one of the most distasteful things that have come before the House, is the use of the British Army. I genuflect to nobody in my regard for soldiers, many of whom come from my constituency. I shall always have high regard for them, but one thing that I will never do if we are criticised is enlist that regard as some sort of defence or alibi for my own failings. It is high time that Ministers understood that there is no crisis of trust in the British Army or in British troops, but that there is a profound crisis of trust in British politicians, and the permanent adulatory use of British troops to deflect that is one of the most tasteless parts of this debate.

Of course there is, I am sorry to say, a pedigree for such behaviour. Many of us remember the occasion on which the right hon. Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Portillo) stood before a Tory party conference and rolled out the motto of the SAS. It was a deeply embarrassing moment, perhaps even for his own party. However, despite its pedigree, the practice should stop. Ministers need to answer without relying on the excellence of the forces who are there to do their bidding.

At the end of the day, responsibility is the word. The Secretary of State, the Minister of State and the Prime Minister have frequently taken credit for what has been done in the name of the coalition. They have taken credit for the successes of the Americans—credit for their military successes during the course of the war and credit for the manner in which they have set up administrations when they did so. Now, we must take responsibility collectively with them, because the world outside will never understand if we do not do so.

In free and democratic politics, there is only one way for those who lead to take responsibility. If they do as they should, the world will know that we in this House take our responsibilities seriously. That does not mean that Ministers knew, still less colluded, still less ordered, the torture of prisoners in jail. It means that they say, "When it happens on my watch, I take the responsibility for what has occurred." If they do that, it will send out a signal to the rest of the world, and it will do more than anything else can to remove the increasing threat to British forces from those who believe that we are synonymous with our American counterparts. If we take that responsibility, it will remove part of the shame that, as a result of the revelations, now sits upon the Government, the shame that sits upon this House and, one must unhappily acknowledge, the shame that sits upon our people.

Attempts are being made to relegate these events to a footnote. The mistreatment and torture of people in prison on our watch is not a footnote in history. Ministers cannot say to the House, "We accept that there has been systematic torture by coalition forces—but the water supply is getting better." Such a statement will be treated with the contempt that it deserves.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): The purpose of the motion standing in my name and those of my right hon. and hon. Friends is not to secure a re-run of the vote held on 18 March last year; rather, it is to urge hon. Members to focus on where we now find ourselves in Iraq and on the future. We have heard a dozen or so Back-Bench speeches on that issue, the two best coming at the end of the debate from the hon. and learned Member for Medway (Mr. Marshall-Andrews) and the right hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Sir Brian Mawhinney).

The continuing unrest in Iraq, which is fuelled by the likes of Moqtada al-Sadr and which we have seen in action just today, has been further inflamed by the pictures of abuse of Iraqi prisoners by United States forces and by some allegations against UK forces. There is little sign of the unrest abating. Only last week, the Secretary of State said:

"This weekend saw the most violence so far, with more than 100 engagements between violent insurgents and coalition forces."—[Official Report, 10 May 2004; Vol. 421, c. 21.]

Today's debate has given the House the opportunity to reflect on the current situation in Iraq and, more important, to determine what steps should be taken next. Once again, I am glad that it has been the Liberal Democrats who, in our time, have given the House of Commons a real opportunity to discuss the matter.

It is a sad fact that Iraq appears increasingly unstable. Liberal Democrats and Members of other parties warned a long time ago how enormously difficult it would be to restore stability to a post-war Iraq. War is a terrible business, which is why it must always be used only as a last resort. Not only does it put at risk the lives of our armed forces and innocent civilians, but it rips up the fabric of societies and breeds discontent and malice. The appalling images of abuse of Iraqis have added fuel to the fire and will add to the influx of terrorists to Iraq. In his speech of 18 March last year, the Prime Minister suggested that he wanted to break any link between Iraq and terrorism. He has certainly failed to do so. It is sadly apparent to us that Iraq is now more a home for the likes of al-Qaeda than ever it was before we went to war. Back in March last year, the Government were keen to link a potential war in Iraq with progress in the middle east peace process. It is interesting to see that their amendment today makes no reference to that.

But we are where we are. Having chosen the course of war, our duty now is twofold. First, we must ensure that the men and women of Her Majesty's armed forces, who serve with such credit and distinction in Iraq, are given the best possible protection and, secondly, we must try to offer stability, peace and sovereignty to the people of Iraq.

We have heard some good speeches in our debate, including that of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle). He was right to speak about weapons of mass destruction and remind the House of the casus belli, or the reason why we went to war last year. He pointed out the stupidity of the argument advanced by the Ministry of Defence that it cannot calculate the number of civilian deaths. He said that the MOD has objected to some of his questions; my hon. Friends, too, have experience of it refusing to answer their questions. His speech contrasted sharply with that of his right hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), who began by complaining about his lack of press coverage, went on to rubbish my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) and Senator Edward Kennedy in the same sentence and then misrepresented the views of his right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook).

We heard a very good speech from the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples), one of two Conservative Back Benchers to make a contribution. He rightly said that Iraq could have been a beacon in the middle east, and could have set an example for other nations. Sadly, however, it has not done so.

As usual, my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) made an impassioned speech, and spoke about the need for peace in the middle east. She said that when she canvasses on the doorstep people talk to her about Iraq. My party has been criticised for treating Iraq as an election issue, but when I knock on doors I discover, as the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short) said, that Iraq is an issue that we are right to put before the British people; suggestions from Labour Back Benchers and even Conservative spokesmen that we should not do so in the forthcoming elections are ridiculous. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) talked about the proliferation of terrorists in Iraq.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Keetch: No, I will not.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) was right to talk about the body count. It is ridiculous of the Secretary of State for Defence to suggest that we are putting the lives of British forces on the line by trying to calculate how many civilians they may have killed. Such a calculation has been made in every other conflict, and to suggest that we and our hon. Friends on the Labour Back Benches are endangering the lives of our servicemen and women by seeking a figure is wrong. Speaking from his experience of Iraq, my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross) talked about the abuse of prisoners and the difference between the attitude of the American Department of Defence and that of the MOD. We may criticise the Department of Defence for many things, but since the photographs were published it has acted speedily. Secretary Rumsfeld went to the prison last week, and he also went to Congress to show lawmakers photographs of some of the abuses. In the United States, the first courts martial have begun. I wonder, however, what happened to the fusilier who came back from Iraq last year and tried to get photographs of Iraqi abuse printed in his local Boots. We have still not heard what happened to him, and do not know whether he has been court-martialled.

The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood spoke about the United Nations, about which we again heard two myths: first, that we went to war to support the wonderful UN resolutions, and the British and the Americans were champions of the UN; and, secondly, that the UN had failed in its duty. In reality, however, it was not the United Nations that set the timetable for war in Iraq but the United States and Britain. To try either to blame the UN or to suggest that we were protecting its role is ridiculous. Increasing the role of the UN, as suggested by the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), by internationalising the political and security processes in Iraq, and trying to ensure that our forces are associated not with war but with a future peace is the best way to achieve our goals. The pictures of the abuse of Iraqis do not help us, and I found them shocking and awful. Is that what the Americans meant when they talked of shock and awe?

In a recent newspaper article, the right hon. Member for Livingston said that the Prime Minister is in denial about Iraq. He was remarkably prescient, given the Government amendment, which is extraordinarily complacent and simply says, "Don't worry, everything is all right." It would be nice if we could believe that. I respect the British forces, who continue to serve on the ground with skill and determination. As we have said, if UK commanders on the ground seek support as a force protection measure, we will give it to them. However, we owe it to them to have an exit strategy and a plan for the future, as they are putting their lives on the line. We in the House simply pay lip service to that.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): We have had a constructive debate but, to be honest, I do not think that anyone has changed their view about whether it was right or wrong to go to war. Nevertheless, it is important that, whatever our view, we focus all our efforts on how we can rebuild Iraq, build on the elimination of the Saddam regime and create a stable and democratic state, as we have a legal and moral obligation to do so.

First, however, I wish to reiterate a view shared across the House and express our deepest condolences about the death of Mr. Izz al-Din Salim, the acting president of the Iraqi governing council, and head of the Islamic Dawa party. He will, I am sure, be sorely missed.

I should also like to take the opportunity to pay tribute to our armed forces. I am confident that everyone will join me in saying that we can be immensely proud of the job that our armed forces are doing. We have all been conscious in recent weeks of the allegations of abuse by coalition forces in Iraq. The photographs of British troops that appeared in the Daily Mirror have been shown to be fakes. I welcome the fact that the Daily Mirror has admitted it was wrong to publish the photographs. However, allegations of instances of abuse remain, and are being investigated. As my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for Defence stated earlier, when an allegation is made against British troops, action is taken immediately. That decision that does not need to be referred to Ministers or made by them.

The Liberal Democrats called for the role of the United Nations to be expanded and enhanced, a view with which we fundamentally agree.

Jeremy Corbyn: Before my hon. Friend moves from the treatment of prisoners, will he assure the House that the deaths in custody in the area under British administration are the subject of a thorough investigation that will be publicly reported? Does he accept that, as a coalition of forces is occupying Iraq, the joint administration in Baghdad bears some responsibility for what has happened in the American sector as well as the British sector?

Mr. Rammell: It is critical that all instances of abuse, wherever they occur, are thoroughly investigated, and we are committed to doing so. I can assure my hon. Friend that instances of abuse in the British sector are being actively and thoroughly investigated at the moment.

We fundamentally agree with the Liberal Democrats' argument about the need for a greater role for the United Nations. It is a fact, little reported at present, that there is a consensus in which the UN, the Iraqi governing council and the coalition provisional authority all agree that the UN should take a more substantive role once the occupation formally ends on 30 June. We are strongly pushing for that in the United Nations. As Kofi Annan and the Prime Minister recently made clear, we want a new Security Council resolution marking the end of the occupation and the handover to a fully sovereign Iraqi Government.

Clare Short rose—

Mr. Rammell: I will give way briefly to my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Clare Short), but there are a host of issues to which I must respond.

Clare Short: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Can it be the end of occupation when there will be an interim Government selected by the UN—I accept that that is progress—without either authority over the coalition forces, the Iraqi police and military or the right to change economic decisions that have been made? Is that really a handover and an end of occupation?

Mr. Rammell: My right hon. Friend is wrong. The exact arrangements for coalition forces in relation to the caretaker interim Government will be determined in the resolution, which, I believe, will be submitted to the Security Council in the near future. I hope that that provides her with reassurance.

The discussions on the interim Government are proceeding successfully, with Mr. Brahimi indicating that its full structure and officials will be announced by the end of May. I have a problem with people who argue for a greater UN role, but then criticise the timetable for elections as being too slow.

The UN itself and Mr. Brahimi himself have made it clear that they believe that the present electoral timetable is correct and, bluntly, the only realistic one in the present circumstances, and it is important that we go forward with that view.

Let me turn to some of the issues raised during the debate. I was interested and intrigued to listen to the arguments of the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. Keetch). In summing up the debate, he made it explicitly clear that the Liberal Democrats are seeking to use the war as an electoral issue in the forthcoming elections. In that regard, I am indebted to Conservative Members for reminding me that the leader of the Liberal party recently made clear his intention not to use that issue during the forthcoming campaign. No one should be surprised at such discontinuity between different members of the Liberal Opposition.

Dr. Julian Lewis: I can confirm that the leader of the Liberal Democrats made that commitment on the "Politics Show" on 9 May, which only goes to show that a week is a very long time in politics, especially if one is a Liberal Democrat.

Mr. Rammell: I wholly concur with that view.

Let me turn to the views put forward in introducing the debate by the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell). On 18 March last year, he said that we went to war on both a threat and a promise. There has been much rewriting of history in the past year by the opponents of war—[Interruption.] It is important to remember that we went to war because Saddam Hussein did not comply with resolution 1441, which gave him a last chance to disarm and comply with successive UN resolutions. It is important to remember as well that, if we had not taken that decision, Saddam would have been reinforced and reinvigorated, and whatever difficulties we face at the moment would have been significantly worse.

Mr. Marshall-Andrews: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Rammell: No, I will not give way. [Interruption.] I am short of time, and I need to respond to a host of Members.

The right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife went on to argue explicitly for the phased withdrawal of troops from the date of the elections in January 2005, regardless of the security situation or the wishes of the elected Iraqi Government. I do not believe that, in those circumstances, that would be the right or responsible thing to do.

Sir Menzies Campbell: Will the hon. Gentleman take account of the wishes of the British people, the majority of whom would like the withdrawal of troops now?

Mr. Rammell: Of course we respond to the wishes of British people, but we also have to give a lead in this situation. With respect to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, his speech was extraordinarily long on critique, but short on substantive alternatives to the argument and course that we propose at the moment. I was very mystified by his argument when he said that arrangements similar to those put in place at the end of Gulf war one were needed. I presume that he was referring to the surrender document that was agreed at that stage, but there is no comparison whatsoever between the situation now and then.

Sir Menzies Campbell: Let me help the Minister with his mystification. I was suggesting that there should have been a resolution to authorise the use of force in the same terms as was required in Gulf war one. That would have required the coalition to report back to the Security Council, under the supervision of the Security Council.

Mr. Rammell: We could have an historical debate for as long as we like, but I believe that we were right to do what we did; the right hon. and learned Gentleman believes that we were wrong. However, the key point is what we do in the current circumstances, and I heard not one substantive argument from him about a substantive, alternative course of action.

Let me now turn to the arguments of the shadow Foreign Secretary. I wholly agree with him that, if the Liberal Democrats had had their way, Saddam Hussein would still be in place, murdering, terrorising and torturing his people. The right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) also raised the important point about the discovery of sarin artillery munitions and asked for a response in the summing-up speech, and I shall try to respond to him.

General Kimmitt announced today that the Iraq survey group has found a 155 mm artillery round containing sarin. It was rigged as an improvised explosive device and discovered by a US convoy. The following points seem clear: it is thought to be an old munition; those who planted it may not have known what it contained; and preliminary field testing of the substance proved positive for sarin and further samples have been sent for analysis. It does not represent a new capability, but it does appear to be part of a programme declared to the UN. However, the munition should have been handed over to UNSCOM and destroyed. It therefore appears to be in breach of UN Security Council resolutions, and it, significantly, appears to back up what we have been saying all along: Saddam concealed some of his stock. That point needs to be made.

The shadow Foreign Secretary also asked for reassurance and confirmation that all and every part of coalition detention facilities are, and will remain, open to ICRC inspection, and I can confirm that that is the case.

The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) made an interesting contribution, and I strongly support his argument that we should not abandon Iraq now. As he argued, if we did so, that move would dismay the forces of democracy and progress in the region and give succour to extremist forces throughout the world. That is the reality of the situation that we face.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche) expressed her justified concerns about allegations of abuse of prisoners by the US military. Let me be clear and let me repeat the words that the Foreign Secretary used on the issue last week. The allegations and clear evidence of abuse in the US sector are very damaging. There is no question about that, nor should there be any pretence to the contrary. We should be clear, as President Bush has asserted, that in no sense were those actions supported or connived at by the US Administration, who are as appalled by the evidence as we are. That is the important point to make, and it responds to some of my hon. Friend's concerns.

The hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge) gave a speech that was long on moral indignation, but, again, short on substantive alternatives in respect of the actions that we should take. Again, she repeated the 45-minute claim, as though that was the key issue that determined our decision to go to war. It was not: it was not mentioned once in the key debate on 18 March 2003, when we took that decision. The reason we went to war was based on Saddam Hussein's failure to comply with resolution 1441.

The hon. Lady went on to say—this is a significant point—that, because of the allegations of abuse, we have no moral authority in any of the arguments whatsoever, and I think that she was referring to the Government and the country as a whole. I ask her to reflect on those comments and consider whether she really means to make that point. Surely, when allegations of abuse occur, the key difference is the way in which we respond. The allegations are serious, and we deal with them in the strongest possible terms. In no sense do I want to minimise those concerns, however, by making it clear that, of course, brutality, torture and the abuse of human rights formed the very mission statement of Saddam's regime, and there was never any condemnation or investigation in those circumstances. That is the key difference, and it is why we retain moral authority in these issues.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) made a very telling contribution. He attacked caricature positions on both sides of the argument. He rightly said that we need to respond to the changing situation. He attacked those who opposed the war, who use every setback simply as a justification for their opposition and their original decision to oppose the war, but, similarly, he stressed that those of us who supported the war need to respond to the changing situation, not blithely dismiss criticism. That argument is indeed well founded.

In reaching a conclusion, it is clear to me that the decision to go to war remains extraordinarily divisive, but those of us who supported military action did so with every bit as much integrity and conviction as those who opposed the conflict. That point is too often forgotten in the debates that we have at the moment. However, whatever view any of us took, the critically important challenge now is to secure the future of Iraq and all its people. I fundamentally believe that we are at a crucial and critical juncture.

The attacks by insurgents will continue as we approach the end of the occupation and the transfer of power on 30 June. The attacks will continue because the insurgents do not want a free Iraq run by the Iraqis.

Our task, with the UN and the whole international community, is to see the challenge through. We need greater UN involvement—that is what we are arguing for. We need more Iraqis to take on policing and security roles—we are advocating that. We need a continuing British troop presence, but a clear commitment that we will leave as soon as it is safe to do so. That is our commitment. Above all, we need to hold our nerve and follow through on the commitments we have made. To cut and run at this stage, as some have suggested, would be a gross betrayal of the people of Iraq. It would also, significantly, be wholly lacking in political credibility. That is why we will not do it, and why I urge hon. Members to support the amendment and oppose the motion.

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Fraser Kemp and Vernon Coaker

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the work being done by the UK and its Coalition partners to establish stability and security in Iraq; regards any mistreatment of Iraqis by Coalition forces to be unacceptable; recognises the bravery and professionalism of British forces in Iraq in assisting the Iraqi people in rebuilding Iraq; applauds the work of the UN Secretary-General's special adviser, Lakhdar Brahimi, for his contribution to helping establish a sovereign Iraqi Interim Government which will assume power by 30th June; and supports the Government in its efforts to secure a new Security Council resolution and deliver the wishes of the Iraqi people for a sovereign, stable and democratic Iraq.'.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): I beg to move,

That this House notes that council tax has risen by 70 per cent. since Labour came to power and that the Budget Red Book forecasts a rise in council tax receipts next year of over 7 per cent; further notes that these rises are hitting particularly hard those on low and modest incomes because of the way council tax was designed by the last Conservative Government; is concerned that this manifest unfairness of council tax now means that the poorest 10 per cent. of people pay over four times more of their income in council tax than the richest 10 per cent; notes that the whole system of local government finance needs major reform owing to the problems caused by the dependency of councils on central government grants that produces the gearing effect whereby on average councils must raise council tax by 4 per cent. to offset a grant reduction of one per cent; believes that the Labour Government have made the bad situation they inherited from the Conservative Government even worse by their excessive reliance on ring-fencing, passporting and centrally-imposed targets and regulations; and therefore calls on the Government's Balance of Funding Review to make far-reaching proposals for reform when it reports shortly, including the introduction of a local income tax to replace council tax, the return of business rates to local authorities, reformed in line with land values, and a radical reduction in central government interference.

The high rises in council tax and the unfairness of council tax are issues that have rightly been raised in the House many times in recent years, not least by the Liberal Democrats. Yet the size of the rises in council tax and the extent of the unfairness in the council tax system suggest that we are right to raise these issues again, and to continue raising them until something is done to deal with the problem.

The House will be aware that the Liberal Democrats have published detailed proposals for our alternative, and those are outlined once again in our motion today. Later in my speech I will set out our alternative to the unfairness of council tax.

Mrs. Annette L. Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): What would my hon. Friend say to accusations in Conservative leaflets that a local income tax will cost the average household considerably more?

Mr. Davey: The problem with the Conservative leaflets, of which I have seen a few, is that they assume that the average household is earning an income of nearly £50,000, when the actual Government figures show that the average household income is nearer £22,000. That shows that the Conservatives live in a rather different world from the rest of us—and, indeed, from their own constituents.

I want today to focus on the wider context of the problem of council tax—the local government finance system in its entirety—and that is why we have worded the motion in the way that we have. It is timely to do that because just over a year ago the Government set up the balance of funding review, which was tasked with considering many crucial aspects of the whole system of funding councils. I think that it is scheduled to complete its task and report to Ministers in July and, I hope, report back to the House before the recess. I should be grateful if the Minister would confirm later that that is what is planned. This debate gives Parliament a real chance to make a serious contribution to that balance of funding review before it concludes and reports back.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that it is the intention to charge the south-east more? Will he further confirm that my constituents on the average earnings that they earn will be a lot worse off, and is not this really a rip-off tax from a spendthrift party?

Mr. Davey: That was very predictable, except that I was talking not about local income tax, but about the balance of funding review. Obviously, the right hon. Gentleman was not listening for a change. I gave the answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke) a minute ago, and he clearly was not listening even then.

We need to start by acknowledging that the balance of funding review is dealing with some of the most complex and difficult problems in public expenditure, although its core question can be expressed quite simply, and I want to do that now. In essence, the balance of funding review is asking how much of the budget that a council spends should be raised locally and how much should be met from Government grant, and, at the extremes, whether councils should raise all their money locally or whether it should all come from Government grant. Put like that, I think that most hon. Members could readily see the arguments against 100 per cent. locally raised budgets or 100 per cent. centrally financed budgets.

If it were all done locally, the equity problems would be huge, with poor areas being badly affected because they would be unable to raise the funds they need for vital services. Most people acknowledge the need for some central Government grant to equalise and redistribute resources to poor areas, and therefore reject 100 per cent. locally raised budgets, and my party takes that view.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): One tier of the council structure, parish councils and town councils, raises 100 per cent. of its spending. How would that tax be levied under a local income tax so that the people living in those parishes or towns pay for the services that they receive?

Mr. Davey: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's intervention on that point. We have examined low levels of government in other countries equivalent to town and parish councils, and they use a local income tax system. The issue is whether the Treasury can estimate the income tax base. I accept that it is impossible to estimate that figure from information currently held by the Inland Revenue, such as the personal survey of incomes, but that is because no Government have ever tried to introduce local income tax. That information is, however, available in countries where local income tax has been introduced.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): The previous Government had to get rid of the poll tax following the Ribble Valley by-election, and Michael Heseltine had quickly to introduce a replacement scheme, which he rightly described as "seriously flawed". It is important that we allow the balance of funding review to complete its examination of the position, because unless we correctly balance national and local funding, any replacement system will have serious flaws and problems. We must not rush into a new system, only to find in five to 10 years' time that it is equally appalling, and the scheme proposed by the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) would prove to be exactly that.

Mr. Davey: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's intervention. When Lord Heseltine introduced council tax, a BBC journalist asked him why he did not support local income tax. He looked at the camera and said, "That is the Liberal Democrats' policy." In other words, he had no strong argument against it. [Interruption.] I watched that interview with relish.

The point of this debate is to give us a chance to contribute to the balance of funding review. We have made submissions to the Government, who, we believe, are right to carry out the review. We also welcome the way in which they have gone about the review. They have taken a year to gather evidence, receive submissions and commission papers. For example, the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy examined local income tax, which it thought was a good idea. I welcome the balance of funding review, but I do not see why the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) is concerned by the debate, which is about getting the matter right.

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davey: No, I want to press on and make some progress.

The balance of funding review is important to today's debate. If local councils raised none of their own finance, which is another option, it would create huge accountability problems, and local democracy would be severely undermined. If 100 per cent. of council funding came from central Government, as some hon. Members argue, it would mark the end of meaningful local democracy. If we reject the extremes of raising all funding locally or of raising all funding nationally, where should the balance lie?

On average, a council currently raises 25 per cent. of its budget locally and gets 75 per cent. of its income from central Government. Many hon. Members believe that the balance of funding is wrong and that it must be addressed urgently—I hope that the Government address the matter in the review. However, we do not know whether they think that the balance of funding is a major problem, and part of the review's remit is to decide whether the 75:25 split is a problem.

The first message that I want to get over to the Government in this debate is that the balance of funding causes serious problems. The Minister should not listen to those who argue that the current balance of funding is an advantage—some Conservative Members advance that argument—or to those who argue that the problems can be fixed without altering the balance of funding. Specifically, the current balance of funding causes three serious problems that cannot be brushed aside. The first problem is the well-known gearing effect, which relates to the second problem, accountability. The third problem, which is often ignored, is the effect on the health of local democracy and local government that comes from the imbalance in funding.

The gearing effect is perhaps the most alarming problem for council tax payers because, as the Audit Commission reported last December, it is a major contributor to some high council tax rises. At its most simple, the gearing effect means that for every 1 per cent. increase in a council's budget, on average that council must increase council tax by 4 per cent. Average council tax rises in 2003–04 were 12.9 per cent., but councils actually increased spending over and above what the Government said that they should spend by an average of only 1.9 per cent. However, the gearing effect translated those increases into an average council tax rise of 7.6 per cent., which completely distorted the picture. That issue directly results from the balance of funding.

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) (Con): The important point is not who pays 75 per cent. and who pays 25 per cent, but how much the individual pays—apart from the Liberal Democrats, nobody cares how the calculation is worked out. The Liberal Democrats have increased council tax in Torbay by 10.1 per cent., but they blame everyone else. The problem is that too many laws made in this place go down to local authorities, which have to carry them out but cannot afford to do so. If we passed fewer laws here, council tax would not be so high. If the Liberal Democrats got their way, people would pay more but would not get better services, so I do not understand what the hon. Gentleman is talking about.

Mr. Davey: I am not surprised. I agree that we pass too many laws in this place and that the burdens that we place on councils are too heavy. The idea that that is the complete explanation for council tax rises, however, is nonsense. If the hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) listens, he will learn that the Audit Commission, not the Liberal Democrats, blames the gearing effect, which I am discussing, for some high council tax rises.

There are three possible solutions to the gearing effect. First, revenue raised locally could be increased by, for example, re-localising business rates, and I shall return to that approach because we favour it. A second solution is to cut local government responsibilities and centralise a major spending area such as education. We understand that No. 10 Downing street has considered that solution, but I was glad to hear reports from the Minister for Local and Regional Government that that will not happen, and I hope that he will reconfirm that the Government are not examining the centralisation of a major spending area such as education.

A third solution—a technical change to the grant system—is touted in the Government review. Rather than grant allocations being fixed at the time of the local government grant settlement, the idea is that the allocations become variable, which happened in the 1970s and part of the 1980s. Broadly speaking, the solution works like this: if a council raises its budget by, for example, 3 per cent., its council tax should go up by only 3 per cent., and any difference required because of the gearing effect should come directly from extra central Government grants.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Higher taxes.

Mr. Davey: I urge the hon. Gentleman to listen, because the proposal is not ours. The proposal has been put to the balance of funding review and I am trying to knock it down because it is a bad idea. It would allow variable increases in grant, which could dispose of the gearing problem in one move, but it would create its own problems. For a start, it would lead to huge uncertainties, which is a problem that the Conservative Government experienced when it tried to operate such a system in the early 1980s, because final grant allocations for a specific year would not be decided for months, even years.

Above all, variable grant allocations would create perverse incentives. Much of the money for a new project or dollop of spending—indeed, any marginal increase in a council's budget—would effectively come from central Government, which would lead to higher tax bills overall.

Many councils would perceive an advantage in setting higher council tax as it could be argued to the electorate that that would mean extra central Government subvention of two, three, four or even five times the amount for which the council tax payer was being asked. I therefore hope that while that technical solution might appear preferable and neat, the Government will reject it. I believe that that will be the case, given the nods and shaking of heads from the Front Bench. I welcome that.

The Minister for Local and Regional Government (Mr. Nick Raynsford): Let me put the hon. Gentleman out of his agony. I assure him that we considered the matter approximately a year ago and it held no attraction for, and found no support from, the balance of funding review team. He is tilting at a false windmill.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): One down, two to go.

Mr. Davey: My hon. Friend is right and I am glad about it. The purpose of the debate is to try to tease out the Government's position on balance of funding. It is important for those who will vote in the June elections.

Another problem with the imbalance of funding is that it distorts local accountability. Changes in the local council tax bill often have little or nothing to do with councillors' decisions. Of course, they do in some cases, but far too often they do not. Council tax rises are sometimes caused by factors that are completely out of the local council's control.

Mr. Swire: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's clarification and I am sure that he will reach the relevant points because he is on a voyage of discovery, not least after the Liberal Democrats won Brent, East with £100 vouchers, which have been scrapped. Does it remain Liberal Democrat policy that regional assemblies, were they established, would have tax-raising powers? Would they be in addition to the extra powers about which he is talking? If so, would not that add further distortion to the inequalities about which he is so worried?

Mr. Davey: The key point is that we would begin by getting rid of the council tax. There would therefore be no council tax precept, which the Government oppose for regional assemblies. Unless and until regional assemblies were elected, there would be no question of their having tax-raising powers. Unless and until central Government funds were given to local assemblies and national income tax was cut pound for pound, there could be no question of giving income-tax-raising powers to regional assemblies.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Davey: I want to make some progress. I was talking about accountability in local government. I thought that I was generous in answering the question of the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire), which had nothing to do with that.

I was trying to argue that small changes that have nothing to do with councillors can affect the council tax. A small change in the amount of grant from central Government can make a major difference. A small change in a council's cost base because of central Government targets could cause a major change. A small change in the demand pressure, for example, in social services could lead to a major change in council tax. Any such changes are magnified four times because of the gearing effect that we have already discussed. That means that accountability is utterly distorted.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): I suppose that some people—the hon. Gentleman may be one, but he has not made that clear thus far—believe that there should be a closer relationship between what people pay and the services that they get. That is perfectly proper. However, a local income tax would relate not to what people get, the quality of the services or their cost, but to their income. How does he square that with Liberal Democrat policy on hypothecating tax, which is mentioned many times in manifestos and elsewhere? Would we have regional taxes, local taxes and hypothecated national taxes?

Mr. Davey: I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman meant by his last point, but I am glad that he mentioned services and local taxes. Some people claim that local taxpayers should pay only for local services. People have in mind emptying the waste bins and clearing parks and streets. They forget that most local residents, I am pleased to say, do not use many services that local government provides—for example, social services and child protection. Does the hon. Gentleman suggest that because local residents do not use child protection services, those services should not be financed? Many services fall into that category. For example, pensioners do not use the schools. Does that mean that they should not contribute to them? That is nonsense and I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has given me a chance to put the theory to bed.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that his proposals for local income tax could increase gearing in several local authorities on the ground of the need for greater equalisation because of the differences in tax take in different parts of the country? Indeed, CIPFA said that the ratios in several local authorities would be greater. Does he accept that the proposals in his document and end-of-year reorganisation fall into the precise trap into which he suggests that the proposals in the review for ending gearing through technical changes fall? People would not know how much they were paying at the end of the year.

Mr. Davey: The hon. Gentleman is wrong on both points. On the first point, CIPFA assumed that the central Government grant would remain the same as a portion of the council's budget on average. However, local income tax creates a foundation for decentralising power to cut national income tax and reduce some central Government subventions. It enables national income tax to be cut penny for penny as local income tax increases. That reduces the gearing effect—that is the experience in many other countries.

Let me deal with the second point about the end-of-year collection mechanism, which is only one of two possible mechanisms for administering local income tax. That would enhance local accountability as people could see rebates or extra charges at the end of they year, before the local elections. The hon. Gentleman is therefore wrong on both counts.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Davey: I need to make some headway. I have given way several times and it is time for me to have a chance to get on with my speech.

I am trying to focus on the way in which the local voter holds the council to account in any meaningful way when the council tax bill may have nothing to do with councillors' actions. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's website on the balance of funding review shows that some people do not believe that accountability is a problem. They argue that the current balance of funding and the associated gearing effect enhances local accountability and they are trying to persuade Ministers not to worry about it. They believe that the gearing effect magnifies the changes to council tax and thus acts as a weapon to control council spending. They argue that all one needs is what is called marginal accountability so that marginal changes in the council's budget are properly signalled and, indeed, exaggerated through changes in a tax bill. That effect was introduced by the previous Conservative Government when they nationalised the business rate. I do not know whether it was deliberate or whether it happened by accident or coincidence, but it has greatly worsened the problem for local government.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows that, since its inception in the 1990s, the Liberal Democrats have run Rayleigh town council. They increased the precept by 22 per cent. this year. When they had a chance to defend their record, only a handful of councillors stood for re-election and when nominations closed last week the Conservatives took 17 of the 23 seats unopposed. There will be no marginal accountability in Rayleigh town council or any marginal seats because all the Liberal Democrats have run away. Why is that?

Mr. Davey: It was wishful thinking that the hon. Gentleman would talk about marginal accountability. It is a complex notion so perhaps I should have guessed that he would not deal with it.

Marginal accountability is dangerous nonsense. For it to work, all local government spending would have to be fixed and under easy control so that councils were genuinely responsible for the marginal changes in their budgets. Yet we know that council budgets are not like that, because so many services are demand-led and cannot be predicted. Demand pressures for services such as special educational needs and care for the elderly are massive in some areas and explain by themselves most, if not all, of some councils' tax rises. Such real-life demand pressures totally destroy the theoretical notion of marginal accountability.

Just as damaging is the implicit assumption that councils should be held financially to account for changes to the budget only at the margins, for new services. For proper accountability, councillors and voters should ask questions about existing services and the way in which the budget is spent on them, not only on new projects.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davey: No, I shall not.

I simply ask Ministers to reflect on how they would feel if the notion of marginal accountability applied to them. I agree with the Minister that accountability can be a tricky notion to pin down. In its fullest sense, it requires voters to have large amounts of information, which, with the best will in the world, we cannot expect them to have.

Despite those problems, I am convinced that the Layfield notion of accountability—what the committee called "average accountability"—is the right way forward. That approach gets closest to the committee's ideal that whoever was responsible for spending the money should also be responsible for raising it, so that that amount of money was subject to democratic control. Subject to the constraint of equalisation, that is the approach that the Liberal Democrats take. We believe that the balance of funding problem is a serious one which undermines accountability and that it can be fixed only by serious devolution of financial power.

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay) (LD): Is it not the case that those in high house-price areas—where the central Government grant is related to the tax base—which are also low-income areas will always be chasing a gap between what the Government give them and what local people can afford to pay? The council tax will always disadvantage such areas.

Mr. Davey: My hon. Friend is right. That is part of the problem with the gearing effect and with the whole system of local government finance.

When councils have to rely so much on central Government funding, it is deeply corrosive for the local democratic system. This corrosion might be seen in lower turnouts, or in the esteem in which councils are held and the status of those councils. A system that relies on central subsidy is always going to breed dependency. It feeds a political culture in which the voters, the press and the councils too often look to central Government for solutions. We need councils to take greater responsibility. We need people to go into local government, both as officers and as councillors, because they believe that they can make a significant difference to their community. We want a more powerful, vibrant local democracy that can innovate in the public services and make major long-term decisions. However, the current imbalance in funding is one of the major obstacles to that vision. Councils inevitably spend huge amounts of time analysing in detail the grant formula distributions and lobbying MPs. We have debates in the House which are effectively zero sum games. We need to end that dependency in order to move forward and to reinvigorate local government.

There is a flipside to this argument. When so much local government money comes from central Government, central Government start to regard the grant money as their money. Ministers in all the Whitehall Departments with an interest in local government seem to have an allergic reaction to seeing grants going to local councils from their global budgets. They want to micro-manage all that money. If we are to grasp the localist agenda and stop Whitehall Ministers and civil servants second-guessing local authorities in any policy area that we care to mention, it is best that most of the money spent by councils does not come from Whitehall in the first place.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Davey: I will not give way.

I have deliberately spent some time talking about why the balance of funding review is important and why it has real and serious problems to tackle. This is a key factor behind high council tax and behind the decade of above-inflation council tax rises that we have just seen. The review is critical because we need to improve accountability.

I want to end by outlining our solutions for the balance of funding review. Let me start by describing the number of taxes that councils have. It is wrong to expect councils to rely purely on one source of revenue. That is why we advocate, in addition to reforming the local personal tax system, the denationalisation of business rates, coupled with their reform. It was a huge mistake when the Conservative Government nationalised business rates, and that decision alone has already made a difficult problem much worse. Giving councils a second source of revenue would quickly make a huge difference. After all, that was one of Labour's election promises before 1997.

I should make it clear that, in denationalising business rates, we want to reform them too. We want to give an allowance, so that small businesses would have an allowance similar to the personal allowance in the income tax system. We want to base rateable values not on the property but on the land. That would have two big benefits for businesses. First, it would ensure that the tax base was widened, so that land that had been zoned for commercial use but had not yet been built on would be brought into the tax base, thus reducing the bills for existing small business rate payers. It would also end the perverse incentives against developing such land.

[Mr. Davey]

I know that the Minister is toying with that idea. We have seen reports in the press on whether the Government are going to go ahead with it. Concern has been expressed in No. 10 Downing street and in parts of government that this reform would be controversial, but I urge the Government to grasp it for three reasons. First, with the reforms that I have outlined, I believe that the proposal could be sold to business. Secondly, there is an argument for keeping one central control over localised business rates, which would be to ensure that any rise in the business rates would be no higher than a rise in the local personal tax. That would ensure that business rates rose by no more than personal taxes and possibly, if councils wanted, by less. The third reason why denationalising business rates is important is that the voice of business could be heard again. Many businesses criticise the Tories' nationalisation of business rates because it means that they have been excluded from many of the councils' discussions on important local issues.

Mr. Andrew Turner: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davey: No, I shall not give way any more.

The second part of our solution is a radical reduction in central Government interference. We may have some common ground with the Conservatives on this. We want to see ring-fencing and passporting brought to an end, and to ensure that when responsibilities are passed down to local government, they are fully funded and the money actually goes with the responsibilities. We want to see the Government's very timid agenda on freedoms and flexibilities for local councils massively expanded, so that we can reduce the level of regulation and inspection not just for a few councils but for all of them. This sort of policy would have major benefits for councils. It would restore control of their costs and flexibility over local priorities.

Our final proposal is the most radical, the most controversial and the most well known. It is the proposal to scrap council tax and replace it with a local income tax. Many of the arguments on this were rehearsed on 10 February when we last debated these issues, but I want to add one major point, linking local income tax with the balance of funding review. The key issue is that if we can extend the personal tax base—and make it a fair tax base—it will be able to take more weight. If we chose a local income tax, the national tax collected by the same authority—the Inland Revenue—could be reduced penny for penny so that the overall tax burden did not increase.

Mr. Turner: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davey: No, I will not.

The key problem with council tax is that it cannot bear the weight that the balance of funding review would want it to do in order to get rid of the problems that I have outlined. The council tax is already an unfair tax. The idea of doubling it—or of increasing it even by 10 per cent., or whatever the Conservatives' proposal of the week might be—would exaggerate the unfairness of it even more. I do not believe that council tax is the way to go. Local income tax could bear the weight because it would be based on fairness.

The balance of funding review offers an historic opportunity for the Government to end the decades of feuding between councils and central Government over local government finance. It will give them an opportunity to decentralise financial power in our over-centralised country and to strengthen and revive local democracy. Above all, it will provide an opportunity to get rid of Britain's most unfair tax—the council tax. I hope that the Government are up to this challenge and that they listen to the voters on June 10. I commend the motion to the House.

The Minister for Local and Regional Government (Mr. Nick Raynsford): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"welcomes the Government support for local government with its 30 per cent. real terms increase in grant since 1997; notes that the average increase in council tax in 2004–05 is the lowest for nine years; supports the Government's proposals to take action against a number of authorities which have set excessive budgets and council tax increases in 2004–05; and looks forward to the report of the Balance of Funding Review of how local government in England is funded which is due in summer 2004."

I welcome the opportunity to debate this important and complex subject. The Government take this issue very seriously, and it is currently the subject of our balance of funding review. I listened with great interest—and, I have to say, growing incredulity—to the speech by the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey). Rarely has a political party shot itself so convincingly not just in the foot, but in the arms, legs and head as well. I have never thought of the hon. Gentleman as an ancient mariner, but I have to say that he has truly hung an albatross of enormous proportions round his party's neck in the form of its proposal for a local income tax.

More of that anon, but first, I would like to set out some background. The hon. Gentleman's motion curiously refers to "grant reduction". I am not sure where he has been for the past seven years. Under this Government, local authorities have not been facing year-on-year grant reductions. That was certainly their experience in the early and mid-1990s when the Conservatives were in power, but this Government have been significantly increasing the levels of grant paid to local authorities. The latest settlement, for 2004–05, involves a total formula grant of £46.1 billion, an increase of 5.5 per cent. compared with 2003–04.

On top of that, specific grants take the overall increase to 7.3 per cent. That is not a one-off increase but part of a programme of sustained growth in investment in the vital public services delivered by local government. In 2004–05, for the second year running, all local authorities received a real-terms increase in formula grant on a like-for-like basis. Overall, Government funding to English local authorities is up by 30 per cent. in real terms over the past seven years. That is in stark contrast to the previous four years, when year-on-year cuts were the norm—a 7 per cent. real-terms funding cut over the last four years of the Conservative Government.

It is sometimes argued that the grant increases are not sufficient to match new demands that are placed on local authorities, and that they are forced to spend money on Government priorities by ring-fencing, but both concerns are being addressed. We operate a "new burdens" doctrine, which requires any new obligations on local government to be matched by appropriate funding from the responsible Department. Furthermore, in the recent grant settlement, we have removed ring-fencing from some £750 million of specific grants. We have thus reduced the ring-fenced grant from over 13.3 per cent. to around 11 per cent., and on current plans, ring-fencing will be less than 10 per cent. by 2005–06. For authorities categorised as excellent, we have gone even further by removing virtually all ring-fencing, except for those grants intended for schools.

Mr. Steen: The Minister mentioned excellent authorities. Is he aware that Torbay council, which is run by the Liberal Democrats and is very poor, had a 10.1 per cent. increase and the Government have capped it? Is he also aware that, in spite of the speech by the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey), the £100 rebate, which every council tax payer was going to receive if the Liberal Democrats got into office, has gone out of the window? Did he hear the hon. Gentleman mentioning the £100 rebate, which we have all been looking forward to?

Mr. Raynsford: I shall return to the £100 rebate, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman enjoys that passage of my speech. Although I have to say that he is right in saying that Torbay council is not an excellent authority, his party, which was responsible for running it for a long time, was probably as responsible as the Liberal Democrats for its current position.

As the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton rightly said, it is local authorities, not the Government, that set the council tax paid by householders. As I told the House on 29 April:

"The average increase in council tax . . . this year is 5.9 per cent." —[Official Report, 29 April 2004; Vol. 420, c. 1019.]

That is less than half the previous year's increase and lower than many people predicted. It is also the lowest in the past nine years.

A large number of authorities have set lower council tax increases than they originally proposed, not least because of the Government's strong messages to local authorities to the effect that high increases were both unnecessary and unacceptable. Nevertheless, some authorities' budgets and council tax increases are still too high and impose unreasonable burdens on council tax payers.

The Government made clear their intention to take action against those authorities whose budget requirements they consider excessive. People who are troubled by the fear of large council tax increases—I am thinking particularly of pensioners living on fixed incomes—will appreciate that this Government have taken action to protect council tax payers from unnecessarily large increases. They will be aware of, and perhaps shocked by, the attitude of the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton, who described this action as absurd during the debate on 29 April, at column 1025 of the Official Report. Indeed, I believe he owes council tax payers throughout the country an explanation as to why it is apparently not absurd for a Liberal Democrat council to impose a 29 per cent. council tax increase, while it is absurd for the Government to take action to protect council tax payers from such an increase.

The Liberal Democrats have a lot of explaining to do, too, for their councils have an unenviable record of introducing the largest increases in council tax. On average, in a year when Labour councils kept their increases down to 4.7 per cent., Liberal Democrat councils showed average increases of 6 per cent., and Liberal Democrat Shepway district council headed the list of the biggest increases, at 29 per cent.—an interesting warning to electors who are thinking about which way to cast their vote in June.

Mr. Edward Davey: Can the Minister tell the House what the average increase in council tax over the past five years has been in councils controlled by different political parties? He will find that the Conservatives have presided over the highest average annual council tax increases over the past five years, and Liberal Democrat and Labour-controlled councils have had roughly the same increases—about 6.9 per cent. Will he put that on the record?

Mr. Raynsford: I cannot, off the top of my head, give the hon. Gentleman the figures for the last five years, but I can tell him that last year the Conservatives had the highest tax increases of 16 per cent., and Liberal Democrat and Labour councils had increases of around 10 per cent.

This year, the Government said that they expected councils to budget for low single-figure increases. Only Labour councils delivered, with an average increase of 4.7 per cent. Conservative councils averaged 5.4 per cent., and Liberal Democrat councils 6 per cent.—the highest increases of any of the three parties this year.

Rather than trying to pass the blame elsewhere, the hon. Gentleman ought to be talking to his party's councillors and telling them to get a grip, although I appreciate that that is a concept largely unfamiliar to Liberal Democrats. If he did, it would have an influence on one of the other issues raised in the motion, although he did not refer to it, which is the so-called Treasury forecast of next year's council tax rise. As I have frequently explained to hon. Members, that figure is based on average increases in past years, so the fact that there is a large figure this year reflects the very large council tax increases last year. The figure is not, repeat not, an estimate of increased costs, or a target, or the Government's view of what would constitute an acceptable rise in council tax.

The best way to get the figure down, of course, is to get average council tax down. That is where the Liberal Democrats have the greatest opportunity, because they have the largest increases in council tax this year.

Mr. Andrew Turner: The Minister has made a number of sensible remarks about the Liberal Democrats, but is he really saying that the Treasury can forecast what is going to happen next year only by reference to what happened last year?

Mr. Raynsford: As I was saying to the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton, this is not actually a forecast. It is based on the trends over the past three years. Therefore, if there is a large increase in the previous year, as was the case, that is reflected in the figure. I have explained that repeatedly to the House.

I want to continue by referring to the balance of funding review, and it is probably helpful if I start by providing a little background to it.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Let me declare an interest as a member of the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy, whose review this is. Is the Minister about to point out the Liberals' suggestion that about 3p on local income tax should be sufficient to fund necessary public services, when the range suggested in the review is between 3.2p and 6.5p? Does that not suggest illiteracy on a grand scale?

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend is right about those figures, but we have set up the review and it is taking evidence from various players, including CIPFA. We have been pleased with the detailed and thoughtful submissions that it has made, but this is not CIPFA's review. My hon. Friend is right about the figures ranging between 3.2p and 6.5p, which is rather at variance with what the Liberal Democrats say in public.

Mr. Edward Davey: Can the Minister confirm that that CIPFA review has an average figure of 3.75 per cent., which is also our average figure? CIPFA has 3. 8 per cent. as the average. [Interruption.] Yes it does. I have that in the report, if the Minister needs it. Will he also confirm that the range that the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) mentioned relates to keeping the same grant system, which includes a council tax base within it, which would be absurd? Will the Minister therefore accept, as CIPFA makes clear in its report, that that is a first best guess, not a proper analysis?

Mr. Raynsford: For the benefit of the hon. Gentleman, who finds this difficult, I shall quote the CIPFA report. He will see in paragraph viii on page ii of the introduction and summary that a local income tax

"substituting for the Council Tax in England in 2003/04, might have resulted in areas precepts ranging between 3.2 p and 6.5 p on the existing personal rates of income tax."

Those are CIPFA's figures. Will he withdraw his remarks and apologise for attacking my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) for giving correct figures from the CIPFA report?

Let me also put to the hon. Gentleman something that he might think about before I give way to him again. Those remarks relate to 2003–04. When updated, the figures will probably increase above even those levels.

Mr. Davey: If the Minister had read on, he would have told us that that paragraph says:

"This assumes broadly similar grant calculations relating to formula spending shares. However, the taxbase relating to personal incomes, upon which the above range of precepts is based, is distributed differently to the banded property values used for Council Tax purposes."

In other words, the point I was making is that the grant system would change under local income tax, but that was not actually being measured.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman is digging an even deeper hole, and I must counsel him not to pursue that point. I shall come later to some interesting comments taken from his website about the CIPFA report. For now, however, let me tell him that the passage that he has cited in fact highlights one of the problems implicit in his proposals, which is that the regional yield of a local income tax would be much higher in London and the south-east, so disproportionate increases in taxation would be likely there unless the grant distribution was changed. I would be interested to know whether the hon. Gentleman proposes to change that distribution, which would involve a significant change in the distribution of resources.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Part of the problem with local income tax, as with the poll tax, is non-payment, and one assumes that people would be very clever in trying to avoid tax. One of the biggest difficulties is that any assumption of tax take must build in losses that might result if people chose not to pay or were able not to pay. Does my right hon. Friend agree?

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend makes a very good point, to which I shall come in a moment. I should like first to discuss the purposes of the review before turning to the Liberal Democrat proposals.

As our 2001 White Paper "Strong Local Leadership—Quality Public Services" recognised, many local authorities are concerned about the balance of funding and the proportion of local spending financed from central as against local sources. Nationalisation of the business rate in 1990 shifted the balance of funding so that the proportion raised locally was reduced from about 50 per cent. to 25 per cent. National taxes, including the business rate, now account for about 75 per cent. of local government revenue. Although the average proportion raised locally is about 25 per cent., the figure varies widely across England. For example, in Newham, one of the more deprived parts of London, it is about 11 per cent., whereas in Chiltern, a more affluent area in the south-east, the figure is at the upper end, at around 60 per cent. My hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) was absolutely right to highlight the fact that in many deprived areas, because the wealth of an area is more varied in terms of income tax receipts than in terms of property valuations, the problem would intensify, and those areas would require even more Government subsidy if a local income tax came in. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton did not understand my hon. Friend's sensible point.

In general, deprived areas with high needs and a low council tax base receive much more central grant than more affluent ones. The equalisation of needs and resources aims to ensure that all areas receive sufficient resources to deliver services to acceptable standards. Whatever their individual balance of funding, however, many councils argue that they cannot be properly accountable to their taxpayers if they have to rely heavily on central grant funding. They also criticise the impact of the balance of funding on gearing, which was a point made by the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton. In the 2001 White Paper, the Government stated their view that there was no quick or easy way of securing a major shift in the balance of funding. We did, however, agree to set up a high-level working group to look at all aspects of the issue and to consider reform options. The balance of funding review started work in April 2003, and it aims to report in the summer. Our target is July, and I hope that, before the House rises for the recess we can report to the House on the options that the review sets out. I chair the review's steering group, which comprises representatives of local government—several from the Local Government Association—central Government, business, the unions and other experts. The review group has met several times. It has discussed the principles of a successful local government finance system, held a consultation and commissioned independent research, all of which is publicly available. It has examined a number of possible reform options.

The review is looking at four main reform options, which were suggested in response to public consultation: re-localisation of business rates; introduction of a local income tax; reform of council tax; and a mixed option of smaller taxes or charges. I should emphasise that the fact that the review is hearing evidence on those different options is not an indication that the Government favour any one of them.

I will start with council tax. Many consultation responses said that there were serious problems with council tax, but most suggested that it should be reformed rather than abolished. As recent work by the New Policy Institute points out, the tax has been widely accepted until recently. Almost all countries have a local tax on domestic property. Council tax has advantages: it is well established and relatively easy to understand, its yield is predictable, and it is easy to collect, as houses do not move. Indeed in 2002–03 local authorities in England collected more than 96 per cent of the council tax due within the financial year.

Of course, one major change is already planned. Under the Local Government Act 2003, there is a statutory requirement for a revaluation of domestic property in 2007, based on 2005 property values. Revaluation is not designed to raise more tax overall; the 2001 local government White Paper made it clear that its overall impact will be neutral. As the New Policy Institute showed, however, revaluation will have different effects across the country in line with house price rises, and we will consider carefully how best to manage that. One option would be the introduction of regional banding.

We will consider the case for change to the existing bands, although we would need carefully to examine the impact of any changes. As the NPI made clear, improvements can also be made to council tax benefit, which makes an important contribution to the financial security of many people on low incomes but does not reach as many people as it should because of relatively low take-up. There is real scope for improving take-up, and my colleagues at the Department for Work and Pensions are making changes to address that.

Mr. Edward Davey: May I return the Minister to the point on revaluation? He criticised local income tax by arguing that there would be a larger local income tax base in such regions as London and the south-east. Does he think that his comparison with the council tax base would change after revaluation? Does he admit that many households in London and the south-east will see large increases in their council tax bills as a result of revaluation, particularly those in London who live in band C properties?

Mr. Raynsford: There are two separate issues there. I have made it clear that we accept that there will be variations, depending on the relative increases in house prices since 1991. It is completely unrealistic to go on indefinitely with a tax system based on 1991 values, so revaluation must come. That is why we are considering the possibility of regional banding as one way to address the issue that the hon. Gentleman raises.

The issue that I was highlighting is a different matter, and the hon. Gentleman may not fully have understood that. There is a wider gap between the highest and lowest levels of people's incomes, as assessed for income tax, than there is between property values, and that would create a different issue if a local income tax were introduced. I shall not push the point further since the penny has, I hope, now dropped for the hon. Gentleman.

Re-localisation of the business rates—a return to the pre-1990 system—is not something that the Government have favoured, but there is strong demand for it from many in local government. Most consultation responses from councils argued that re-localisation would help to resolve the balance of funding problem and encourage better partnerships with local businesses. The business community has stated, however, that it would strongly oppose re-localisation. There are also major disparities between areas in their business rate yield, so equalisation would be needed, which would reduce the link between resources raised and what would be available locally.

The review's discussion of business rates threw up another issue. The LGA presentation made the interesting point that when business rates were nationalised, they met about 29 per cent. of local government funding, whereas they now pay for only 22 per cent. That is because rises in the business rates multiplier are capped by law at the level of inflation. Some may argue that it is not fair that business contributions to local funding are capped while domestic taxpayers' council tax bills are not. Is there, then, a case for reconsidering how the cap is set? Well, there are two sides to the story. Business organisations have warned that any changes to the cap would be very sensitive and could damage the UK business tax picture and perhaps endanger businesses' comparative advantage internationally. The balance of funding review is looking carefully at the issue, considering the pros and cons of any changes.

Next I shall say a word about local income tax. The review consultation showed support in some quarters for that, or at least for considering the case for it, as most people admit that the proposal is inherently complex and needs much more work. CIPFA, which presented a paper to the review, highlighted a number of difficult issues, such as set-up costs, costs to business and the treatment of investment income. It would not be an easy option. It is technically complex and challenging, with much of the devil in the detail.

Matthew Green (Ludlow) (LD): The Minister clearly has quotes from the CIPFA report in front of him. Early on, on page 3 I think, CIPFA lists some advantages and disadvantages of the local income tax. Perhaps the Minister would like to read out the four main advantages cited.

Mr. Raynsford: No, because I should then have to read out the six disadvantages that follow. The hon. Gentleman can no doubt consult the report for himself.

The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton has clearly not taken to heart the lesson of complexity. Let us compare his blithe assurances with CIPFA's more measured views.

I take as my evidence the hon. Gentleman's website, which I assume is an authoritative source for his views. Under the question "How quickly could a local income tax be introduced?" he states confidently:

"Within two years maximum. As it is using an existing system, the only major delays would be consultation on details and getting legislation through parliament".

Well, that is pretty clear. So let us see what the experts—CIPFA—say.

"The legislative requirements might be completed within two or three years ... Then appropriate guidance and support would need to be given to taxpayers and employers. A roll of local taxpayers would need to be collated. Most previous observers concluded that the implementation of a LIT would take five years to effect. Despite the advance made in the technology ... the preparations required would be no less elaborate and consequently the proper implementation might well take five years to complete. There would be considerable risk in forcing the pace."

So there we have it. "Seven to eight years and do not rush it", says CIPFA; "Two years and it would be easy", say the Liberal Democrats. I know whose judgment I trust.

After that not very encouraging start, let us look at the Liberal Democrats' specific proposals. They leave a great deal to be desired and would, I fear, lead to disruptive and complicated changes to the tax system without providing the much trumpeted benefits. First, the proposals would do little to improve the flexibility available to local authorities. As authorities in poor and deprived areas would be able to collect less income tax than the richest areas, the proposals would mean that the poorer authorities would become more heavily dependent on grant. There would be less flexibility, and a worse gearing effect, for those authorities, than at present.

Secondly, the proposals would involve substantial costs that are not mentioned by the Liberal Democrats. They plan to combine their local income tax proposal with an increase in the personal allowance to £5,000, but taking into account this year's increase, that would cost an extra £1.5 billion. Of course, we know that the Lib Dems are not very good with figures. Their back-of-the-envelope approach to local government finance usually collapses the moment that it is subject to any serious scrutiny. Even the simplest of their pledges prove problematic.

We all recall the Lib Dems' promises last year of £100 off the council tax, and the hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) reminded us of it earlier. We were assured that they had done their figures and could deliver that benefit. The voters of Brent, East were lured into voting Lib Dem with the overt promise of that bonus. But six months later it has vanished. The right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) has huffed and puffed about reviews and reconsideration, and when asked recently on "Today" whether people would not be receiving the £100 they had been promised, he replied as follows. I quote from the verbatim transcript:

"well, what we are (nervous chuckle) what we are pledging to people is a local income tax".

So there we have it: the promised £100 has been withdrawn. Even though the leader of their party made that admission a week ago, his message does not appear to have got through to individual Lib Dem MPs, at least one of whose websites today continues to hold out the promise of a £100 refund under an "Axe the Tax" headline. It is no wonder that the leader of their party gave a nervous chuckle. Not only is his party in a shambles, but his proposals would have severe and, in many cases, inequitable consequences. They would impose substantial additional tax burdens on hard-working families, especially those with two or more earners, including those doing vital public service jobs.

At the same time, as the embarrassment of the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton demonstrated when he was questioned on "The Westminster Hour" a week ago about investment income, the back-of-the-envelope Lib Dem proposals would open up huge loopholes, allowing wealthy company directors and others living on unearned income to avoid making any contribution to local services—so much for the supposed fairness of their proposals. The whole issue of investment income would not be covered by their PAYE system, and that would be an obvious incentive for evasion.

Finally, the proposals they have made have weaknesses that they do not consider.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): The Minister belongs to the supposed party of fairness and justice. Is it right that under the present council tax proposals an elderly couple should spend 11 per cent. of their income on council tax when under the LIT proposals put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey), they would pay 4 per cent.? Is that just or fair?

Mr. Raynsford: If the hon. Gentleman had been listening to what I said earlier, he would know that I highlighted the contribution to that situation of councils—including many Lib Dem councils—that have pushed up their council tax to an unreasonably high level. I also highlighted the scope for trying to ensure that those who should receive council tax benefits do so. Some of the examples that the hon. Gentleman mentioned are in that category. Some 1 million people are probably paying more than they should because they are not getting their benefit entitlement. We want to tackle that problem, and we are doing so, but it does not mask the fact that his party proposes a wholly inequitable tax system that would create a massive loophole, enabling some of the richest people in the country to evade any contribution to local services. It is nonsense, and the Lib Dems know it.

Mr. Raynsford: I must make some progress.

The proposals have weaknesses that the Lib Dems have not considered. They have two ideas for how the tax would be collected. One is to collect it during the year through tax codes, and the other is to collect it at a standard rate across the country, and then to settle up with the individual taxpayer to cover what they should have paid through an end-year adjustment.

The first proposal would impose substantial additional burdens on employers, who would need to deal with local income tax rates for every local authority in which their employees lived. The website of the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton even suggests that employers would also have to take account of the precepts from the 9,000 parish councils. Can hon. Members imagine the administrative chaos and confusion of taking into account precepts from 404 local authorities and 9,000 parish councils? I assume that the hon. Gentleman has made a mistake and that he did not mean that. I cannot believe that he would be so unwise as to make such a suggestion. The process of having to account separately for the different amounts of local income tax that employers were subtracting from their employees' wages would impose serious administrative burdens. The more councils with separate precepts, the more complicated and intractable that burden would be.

Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): The Lib Dem proposals would not only involve collecting money through the PAYE system. Part of the saving is meant to come from doing away with the existing property-based tax, but they would still need to take tax on second properties. Therefore, they would not make the savings they predict by reducing that layer of bureaucracy.

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend makes an appropriate point. The need for a system to value every property in the country for the application of the site value tax that is proposed in cases in which owners were not liable for local income tax would make it impossible to make any administrative savings, as the Lib Dems implied would be possible by reducing the work of the Valuation Office Agency.

I do not believe that the Lib Dems have even considered the burden on business in their costings for the local income tax. I have seen no evidence of them having made any allowance for the additional cost—it would probably be some £100 million—to business that it would entail.

The second option of an end-year adjustment would be an odd compromise, satisfying no one. It would be a local income tax in which, most of the time, the bill paid had nothing to do with the rate set by one's local authority. How would such a system promote local accountability and flexibility, and how would it aid the taxpayer in understanding how much money their council was asking for or spending on services? In addition, given that the mechanics of the tax system mean that under or over-payments would not be fully settled for months or years, that approach would be doubly complex and unpredictable both for individual taxpayers, who could be presented with unwelcome retrospective demands, and for local authorities and the Inland Revenue.

David Wright (Telford) (Lab): Under that system, what would happen in communities that were reliant on one or two big employers if one went under before the end of a tax year? How would local councils collect their cash?

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend makes a valid point about the unpredictability of depending on a tax that is not predictable—as council tax is—as a main source of revenue. The closure of a major employer in an area would result in a significant reduction in income tax revenue, but it would not affect the council tax yield because those who had lost their jobs would be entitled to council tax benefit.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Raynsford: No, I must make some progress.

I particularly enjoyed—as, I think, will the House—what the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton says on his website about the proposal for end-year adjustments:

"if your local authority has set a rate of"— local income tax—

"lower than the national average, then you will get a rebate. If your authority has set a rate higher than the average, then you pay a little extra."

We should note the selective use of the word "little". He does not say, "You will get a little discount"; nor does he say, as he should, "You will pay a little more unless you are unwise enough to live in a Liberal Democrat area where you will pay a lot more because they charge a lot more."

The final significant option for reform put forward during the public consultation was for a range of smaller taxes or charges. The Local Government Association has been keen to explore that option, and it presented a useful paper at the steering group meeting on 27 April. It includes a wide range of possibilities, including localising existing taxes such as vehicle excise duty or stamp duty on property transfers, or introducing new taxes such as land value taxes, tourist taxes and more charges for local services. The steering group accepted that that is not a panacea, not least because most of the options would not raise sufficient revenue to make significant changes to the balance of funding. It has agreed to look more closely at some of the options, although it has ruled several out. The balance of funding review has just finished hearing presentations on the individual reform options. The next step at our meeting at the end of May will be to start to pull the threads together and to consider what the report will say.

These are important issues. Many Members will remember the consequences of the previous Administration's rushed reform, which gave us not only the disaster of the poll tax, but the hiking of VAT to 17.5 per cent. That lesson of past failure is one good reason why we are adopting a cautious and considered approach, not a knee-jerk response based on slogans. It is clear to the Government that many people, whether council tax payers on fixed incomes or those working in local government who would like a more transparent funding system, have serious concerns about many aspects of local government finance.

The Government are clear that there are no easy fixes or quick wins and that we need to analyse the options carefully. I am sure that hon. Members will recognise that we must take a measured approach. We will not hold out false promises, as do the Liberal Democrats, to the effect that reform is easy and solutions are painless. "Axe the Tax" must be one of the most mindless slogans ever put forward.

The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton may fancy himself as the Arnold Schwarzenegger of south-west London, but it is a bogus prospectus. The Liberal Democrats are not a low-tax party—their councils are increasing council tax by more than any other party's. Their councillors do not want to cut council tax, but at the same time as they are busy increasing the burden, their Members of Parliament try to pretend that there is a quick and easy solution that can magically deliver lower tax bills. That is simply not credible. As I said before, they are no better than snake oil salesmen peddling quack remedies which would, if taken, leave the patient worse not better. Their motion deserves to be rejected with contempt.

Mr. Steen: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I wonder whether you could give the House some advice. As the Liberal Democrats' motion has been totally and utterly demolished by the Government, is it possible for them to withdraw it so that we can all go home and not listen to any more?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): That is not a point of order for the Chair; we will continue the debate.

8.23 pm

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): My hon. Friend the Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) makes a tempting suggestion.

In rising to speak against the motion, I should refer to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests.

This is my first outing on the local government finance ticket, and it is a great pleasure to take part in the debate. I listened carefully to the Minister, who gave us an interesting walk through the balance of funding review. I think that we can take it from his speech that the Government have formally ruled out local income tax as part of the review; otherwise, he would have quite a few words to eat. He said that he expects to make an announcement before the recess. I think that he mentioned a debate, and I hope that the Under-Secretary will be able to give us a guarantee that we will have a debate in Government time before the recess.

I listened carefully to the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey). Although I am new to the subject, I found his speech rather odd, because he did not say much at all about local income tax. I wonder whether that was due to the fact that next to him was the brooding presence of the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), who speaks for the Liberal Democrats on finance. His speech was a bit like a lecture on the principles of local government finance, and I was taken back to a university lecture hall. I have to tell him that one does not need to try to make this topic boring and impenetrable. I thought that any minute we were going to hear about neo-endogenous growth theory, but we did not quite get to that.

Given that my Sunday papers told me that a leadership election is now under way in the Labour party, I was impressed by the number of Labour Members who stayed in the Chamber, as I thought that they might be in the Corridors being canvassed or canvassing. It was good to see them staying. [Interruption.] It is all true—I read in my newspaper that the Chancellor is getting his dream Cabinet ready, and thought that the Minister, who has been knocking on the door for so long, would certainly be making a guest appearance in that dream Cabinet. We will have to wait and see.

The debate is a good opportunity to shed some light on a subject that is normally kept in the dark—official Liberal Democrat policy. I know that many other Members are waiting to speak, so I will restrict myself to three points. First, in recent years the council tax has risen far too far and far too quickly. That has caused real anger and real pain. Every year under this Government, council tax has gone up by at least three times the rate of inflation. Every year, the Minister comes here and talks in his reasonable way about a generous settlement, yet every year we have these significant council tax increases. In England, council tax levels are up by 70 per cent. for a band D property since 1997. In 1997, the average bill was £689—now, it is £1,167. Council tax receipts are up from £11 billion to almost £20 billion. That has happened pretty much across the country—the Minister cannot point to authorities that have been immune. The Prime Minister promised us "no excessive rises" in council tax, yet that is precisely what we have had, year in, year out.

That brings me to my second point: why has that damaging and painful increase taken place? It is possible to identify three separate causes, all of which, interestingly, can to a large extent be laid at the door of central Government. First are the additional and largely unnecessary bureaucratic burdens. My own local authority, West Oxfordshire, has calculated that complying with just two of those—comprehensive performance assessments and best value—adds £14 to each council tax bill, yet it is hard to find anyone who has a good word to say about them or thinks they have altered policy or practice in a meaningful way.

Next are the unfunded liabilities. To be fair to the Minister, some of those include worthwhile goals. A classic example would be the targets for waste recycling. We all want those to be met, but where is the money to make that possible? Let us consider the list. Council leaders have to comply with the Licensing Act 2003, the Care Standards Act 2000, the Homelessness Act 2002 and the Freedom of Information Act 2000. Once they have finished doing that, they can try the School Standards and Framework Act 1998, the Special Educational Needs and Disability Act 2001, a range of transport Acts, and requirements to develop plans on everything from litter to landlords.

After that, councils have to pay the Criminal Records Bureau, bed-blocking fines, higher national insurance contributions, pension liabilities, landfill tax and, of course, higher fuel duties. Next, they have to meet EU environmental directives, extra travel concessions, e-government targets and the cost of asylum and all that it entails.

Mr. Sanders: Do not forget audit.

Mr. Cameron: Time is limited and I have probably left out many things. I am trying to give a sense of the enormous range of burdens that councils are expected to meet without extra funding. They must be starting to feel like Elton John's hairdresser: each year, they are asked to do more and more with less and less.

Mr. Neil Turner (Wigan) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman read out an interesting list. What is Conservative policy on all those measures? Would the Conservatives scrap all those local authority responsibilities, or would they give the authorities extra money to pay for them?

Mr. Cameron: That is a reasonable question—[HON. MEMBERS: "What is the answer."] The first thing to do is to stop making things worse. We have to stop adding burdens to local councils without giving them the funding. We could do one or two things straight away to improve the situation. I have already mentioned comprehensive performance assessments and best value; my constituents are paying an extra £14 for those two bits of red tape, which everyone says are worth nothing.

The third cause, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton, is the Government's obsession with two nouns that they have turned into verbs: to ring-fence and to passport through—I hope you can see that I am trying to get the hang of the jargon, Madam Deputy Speaker. As the hon. Gentleman said, the more that one ring-fences and the more one insists that a certain amount of money is passported through, the more one restricts local freedom of manoeuvre and the more likely it is that any increase in local spending will lead to a significant increase in taxes. Combined with the gearing effect of local government finance, that has led to the huge increases. As the hon. Gentleman said, a 1 per cent. increase in spending typically means a 4 per cent. increase in bills. Add all that together—the burdens, the legislation, the unfunded liabilities, the plans and the restrictions—and the rest, as they say, is history. Tax rises of 70 per cent: nobody was warned, but everyone pays—it has been the biggest stealth tax of them all.

Mr. Dhanda: The hon. Gentleman made a key point when he referred to the range of measures that he feels have been imposed on local government. Which of those would he remove?

Mr. Cameron: With respect, I do not think that the hon. Gentleman quite heard what I said. I said that the measures included many worthwhile objectives, but we must try to have honest government. We should tell people what we plan to introduce and how much it will cost, and provide the funding for it. The Prime Minister said in the manifesto on which Labour Members stood for election that there would be no excessive council tax increases, yet that list of measures—many of them worth while—was bound to lead to large council tax increases. The Government have a problem with stealth taxes. The biggest stealth tax of all is council tax. That is the cause of the problem.

Mr. Raynsford: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to the Dispatch Box and look forward to many further interesting debates. He has mentioned his local authority, which originally proposed a council tax increase in excess of 30 per cent. yet has now managed to get it down to low single figures. Would he like to reflect on why that happened? Was it because the Government said that we would get tough if authorities went for unreasonably large increases? I do not think the reduction had much to do with the legislation to which my hon. Friends have referred.

Mr. Cameron: I reflect often on that point and I think Labour Members might like to reflect on it, too. In West Oxfordshire, council tax is £63. I suspect that Labour Members—or at least their constituents—go to bed at night dreaming of council tax of £63. The reason the council considered increasing the tax from £60 to £80, which is still a good £60 short of the average figure, was the waste recycling issue. A new waste recycling contract had been signed to meet the Government's very worthwhile targets, and the cost of that alone means that the council will have serious liabilities this year, for which it has not been funded. However, council tax of £63 in West Oxfordshire, compared with the average of £140 for a band D property in a shire district, is staggeringly good value. The council is of course Conservative controlled, and has been for several years.

Mr. Betts: The hon. Gentleman rightly drew attention to the problems of gearing, which all local authorities face—some to a greater extent than others. To deal with that problem, local authorities will, ultimately, have the right to raise a larger amount of their resources locally. What is current Conservative thinking about how that could be achieved, bearing in mind especially the fact that the Conservative party was responsible for two measures that gave rise to the current situation—the nationalisation of business rates and the increase in VAT to keep poll taxes down?

Mr. Cameron: Like the Government, we are holding a balance of funding review. All parties are considering the subject. The speech of the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton was all about the fact that we had to consider such things. There is common ground on both sides of the House. We all think that local authorities need to be able to raise a greater proportion of what they spend, but there are different ways of addressing that—some of them are covered by the balance of funding review but some go beyond it. We are committed to looking into the matter.

Mr. Edward Davey rose—

Mr. Cameron: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman before I deal with local income tax in slightly more detail than he did.

Mr. Davey: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to his new position. It is generous of him to admit that I was making a serious contribution to the balance of funding review and putting forward some ideas. Will he now put forward some ideas from the Conservatives?

Mr. Cameron: When I read the Order Paper, I thought it said that this was a Liberal Democrat Opposition day, so I thought that it would be chiefly about Liberal Democrat policy. I do not think that we have had a proper airing of local income tax. The Minister had a pretty good stab at it, but I thought I would say a few words about it, too.

Mr. Steen: I, too, welcome my hon. Friend to the Front Bench. He is doing a first-class job and we look forward to the destruction of the Liberal Democrats in the next part of his speech.

The problem is not just the amount of council tax, but how councils deal with Government requests to reduce it. Is my hon. Friend aware of what has happened in Torbay, where a by-election for a council seat is to be held on Thursday? The first cut to its £130 million budget has involved a reduction in the number of public lavatories available to tourists all over the bay.

Mr. Cameron: Like me, my hon. Friend probably has a copy of the Liberal Democrats' little yellow book. I recommend it if one wants to see even greater nonsenses than that.

Before I come on to local income tax, I cannot go on without mentioning the commitment to £100 off every council tax bill and the mystery of what happened to that. I have the leaflet from Brent, East in which the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton is pictured holding a very attractive cheque for £100. I am not sure what happened to the cheque. Perhaps we have been paid it or it did not arrive in the post. If the council tax had gone down, he would not need it any more. However, the most likely explanation is that the Liberal Democrats decided that, because they won that by-election, they would not need the cheque any more.

Local income tax is no more credible than the £100 bribe. It is a workable soundbite, but that is as far as it goes. That is why we did not hear any detail today. The Liberals have taken two things that sound very good. They have taken the word "local"—we all want to be local—and the phrase "income tax", because they want to sound fair. They have put the two together but, as soon as one considers the detail, it is clear that the result is neither fair nor local. Liberal Democrats do not care about the detail; they want to be able to say, "Axe the tax." That is what this is all about.

Dr. Whitehead: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cameron: I was warned that the hon. Gentleman has great expertise in local government finance, so I give way to him with some trepidation.

Dr. Whitehead: The hon. Gentleman is very kind, but he need not worry; I just wish to be helpful in pointing out where the £100 may have gone. The website of the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) is a useful source of information. It claims that the £1.7 billion allocated from the proposed top rate of income tax for those earning £100,000 would not be an additional source of local government tax, but would go to keeping the rate of local income tax down to 3.75 per cent. As my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) suggested, the Liberal Democrats realised that their estimates were towards the top end of the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy's estimates and have had to put the money that would have previously constituted a £100 saving into keeping the rate down. They have had to make the £100 vanish in that process.

Mr. Cameron: As well as being a lecturer on the subject, the hon. Gentleman is a detective. The hunting of the snark is over; he has found out what happened to the £100. However, I warn him not to spend too much time looking at Liberal Democrat websites. All sorts of things could follow from that.

Let me deal with some of the arguments that the Liberal Democrats are not considering in enough detail. The first point relates to the effect that a local income tax would have on working families. We all know such people. We meet them while canvassing and in our surgeries. They work hard while not earning more than average incomes and are struggling to get on to the housing ladder and to build a better future for themselves. A couple with someone on male average earnings and another on female average earnings would have to pay £630 more than the average council tax—an increase of 65 per cent.

I know that the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton will ask about a house that contains just one average earner. Just as I do in Witney, he will find many couples in Kingston in their 20s and 30s who are struggling to get on to the housing ladder or who are making big mortgage payments because of house prices. If they were at or just below or above average income levels, they would be hit very hard. He simply has not thought that through. I predict that, in the local election campaign that is under way, the Liberal Democrats will not talk about that at all.

Mr. Edward Davey: What would be the gross income of a household with two adults on average earnings?

Mr. Cameron: Of course, it is well over £40,000. However, the hon. Gentleman has not published his figures showing the breakdown district by district for local income tax. We have done the work for him and, if one takes the current council tax rate, one finds that the rate in Kingston would be 5.2 per cent.

Mr. Davey: Nonsense.

Mr. Cameron: The hon. Gentleman thinks it is nonsense, but I expect that our leaflets will be going out shortly in Kingston and we want to get the figure right. If he does not think that our figure is right, he should publish his own. If he does not, we will be forced to use the figure of 5.2 per cent. and I offer it to Labour Members, too. They should make a note.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cameron: No, I am going to make progress because many Back Benchers want to speak.

The second point about local income tax is that it would mean a return to high marginal rates of tax. To raise the same amount as council tax this year would mean a local income tax rate of nearly 4 per cent. It would be higher in some areas, Kingston being one of them. We know—in a rare outbreak of candour a Liberal spokesman told us so—that in time there would be a regional income tax as well. So the basic rate of tax would soon be pushing 30 per cent. in some areas. The marginal rate for someone on the current top rate of tax—41 per cent. now, not 40 per cent.—would soon be pushing 50 per cent. A person does not have to be rich to pay the current top rate. It is paid by some school teachers, police officers, health workers, taxi drivers and many others. Are the Liberals really saying that those people should pay getting on for 50p in every £1 through income tax? Almost every hon. Member has come round to the view that high marginal rates of tax are bad for incentives and bad for the economy. Someone once said that the Liberals are the party for a better yesterday. On the evidence of their plan for a local income tax, that person was only half right: there would be nothing better about it.

My third point about local income tax is the complexities that it would involve for councils. The tax year of many people would not marry up with the council's revenue year. Some 3 million people are self-employed and pay in arrears. There are also all the disputed income tax revenues. What would happen when the country as a whole, or a particular part of it, had a bad year and revenues fell? How on earth would councils plan their expenditure? You can bet your bottom dollar that the Liberals will not talk about that in the local election campaign.

My fourth point is that we must consider the complexities that such a tax would mean for everyone else. Imagine a small business in London or any other big city that employs lots of different people from lots of different local authorities. Each would have a main local income tax rate—all different. Each would have a precepted rate from their fire authority and town council—all different. There would be more rates from their parish, police force and, in time, their regional assembly—again, all different.

Companies complain to me, as they probably do to other hon. Members, that with all the tax credits and other complications, the Government have turned businesses into tax and benefit offices, but that would be a picnic compared with the complication of the local income tax. We can bet that when the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton goes around Kingston and talks to businesses, he does not tell them about that either.

My fifth point is that the local income tax does nothing to address the grant system or the problem of gearing. As other hon. Members said, it could, and will, make them far worse because some areas have higher tax bases than others. There would have to be much more equalisation and even more grants from central Government to make up for the inconsistency. That means that it could not be called a local tax.

My final point—I can give a copper-bottomed guarantee that the Liberals will not talk about this in the local elections—is that local income tax will be paid by millions of people who are not well off. The student nurse, earning just about £10,000, who is barely able to pay rent, who perhaps lives at home or with friends, would pay the local income tax. The school leaver, starting to earn good money, but still living with parents and trying to save for a deposit for a flat, would pay local income tax. The pensioner grandmother, with some income from savings, who is living in the main family home so that she can be looked after, would pay local income tax. So there we are: it is not simple; it is complex. It is not good for the economy; it is bad for incentives. It is not local; it is just a new national tax, backed by an ever-more interfering national grant system. Above all, it is not fair.

Dr. Harris: As a neighbouring MP, I wish the hon. Gentleman well in his new Front-Bench role. I want to ask him about pensioners in Oxfordshire, including those in his constituency. He talked about the two people on average earnings of more than £40,000. There will, of course, be winners and losers. We have always said that there would be, but the winners will in many cases be those on fixed incomes who earn less than £40,000. So the winners will be people in Oxfordshire and the rest of the country who are less well off. The losers will be people who are best able to afford to lose. What is the Conservative position on fairness like that?

Mr. Cameron: As a neighbouring MP, I shall look carefully at the leaflets that the hon. Gentleman puts out in Oxfordshire, and I hope that they draw as much attention to the losers as they do to the winners. An economy like Oxfordshire's cannot go back to the high marginal rates of tax that did so much damage.

It is clear that we need to get to grips with the situation that we face. We need a recognition that the current crisis has been caused above all by the rises in the council tax and its level, rather than its inherent nature. We need a recognition that we should strip away centrally imposed bureaucracy from local authorities.

We need a recognition that we cannot go on asking local authorities to do more things without giving them the money. We need a recognition that the issue of gearing, and the percentage of spending that is paid for and performed locally, must be addressed. Those are the issues that we will be looking at.

In this debate we have heard many figures. There is one, above all, that counts for Conservative Members, and that is the average band D council tax. If one looks at that, one finds that Conservative councils cost £57 less than either Labour or Liberal Democrat councils, yet they have a better record on waste collection and disposal. All the audits that the Minister has produced show Conservative councils in an excellent light. I say to Labour Members that the Labour Government caused this crisis and the Liberal Democrats have come up with entirely the wrong answer, so it falls to the Conservatives to get it right.

8.45 pm

Mr. Neil Turner (Wigan) (Lab): I welcome the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) to his position. In grappling with his new-found role, he might like to go back in history a little and remember exactly what the Conservative party did to local councils when it was in government. When I was a councillor in Wigan in the 1990s, we faced cuts in the Government grant of £10 million a year, and still we were having more and more policies imposed on us by central Government. The hon. Gentleman might like to consider that before he criticises this Government. They have undoubtedly given local government more to do, but they have given it extra money to carry out those duties.

It would be nice if we were lectured on local government by experts, but that is certainly not true of the contribution from the Liberal Democrat Front Bench. I was reminded of fifth-form debates, although the content was usually better at school. We should not really be surprised because the Liberal Democrat record in local government is dreadful. Of the excellent councils in the country, Labour controls Wigan plus 11 others, the Conservatives have nine and the Liberal Democrats have nul points.

Mr. Edward Davey: I thank the hon. Gentleman for allowing me to intervene to nail that canard. Will he confirm that most Liberal Democrat authorities are district councils, most of which have not yet been assessed by the comprehensive performance assessment process? Will he comment on the performance of Liverpool city council? When the Liberal Democrats took it over in 1998, it had the highest council tax in the country; now, after six years of Liberal Democrat rule, it is 70th. Will he make fairer, more balanced comments, rather than just taking his lead from the Labour Whips Office?

Mr. Turner: I have looked at the record put forward by the independent auditors. The CPA process says that there are no excellent Liberal Democrat councils. I am very sorry about that. The hon. Gentleman may have a problem with that, but it is his problem and he ought to sort it out.

When we look at council tax, what do we see? For Labour councils, the average council tax paid this year is £870; for Liberal Democrat councils the figure is £971; and for Conservative councils it is £1,072. The increase this year is 4.1 per cent. for Labour, 5.4 per cent. for the Conservatives and 6 per cent. for the Liberal Democrats. It is no wonder that the Liberal Democrats' record with the electorate is so lamentable. In council after council, they get elected and get control—then the franchise falls apart, they mess it up and they get voted out. As Julius Caesar might have put it, "We came, we were elected, we got found out, we were rejected."

The problem is that the Liberal Democrats have no history of running major councils for any length of time.

Matthew Green: Liverpool.

Mr. Turner: For how long did the Liberal Democrats run Liverpool council—four, five or six years? Wigan has had more than 60 years of Labour control. That is the sort of period that I am talking about. I am sure that there are many councils that have been run by the Conservatives for a similar length of time. The Liberal Democrats have never run a major local authority for any length of time, and that is the problem.

That problem has been made clear by the £100 rebate fiasco. In February 2003 the Liberal Democrats were offering a

"£100 cut for every Council Tax bill".

In May 2004, their leader was asked:

"So they won't be getting the hundred pounds you promised them?"

He answered, "Correct." We see it and then, pouf, it vanishes. It is the Keyser Soze policy of local government finance.

Everyone recognises that gearing is a huge problem under the present council tax system. That can be addressed only by reducing the amount that central Government pay and increasing the amount that local people pay, yet the Liberal Democrats do not propose any change in that ratio—they do not propose that extra money be paid from local income tax to replace council tax. The gearing issue would therefore not be altered, even though that was one of the main points advanced by the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey). The Liberal Democrats' costings are calculated on a cost-neutral basis. The difficulty they face is that changing from council tax to local income tax would not alleviate the gearing effect. In fact, it would get worse because central Government funding would increase—by £1.7 billion, as my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) said. That increase in Government grant would be funded from the Liberal Democrats higher rate of income tax. By changing the ratio between local and central funding—putting in more money from central Government—they would worsen the gearing effect.

The story gets even worse because of the greater variations in the income tax base than in the council tax base—the property base. Let us examine the effects of council tax and local income tax in four authorities. Wigan's share of the England tax base is 0.534 per cent. under council tax, and 0.402 per cent. under local income tax; its tax base would decrease by 25 per cent. under the Liberal Democrats' proposals. Stockport has 0.575 per cent. of the tax base under council tax and 0.666 under local income tax, so its tax base increases by 16 per cent. Torridge in Devon faces the problem of the number of pensioners living there: its share of the tax base under council tax is 0.122 per cent., but 0.066 per cent. under local income tax; it would face a 46 per cent. reduction in its tax base. Kensington and Chelsea's share of the tax base would increase 125 per cent., from 0.528 per cent. under council tax to 1.19 per cent. under local income tax.

Those four examples illustrate that much greater central Government support would be required to iron out the greater variations resulting from the change from council tax to local income tax. If central Government did not get the equalising formula right, they would face huge problems. We all know what difficulties were caused by the relatively minor changes made to the formula a couple of years ago. The Liberal Democrats would have huge difficulty explaining away the 25 per cent. reduction for my local authority and the 125 per cent. increase for Kensington and Chelsea in ensuring that the formula to redress the balance was fair.

Mr. Betts: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. Although he dedicated the first part of his speech to the gearing problem in local government, the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) did not say that extra money would be put into the system to deal with the problem. In addition, the greater disparities in the resource base under local income tax than under council tax would make the problem of gearing worse, especially in councils with a low resource base, which would need more money from the centre.

Mr. Turner: My hon. Friend makes my point better than I did. I am grateful to him.

Matthew Green: The hon. Gentleman read out an interesting set of figures about Wigan, which confirms that tax payers in Wigan would pay less under our policy than they do under council tax. He is arguing in favour of his electorate paying more.

Mr. Turner: I do not accept that. We are saying that the income tax base in Wigan is less than the council tax base; therefore, unless a system of equalisation is devised, ensuring that Wigan's tax payers pay less will be extremely difficult. Our base from which to supply our needs will be 25 per cent. smaller, but our needs will not change. I am not clear about how the hon. Gentleman can argue that reducing the resource base by 25 per cent. but retaining spending at the same level will reduce the amount paid in tax. I hope that he will explain in greater detail when he winds up.

The Liberal Democrats claim that their proposal would be fairer, as everybody would pay on the basis of need, but that is not true, as the hon. Member for Witney and the Minister for Local and Regional Government pointed out. Many people whose income is not pay-as-you-earn will not make a contribution, including individuals who receive the majority of their income from dividends. It will be difficult to ensure that contributions are made by the 3 million self-employed, and certainly not in the year when payment is requested.

We have just heard that a cap will be set at £100,000. People on such an income will pay 5 per cent.—that is a reasonable average accepted by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy—or £5,000. Millionaires, however, will pay the same amount, or 0.5 per cent. of their income. That is not fair, and it will be difficult for the Liberal Democrats to explain to Wiganers, who are good at doing their sums, why it is fair that millionaires should pay only 10 per cent. of the proportion paid by others.

The Liberal Democrats have not taken into account the cost of raising the personal allowance to £5,000, which the Inland Revenue estimates will cost £2.4 billion. The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), who speaks on Treasury matters for the Liberal Democrats, did not explain in the Budget debate where the money to meet those costs would come from. My hon. Friend the Member for Telford (David Wright) made an interesting point about recession. In the late 1980s and early 1990s, virtually every mine in the country, and certainly every mine in the Wigan area, was closed almost overnight. Manufacturing industry, which depended on those mines, closed down alongside them, so there was a catastrophic drop in the amount of money for our local economy. How on earth would local councils cope in such circumstances? When there is a dramatic drop in income there is an equally dramatic rise in needs, as local councils must pay for school meals and other benefits. How could Liberal Democrats overcome a recession on such a scale? Indeed, if they were elected with their policies such recessions would be likely.

The Liberal Democrats want to reform business rates in line with land values. However—and this is a problem with which we will have to wrestle under the balance of funding review—property rates vary dramatically. A property in Wigan will not have the same value as a similar property in Warrington, which will differ in value from a property in Manchester, which will differ in value from a property in the south-east. Yet again, the Liberal Democrat policy will be subject to equalisation. More money from central Government will have to be put into local government and the gearing rate will have to be changed.

Mr. Edward Davey: Is the hon. Gentleman in favour of localising business rates, or is he not?

Mr. Turner: I shall come to that later.

Cliff-edge problems were another difficulty that was not mentioned. Local income tax cannot be levied in Scotland and Wales, as such revenue-raising powers are devolved. What will happen on the cliff edge dividing Cumbria and Northumberland from Scotland, or Wales from the adjacent English counties? What happens to people who work in Wales or Scotland but live in England, and vice versa? My right hon. Friend the Minister and the hon. Member for Witney spoke about the costly problem of collecting revenue in two-tier authorities, which has not been addressed by the Liberal Democrats. The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton glossed over the difficulty of collecting money in 9,000 parishes.

The whole idea of a local income tax is crackpot policy from a tin-pot party.

Let me address some of the problems with the council tax. All hon. Members understand that the council tax raises difficulties. It is far from perfect, having been cobbled together almost overnight to dig the Conservatives out of the poll tax hole into which they had got themselves. Gearing is a huge problem. We recognise that the 25:75 per cent. local to central Government ratio does not produce good Government. It leads to a lack of transparency, as local people see large rises in council tax but almost minimal increases in the service that they receive.

The bands are certainly not wide enough at either the bottom or the top ends. That needs to be addressed dramatically. Certainly the three times ratio, 6/9ths to 18/9ths—in other words, the ratio of the very poorest household to the very richest household—is not a way to deal properly with those differences in income. Revaluation has been mentioned already by my right hon. Friend the Minister. Of course revaluation needs to take place, but we also need to ensure that we allow local councils to revalue much more regularly than 10 year intervals. I suggest five years, so that some buoyancy is built into the council tax base.

Hon. Members have rightly raised the problem of benefits, which we need to address. Research carried out for the Select Committee on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister seemed to indicate that between bands B or C up to about bands F or G, and given 100 per cent. take-up of benefits, the council tax was quite fair. Hon.

[Mr. Turner]

Members on both sides of the House must address how we ensure that benefits are taken up on a realistic and full basis.

Let me throw in my pennyworth to my right hon. Friend the Minister. I hope that he will take on board the idea of that we might want to consider allowing people to self-assess their benefits. We could get rid of the stigma by allowing everyone to send in a self-assessment. All local authorities would then determine whether someone was entitled to council tax benefit, rather than leaving that to 60 per cent. or so of people who apply for that benefit now. In other words, everyone should apply and most would say that they are not entitled, but at least everyone could to get their forms to the local council, which would assess eligibility for benefit.

If we address those issues and consider the balance of funding review, revaluation, the ratios and the bandings, we will be able to put local government finance on a much better footing. Clearly, we must also widen the base from a single council tax to include the other elements that are being considered in the balance of funding review. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will take on board those issues in a realistic way in reaching his assessment, so that the council tax base is not the only way that councils raise their money.

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) on a truly outstanding contribution at his first outing in his new brief this evening. He achieved something unusual on the Floor of House: he carried both major parties with him in his argument. The only Members who seemed a little upset by his comments were Liberal Democrats, who, in his own words, seem to have missed a great opportunity this evening to put their case for local income tax. Those on both Front Benches have demolished that proposal quite superbly.

The debate has focused on various other types of local government finance, but there are not many alternatives. There is the status quo or a rejigged version of it; a fully fledged property tax; some form of local tax, either on sales or income; or a combination of some of those. There is nothing fundamentally wrong with the current council tax that a good dose of adequate Government grant and reduced Government directives could not put right.

Why has the council tax, as my hon. Friend told us earlier, gone up for a band D property by 70 per cent. since Labour came to office? Why has council tax soared by three times the rate of inflation? Why are council tax receipts up from £8.7 billion in 1997–98 to more than £19.7 billion in the current year? That is a massive hike of some 80 per cent.

Such is the increase that, for the typical pensioner and pensioner couple, a third of the increase in pensions has been taken up in council tax.

It is not just in my own constituency in Cambridgeshire that we have seen a massive increase in council tax. There have been increases across the board throughout England. The reason is primarily that the Government grant has not kept pace with mandatory service provision. As with many Government Departments, centralisation has not produced the efficiency savings and value for money that were promised and which the Government thought would be delivered.

Who, then, is to blame for the current state of affairs? According to the Audit Commission, it is the Government who are to blame. The Audit Commission report "Council Tax Increases 2003–04", published last December, states:

> "National cost pressures taken together account for about £2.3 billion of the total increase in councils' spending of £4.3 billion. In other words slightly more than half the total increase is due to national pay and price inflation, increased national insurance and general population growth."

The report goes on to say:

> "The causes of increased spending by councils included . . . national policy priorities, such as the requirement to increase funding for schools by an amount determined by government or to meet waste recycling targets"—

we have had comments on both those issues from the Floor of the House this evening. The report continues:

> "Grant redistribution—which moved grant from London and the south to the midlands and the north— led to some councils putting up council tax more than others."

In conclusion the Audit Commission states:

> "We found a clear association between the size of grant increase a council received and their increase in council tax."

Council taxes, as we well know, have been spiralling, some would say out of control, for some years. In the past few months, the Government have belatedly decided to wield the big stick. That brings me to capping. In the Minister's recent statement on capping only a few weeks ago, he said:

> "some authorities' budgets and council tax increases are still too high and impose unreasonable burdens on council tax payers."

He repeated some of those phrases tonight. He also said in his statement:

> "The Government attach great importance to local accountability and believe that first and foremost it is for local authorities to set their council tax and justify it to their electors."

Finally, he said:

> "Of course, it is not just the percentage increase in council tax that is relevant. We have first to decide whether an authority's budget requirement is excessive."—[Official Report, 29 April 2004; Vol. 420, c. 1019.]

There are three key statements there that I should like to test against the proposal to cap one of my own local authorities, Fenland district council. Those key statements concern, first, "unreasonable burdens", secondly, "local accountability" and thirdly, "an authority's budget requirement is excessive".

Is the council tax in Fenland district council an unreasonable burden? One of the essential problems in the area is the low tax base. That was a point ably made by the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Turner). Some 85 per cent. of our dwellings in Fenland fall into the first three bands of council tax—that is, band A, band B and band C. The average council tax band in Fenland is band B, not band C as in the case of councils in Cambridgeshire as a whole, the English shire districts and the east of England as a whole. In terms of the average bill per dwelling, therefore, Fenland is £54 cheaper than Huntingdonshire district council. It is £63 cheaper than councils in England as a whole. It is £73 cheaper than East Cambridgeshire district council. It is £83 cheaper than the average of councils in Cambridgeshire as a whole.

It is £132 cheaper than the English shire districts, and it is a monumental £183 a year cheaper than the neighbouring South Cambridgeshire district council.

If one compares the average council tax bands, the differences are similar. I remind the House that in Fenland the average band is B, whereas in Cambridgeshire as a whole it is C. It is £33 cheaper in Fenland each year than in Huntingdonshire, £49 cheaper than in Cambridgeshire as a whole, and £115 cheaper than in the English shire districts.

Where, then, is this unreasonable burden by which the Minister and the Government have set such great store? Would the Minister take some time to explain to the House what the Government mean by this unreasonable burden? Is it to be expressed in terms of the finite or actual amount that people physically have to pay in their council tax, or is it based on a percentage increase in any given year?

We had the example from my hon. Friend the Member for Witney of West Oxfordshire, which had an extremely low council tax of some £63. When it sought to increase that towards the level of—though not as high as that of—other district councils in the area, it was threatened with capping because the percentage increase was deemed too high.

The Government must come clean and tell my constituents in Fenland, and indeed people in Oxfordshire, that what they really mean by an unreasonable burden is just the percentage increase, not the finite amount in the bill that people have to pay.

However, because of the relatively low tax base, which is reflected by the number and the value of properties, council tax increases in Fenland have to be much higher than in neighbouring councils to raise the same amount of income. The gearing effect is much exaggerated. For example, in Huntingdonshire and South Cambridgeshire, a £1 increase in council tax raises £56,000 and £55,000 respectively, whereas in Fenland it would raise only £28,000—100 per cent. less. To put it another way, Fenland has to increase its council tax by double the rate of its neighbouring councils to raise the same amount of money. Is that really fair? Is that not the real burden for the council tax payers of Fenland?

Hugh Bayley: Surely the question is why Fenland council was having to raise its council tax so high in the first place, given that Government grant to Fenland was 4.8 per cent., which is twice the rate of inflation.

Mr. Moss: I will explain the situation later.

On accountability, we realise and accept that the difficulties with the low tax base are to some extent addressed by the local government grant formula with which the Government have now come forward and the number of properties at the lower end are taken into consideration. We also welcome the fact that under the new formula, the districts will receive extra money in lieu of what used to be called the area cost adjustment. This is the first time that the districts and the county of Cambridgeshire will enjoy this extra money from the new calculation and formula. But in the first year of the new grant, which was last year, the Government, under their floors and ceilings policy, held back some £566,000, and that is 8 per cent. of Fenland's budget. In fact, at that time last year the Government said that they capped the grant at a ceiling. Of course, they have dropped the word "capped" this year and replaced it with the phrase "scaled back". Obviously, they could not cap their own grant distribution and at the same time wield the big stick and cap local councils. But in the current year, under scaling back as opposed to capping, the Government have withheld £422,000, which is 6 per cent. of Fenland's budget.

Where is the logic behind a Government policy that on the one hand calculates the budget for the district council under the new formula while withholding some of the grant required to deliver that budget, but on the other threatens to cap the council when it proposes to raise sufficient funds from council tax to replace that withheld funding?

The effect of scaling back grant is clear: if the Government had paid the grant that they calculated the council was entitled to and made no other changes, the council tax rise in Fenland would have been 8.17 per cent., which is less than the 8.25 per cent. threshold that the Government chose as the trigger point for capping.

Who is accountable now? Is the council accountable for wanting to deliver the required services, or are the Government, who held back rightful grant, accountable? Why have the Government changed their mind on capping? In March last year, they indicated that they would not cap those councils categorised as excellent or good under the Audit Commission's comprehensive performance assessment system, but they are reneging on that pledge. Telford and Wrekin council is one of the councils in the list for capping, and it has an excellent grading under the CPA.

As I said earlier, the Government are not only withholding grant but piling extra financial burdens and responsibilities on to councils. My hon. Friend the Member for Witney gave us a long but not exhaustive list of extra burdens that the Government have piled on to councils since they entered office. I accept that many of those extra pressures are supported by capital grants, but we all know that capital expenditure has a knock-on effect on the ongoing revenue expenditure required to keep services going, and that that money is provided from local resources and is not met by Government grant.

Let us consider recycling targets, which have been mentioned more than once in this debate. Recycling is not currently mandatory, but the Government strongly recommend and encourage it. If one talks to district councils, none of them thinks that recycling will not be a Government statutory requirement in the near future. This year, Fenland district council put £204,000 into its budget to meet recycling targets, following Government guidelines and encouragement. A similar story can be told about the e-government targets, which are, again, non-funded targets—Fenland district council put £125,000 into its budget to meet e-government targets. Added together, those two amounts meet the Government's required budget savings of £300,000 following capping. Are those examples of excessive budget requirements?

[Mr. Moss]

Fenland district council has submitted a medium-term financial strategy that identified higher increases this year, reducing significantly in future years. Those increases are part of a short-term strategy, and do not indicate a continuing trend. Next year and in future years, the strategy, which was submitted to the Government, outlines efficiency savings of £350,000, and a reduction in the general fund reserves totalling £800,000 spread over the three years from 2004–05 to 2006–07, which will mitigate the increases on council tax payers.

Finally, I come to the issue of re-billing. As a small district council, Fenland has particular problems this year. The current billing system will not allow for automatic re-billing, and the bill for software reprogramming for a new system will come to some £85,000. It is also important that a decision is taken quickly, if the Minister and his Department can do that, because if some council tax payers take the view that substantial savings are to come their way as a result of capping, they may not pay their council tax bills as early as they might have done.

That withholding of payment can create havoc for a council's budgeting and financial position and the final cost according to the Local Government Association could be more than £200,000.

If we take into account the lower estimate for the re-billing exercise, the saving for a band D taxpayer is calculated at only £7 for the year. After all that, we shall save a band D taxpayer 13p a week. For 85 per cent. of taxpayers in bands A, B and C, the amount will be less than 13p. We must ask the obvious question: is the whole exercise not rather pointless?

If Fenland council can demonstrate planned lower increases in its medium-term strategy for the next few years and if it receives a good, if not excellent, category from the recent comprehensive performance assessment review—the outcome is due at the end of the month—surely common sense will prevail and the threat of capping be lifted this year. After all, Fenland district council is not profligate. Its council tax is not an unreasonable burden compared with its immediate neighbours'. Its budget is not excessive; it is a well-run council, which actively and positively seeks to implement Government policies, namely recycling and e-government, and has a clear idea of where it is going, as the CPA review will doubtless bear out.

I invite the Minister to bring the full weight of his acclaimed knowledge, common sense and understanding to bear to foster the correct and logical outcome.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): When the hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) rose to move the motion, the Liberal Democrat Benches were packed with Members desperately willing him to deliver the knockout blow in the local government election campaign. As his speech continued, they crept out of the Chamber one by one and now only two remain. Neither looks especially happy.

Most hon. Members agree that the council tax needs reform, especially in Liberal Democrat areas where the biggest increases in council tax this year took place. Those increases are 6 per cent. on average, compared with 5.4 per cent. in Conservative-controlled councils and 4.7 per cent. in Labour areas. Although the increases are considerably lower than last year's, they have led to discontent among many people, especially the elderly. The pensioner council tax revolt started in the south-west of England, where there are many Liberal Democrat councils. However, it is not confined to Liberal Democrat areas; there is genuine anxiety among elderly people throughout the country.

I applaud the Government for establishing the balance of funding review. It is an all-party review, which includes local politicians who are nominated by the Local Government Association and it will report this summer. If the Liberal Democrats genuinely wanted a considered improvement on the status quo, they would not try to pre-empt the review but await the proposals from that all-party review team. We therefore need to ask why the Liberal Democrats have jumped the gun with a muddled and costly local income tax proposal.

The answer is simple: it diverts attention from the Liberal Democrats' record in local government throughout the country of poorly controlled spending and poor-quality services. Hon. Members have already mentioned the interesting fact that, of the councils that the Audit Commission independently judged to be excellent, some 12 are Labour controlled and none is Liberal Democrat controlled.

Mr. Edward Davey: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Hugh Bayley: The hon. Gentleman has a bit of a cheek. When he was speaking, with all the benefits of a Front Bencher who can speak for more than 30 minutes, I asked four times whether I could intervene on him. He declined and now he wants to intervene when hardly any time remains for Back Benchers to speak and when a Liberal Democrat Back Bencher, miserable though he looks, hopes to be called next. So I shall decline to give the hon. Gentleman the opportunity to intervene.

Until this time last year, City of York had the lowest band D council tax in Yorkshire. Indeed, it had the lowest council tax in Yorkshire in each and every band. Then, a year ago, the Liberal Democrats won control of the council, and I applaud their electoral success. Now, one year later, we no longer have the lowest council tax in Yorkshire; we have the fourth lowest. The band D rate in York is £1,078 this year. In Bradford, it is £1,061; in Wakefield, it is £1,048; and in Leeds, it is £1,040. York has gone from lowest to fourth lowest in just a year.

Last year, when the Liberal Democrats took control, they promised in York, as elsewhere, that they could deliver a £100 a year reduction in council tax. What actually happened this year was an average increase of about £80 a year. The plan for a £100 cut in council tax has been quietly shelved and replaced by another completely uncosted—and, frankly, equally undeliverable—promise on local income tax.

The Liberal Democrats cannot blame the Government for this increase. The Government increased the grant for City of York council by 5.5 per cent. this year, which is twice the rate of inflation. The provisional settlement gave us a 4.3 per cent. increase—a Government grant of more than £100 million for the first time. I went into battle for the City of York, and I will support the council tax payers in my constituency irrespective of which party controls the council. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Local and Regional Government listened to what was being said, saw what was happening on the ground and increased the Government's support for the City of York by a further £1.2 million, taking the overall increase in Government grant to 5.5 per cent. So the 8.5 per cent. increase in council tax imposed by the Liberal Democrat council in York has not come about because of a poor funding settlement from central Government. It has come about because of a failure of the Liberal Democrat administration in York to control its own soar-away spending.

So, although York still has one of the lowest council taxes in the country, thanks to a legacy of prudent financial management by a Labour council for a good many years, it came within a hair's breadth of being capped this year. The limit set by my right hon. Friend the Minister was an 8.5 per cent. increase in council tax or a 6.5 per cent. increase in the overall council budget. By luck rather than judgment, City of York came in with a council tax increase of exactly 8.5 per cent., and a budget increase of exactly 6.5 per cent. So, had it come in with a council tax increase that was any higher, and had there been just one more council in England to be capped, it would have been the City of York. That is a remarkable turnaround in its financial fortunes in just one year, and it ought to be a stark warning to the Liberal Democrats in control of the council that they have to get their soar-away spending under control before next year.

The Liberal Democrat income tax proposal is a magician's sleight of hand, because it seeks to move attention from the real world of high-cost Liberal Democrat councils to a fantasy world in which everybody is led to believe that somebody else will pay their council tax bill. Who will pay? Hon. Members should not look at the Liberal Democrats' costings, because, like the £100 cash-back offer last year, they will vanish overnight. Instead, they should look at CIPFA's analysis, which was prepared for the cross-party balance of funding review.

CIPFA estimates that the Liberal Democrat income tax proposal, which will vary from council to council because it is local, would raise the basic rate from between 3.2p to 6.5p in the pound. That proposal will hit many people on low incomes in places such as York who do not pay council tax at the moment, while excluding some people on high incomes who pay council tax.

Yorkshire has on average the lowest council tax in England, but it does not have the lowest average incomes, so the Liberal Democrat plans for a local income tax would mean higher bills for working families in Yorkshire. What about people with second homes in York, Harrogate, the Yorkshire dales, or the North York moors? They will not have to pay a penny under the Liberal Democrat local income tax proposals. What about millionaires, who, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Turner) said, are not on PAYE and live off investment income? They will not be touched by the Liberal Democrats' proposals.

I do not want to prejudice the outcome of the balance of funding review, but tonight I seek an assurance from my right hon. Friend the Minister that, at this stage at least, the Government do not intend to increase income tax for hard-working families while at the same time letting off some better-off households from paying local taxes altogether. That is precisely what the Liberal Democrat motion proposes.

9.32 pm

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay) (LD): Over the years, each Minister who has spoken on local government has presented to the House the claim that their local government settlement is the best ever. Of course, it always is, because with inflation that will always be so, but Government inflation is based on retail price inflation, not the inflation rate that councils across the country have to meet.

According to a survey by Barclays bank, the public sector inflation rate in the past 12 months was some 7 per cent. If the average council received an increase of 5.5 per cent., every council received a real-terms decrease in central Government funding. The claim that such and such a council got well above the retail price inflation rate is true—it is not a lie—but it is never the whole story. It misleads and confuses the public over whether the Chancellor should get a pat on the back for his Budget, or whether councillors should get it in the neck for the high council tax.

The council tax has three failings. I shall speak from the point of view of my constituency in particular. Labour Members—the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Turner), for example, cannot see that under local income tax the people of Wigan would pay less in tax than they pay under council tax—are misunderstanding local income tax, or are happy for their constituents to pay more.

Mr. Neil Turner: I realise that the hon. Gentleman is short of time, but I have to point out that well over 90 per cent. of households in Wigan are in bands A and B, and that is why they would pay more in income tax than in council tax.

Mr. Sanders: The hon. Gentleman has read the tax base figures, but he is incorrect. People in Wigan would pay far less under local income tax, given local incomes.

There are three fundamental flaws in the council tax. First, the grant system is based on historic spend. An authority such as mine, once part of a large shire county with historically low spending patterns, never catches up.

Mr. Cameron: The hon. Gentleman says that the council tax is fundamentally flawed. Why, then, are the Liberal Democrats not getting rid of it in Scotland?

Mr. Sanders: We would like to, if we were in government in Scotland, but we are not. We believe in devolution and different solutions fought for by different people.

Historic spending patterns mean that our grant is kept low and that we never catch up. Secondly, the grant formula is linked to the tax base. If an area has a high base, it gets less money in central Government grant.

[Mr. Sanders]

The third flaw lies in demand for services. In an area such as mine, where there is historic low spending, high house prices and low incomes, and simultaneously there is ever-rising demand for services, as is often the case in seaside resorts because of demographic changes as economically inactive people migrate there and elderly people remain alive longer, demand for services rises faster than the grant formula can keep up with.

There is a further problem, too. Out of the chunk of central Government money that goes to local government, increasing amounts have been top-sliced for a few local authorities that have been able successfully to bid for them. In a sense, the year-on-year increase of that which is available to all councils goes up, but for those that cannot access that top-sliced funding, the amount does not go up by anything like as much as the Government would claim.

I received figures from the local government Minister following a written question last week that show the impact of that. In my constituency, residents are worth £26 per head less than those in the average unitary authority; I compare like with like because it is unfair to compare unitary authority figures with those for other tiers of local government. For a council that is successful in getting access to top-sliced funding, the ratio is even bigger. Our nearest successful neighbour is Plymouth, where residents get £101 per head more than the residents in my council area. If my local authority got the same per head Government grant funding as Plymouth, we could have cut council tax by a quarter this year without cutting services.

Let me put straight something referred to earlier that needs to be corrected. There are toilet closures in my constituency, but we are gearing up for a bumper summer season and our lifeblood is tourism. I am not aware of any beach or tourist area that will be without a public convenience. The closures have been carefully chosen, and some of those closed will reopen as a result of a local initiative. The hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen), whose constituency covers part of Torbay, which is a tourist resort, must be corrected. No tourist should be put off as a consequence of his misinformation.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): He was talking down Torbay.

Mr. Sanders: That is right.

There is a perverse capping logic. Our council tax in the past two or three years has been lower than those of our neighbours in Devon and Plymouth, and our council tax is the second lowest in Devon. Why, then, are the neighbouring authorities not capped? Simply, the answer is that the increase has come this year, and this year brings important elections for the Labour party in metropolitan areas. Capping will therefore fall on my constituents because of Labour's electoral chances.

I must finish now to allow my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Matthew Green) to wind up, but I have one final question for the Minister. He attacked a local income tax on the grounds that many people could evade it. If it is such a big problem, what are the Government doing about all those income tax evaders who fail to make a contribution?

9.40 pm

Matthew Green (Ludlow) (LD): This debate has shown the House at its worst. The public always say that there is too much yah-boo in the conduct of our business. When my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) stood up today, he had a well written speech—

David Taylor: Why didn't he use it?

Matthew Green: The hon. Gentleman is still at it. My hon. Friend had a well written contribution to make to the debate on local government finance, but the representatives of the Labour and Conservative parties clearly had no intention of debating local government finance. They just wanted to play yah-boo politics. However, I will try to answer some of the questions that have emerged from the debate.

The Minister claimed that the Government were reducing ring-fencing. We could achieve a cross-party consensus on that, but the Minister must accept that passporting is ring-fencing in all but name. As long as the Government passport education, which is more than 50 per cent. of local government finance, the funds are dictated by central Government. It does not matter whether it is called passporting or ring-fencing: it is the same thing. The change of word does not let the Minister off the hook. If the Minister promised to tackle passporting, we would be happy, but I suspect that he would then invent another word for it and claim that he had dealt with the first two problems.

The Minister said that the Liberal Democrats should tell our councils to get a grip and lower their council taxes. That comes from a Labour party that has a policy of new localism. I understood that new localism meant giving extra powers to councils and letting them decide issues for themselves. The Liberal Democrats believe that councils should be left to take their own decisions and to face the electorate on that basis, but this Labour Government think that such matters should be decided by central diktat. The Minister cannot have it both ways: he must choose between new localism and capping.

The Minister mentioned capping and I shall give a local example. West Mercia police have been nominated for capping for next year. That authority has had some large council tax rises recently, including 33 per cent. a few years ago. However, I have not had a single letter of complaint about that rise, and I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Marsden) and the hon. Member for Telford (David Wright), who is no longer in his place, would say the same. That is because the authority was waiting for extra money from central Government, which never came, so in order to deploy 200 extra officers the police authority—

Mr. Paul Marsden (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (LD): My hon. Friend is right, but I had thousands of letters about soaring council tax increases—even though the Government said in 1997 that they would make the council tax fairer. People are happy with the increase in the council tax precept by West Mercia police authority that will supply 15 extra bobbies on the beat, because the authority is accountable and people feel that they have more control over that decision.

Matthew Green: My hon. Friend is right. The Government have capped an authority that the public support because it has increased the number of officers. The Government are getting it wrong and they should withdraw the proposals to cap that authority.

The Minister would not read out the four advantages of local income tax that were identified by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy. He clearly has not read the document in detail, as he did not know that it mentioned five, not six, disadvantages. I want to pick up on the first of those advantages, because a lot has been said about the balance of funding. CIPFA says that one of the main advantages of LIT would be that it is "capable of effecting a real shift in the balance of funding".

Mr. Neil Turner: How?

Matthew Green: Because once it is in place, one can, over successive years, reduce national income tax and shift it on to local income tax. That shift in the balance of funding could be effected in other ways. For example, the shadow Chancellor proposed in a speech in February that the proportion that is raised locally should rise and that the amount coming through central Government grant should be cut. However, he also said that council tax is the vehicle to do it. That would effectively mean that were one to, say, double the amount raised locally, council tax would double. One might cut national income tax, but one would double council tax. However one looks at it, shifting the balance of funding means reducing national tax and increasing local tax. The easiest way of doing that is through local income tax, as CIPFA says.

I am short of time, but I do not want to miss the opportunity to welcome the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) to his post. Speaking for the Conservatives on local government finance is a bit like being handed a hospital pass. If the hon. Gentleman has ever played rugby, he will know what I am talking about. We would love to be able to debate the issue across all three parties, but the difficulty is that the Conservatives have no policy at the moment.

We know that the Government are thinking about, and consulting on, a new policy. However, I have here the Labour party's local government supplementary manifesto to its 1997 general election manifesto. [HON. MEMBERS: "Yah-boo!"] It is not yah-boo—it is a serious point. The manifesto said:

"Labour proposes to return the business rate to local control as part of our commitment to improved partnership with local business. We are consulting widely on our plans to ensure that any changes bring maximum benefit to local businesses."

We share the aim of restoring business rates to local control, but I hope that the first question that the Under-Secretary addresses is this: what was the response to that consultation, and why are the Government still consulting seven years later?

The hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Turner) asked about millionaires and why we would cap the tax at £100,000. I am not sure how many millionaires' houses he has seen, but at the moment even if they live in the biggest of houses they pay only three times what is paid by the occupants of the smallest of houses—that is, about twice the amount of band D. The highest amount that a millionaire anywhere in the country pays is about £2,500. Under our proposals, they would pay quite a bit more.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): Not enough.

Matthew Green: The hon. Gentleman says that it is not enough, but what do his Government propose to do to make millionaires pay more? If they had any such proposals, we would welcome them.

The hon. Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) mentioned excellent authorities, but I am afraid that his Whips' briefing missed one out—Cambridge is an excellent authority with majority Liberal Democrat control.

Hugh Bayley rose—

Matthew Green: I cannot give way, because I have only a minute left.

The hon. Gentleman—this is the most telling point—described the idea of local income tax as being for people living in a fantasy world. Clearly, then, people in the United States, Japan and most of Europe live in a fantasy world, because that is where local income tax is used and works. The fact is that local income tax is a fair solution, whereas council tax is an iniquitous tax that hits the poorest and pensioners hardest. The Government should agree with us about scrapping that unfair Tory tax instead of trying to defend the status quo.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): We have had a short debate led by the Liberal Democrats. If they were intending to use it to try to boost their chances in the forthcoming local elections, it was an utter failure. We have yet to see a more lamentable performance in the House.

I welcome the hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) on his first appearance at the Dispatch Box. Although we are never quite sure who is who on the Tory Front Bench, it is good to see him there. His performance was good on style but somewhat lacking in substance—I shall come to that in a moment.

As we are debating local government finance, I remind the House about Labour's record over the last seven years: a real-terms grant increase of 30 per cent. and the longest period of sustained investment in local government in recent decades. This year the grant increase for local councils was 5.5 per cent. Furthermore, we have removed some of the ring-fencing, and that process will continue.

As my right hon. Friend the Minister reminded the House, Labour councils have the lowest council tax increases this year: the figure is 4.7 per cent. for Labour councils and 5.4 per cent for Tory councils, but Liberal Democrat councils are top of the shop with council tax increases of 6 per cent. I am also pleased to say that Labour councils are doing well in their comprehensive performance assessments.

The missing Liberal Democrat £100 has been mentioned but Members have neglected to mention the extra Labour £100. This year, there is a one-off payment of £100 for pensioners aged over 70 to help them with their council tax costs.

I turn to the substance of the debate—the Liberal Democrat motion. There has been a noticeable absence of Liberal Democrat Members in the debate, although one or two are coming into the Chamber at this late stage. My hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) gave an eloquent and devastating exposure of what it is like when Liberal Democrats are in control of local authorities. They lose control of their budgets and find that they are at risk—a clear message to every elector that if they want sensible budgeting and good-quality services they should support Labour councils.

We have heard that the Liberal Democrats propose to sweep away all council tax—to abolish property taxes entirely and replace them with a local income tax under their popular slogan, "Axe the Tax". Of course, when they say "Axe the Tax", they forget to say, "Oh, by the way we'll have to put up another tax to pay for it": only a minor point of detail. We would not want to remind them too much about that but for the fact that it will mean between 3 and 6 per cent. on income tax. So, "Axe the tax (oh, and we'll put up your income tax)" might be a rather more accurate description of Liberal Democrat policy.

Moreover, the Liberal Democrats are not actually going to axe the tax. What do they plan to do about second homes? Second homes will still be subject to a form of property tax. There will continue to be a business levy, or rate, on every second home in the country, which means we shall have to count all those second homes, value them and then tax them. That sounds to me like a property tax, which they have just pledged, under "Axe the Tax", to sweep away. Not only will the Liberal Democrats maintain a property tax, they will also increase income tax. We shall get a double whammy from the Liberal Democrats.

By introducing a local income tax, the Liberal Democrats will attack people such as students. As most Members know, students or nurses in training do not pay council tax. However, a nurse in training who earned some money at weekends or during the holidays and started to pay income tax would be caught by the local income tax, so a new set of people would have to pay local income tax.

The Liberal Democrat sums do not add up—we had that debate in February. They said that they would pay for all their proposals through an increase on the higher rate of council tax that will generate £4.7 billion. They would spend about £6.2 billion in local tax and £1.7 billion on raising the income tax threshold to £5,000 and they would spend on higher education and on care for the elderly. We have costed a list of Liberal Democrat promises and it comes to £6.2 billion, yet they will raise only £4.7 billion.

That seems to be a bit of a gap. It is only £1.5 billion, but that is the Liberal Democrats' finances. Perhaps they might like to spend time at a numeracy summer school to try to get it right in future.

The Liberal Democrats' other great slogan is, "Scrap the cap". That sounds a great idea; we will not put a cap on. What happened to the Liberals' concern for pensioners on low incomes? "Scrap the cap", but what do we see? They would allow local councils to put council taxes through the roof. That is why we have introduced capping to bring down council taxes this year. It is important to protect pensioners on low incomes.

We then come to the great cheque that bounced—the £100 that came and went. Now you see it; now you don't. It is another bit of Liberal Democrat magic for the House. They are not so much pulling a rabbit out of a hat as trying to stuff it rapidly back in as they realise that they cannot afford to pay for it. The Lib Dem agenda is higher income tax, more bureaucracy, sums that do not add up and a U-turn. That is just about right for the Liberal Democrats.

I would not want this Liberal Democrat-led debate to divert attention entirely from the Conservatives and their proposals for local government. It is interesting that their amendment to the Liberal Democrat motion says absolutely nothing about their proposals for the future of local government funding. So I thought that I would remind the House of one or two proposals that we know are now in the public domain.

The first thing is that the Conservatives will not repeat their poll tax disaster; for that, we can be thankful. However, they made a record 7 per cent. cut in local government funding in the last four years of the Tory Government. Have they learned that that was probably not a good idea? No, because they have a shadow Cabinet that represents a recession in waiting. For the first two years, if they got back into office, they would cut spending on local councils by no less than £2 billion. That is not just cuts, but hacking off whole services at a local level.

We have heard some excellent contributions in the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. Turner) spoke, and the budget of his council in Wigan would be cut by no less than £13 million in the first two years of a Tory Government. The budget of the council in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for City of York would be cut by £5 million if the Tories got back in. The hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss) talked about the capping of Fenland. If his party got back in power, the first thing he would be doing is explaining to his councillors why it was going to cut £350,000 from Fenland's budget. That is the impact of Conservative policies.

There would not just be cuts for everyone and cuts across the board. The Conservatives would remove resource equalisation, which involves spending more for those who need it most. The sum total of Tory policy is not only cuts for everybody, but cuts for those councils in the areas with the most vulnerable people who need the resources and services the most.

I might add that the Tories have promised that they would scrap the comprehensive performance assessment and the best value measures. I was trying to work out why that should be. Is it because they want to deny a good management tool for local government? No. Is it because they want to stop local citizens having information to make judgments? No. I shall tell the House what it is about. When they put their cuts in place, they do not want us to know about it. They do not want the citizens to know about it. It is a cover-up for the cuts that the Tories would introduce. We can sum up the Tories' agenda—cuts and cover-up. That is the Conservative way.

Let me draw to a conclusion on where we are going next. We have seen that the Liberal Democrats' proposals involve higher taxes, more muddle, more bureaucracy and reneging on their promises. From the Conservatives, we have seen that, if they got back into power, there would be cut upon cut, with services and councils finding themselves unable to deal with that.

The hon. Member for North-East Cambridgeshire complained about capping, but his views were in direct contradiction to those expressed by those on the Opposition Front Bench, who have said that they would support capping and keep capping reserve powers if they needed them. He should ensure that his local councillors understand the difference between his position and that of those on the Opposition Front Bench.

Where are we now? We have a Labour Government who are investing in local services and investing 30 per cent. more in local government than the other parties. We are in a position of lower council tax increases—

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove) (LD) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Tellers for the Noes: Mr. Hugo Swire and Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown

Question accordingly agreed to.

MR. SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the Government support for local government with its 30 per cent. real terms increase in grant since 1997; notes that the average increase in council tax in 2004-05 is the lowest for nine years; supports the Government's proposals to take action against a number of authorities which have set excessive budgets and council tax increases in 2004-05; and looks forward to the report of the Balance of Funding Review of how local government in England is funded which is due in summer 2004.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

HUMAN RIGHTS

That the draft Human Rights Act 1998 (Amendment) Order 2004, which was laid before this House on 22nd April, be approved.—[Gillian Merron.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, for the purposes of its approval, the draft Guidance proposed to be issued under section 182 of the Licensing Act 2003, which was laid before this House on 23rd March, shall be treated as if it were an instrument subject to Standing Order No. 118 (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation).—[Gillian Merron.]

Bus Re-regulation (Manchester)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Gillian Merron.]

10.30 pm

Mr. Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley) (Lab): I am grateful for this opportunity to debate the catastrophic effects of the deregulation of buses in 1986 and the potential for re-regulating the bus system in Manchester and other metropolitan and county areas.

This is not a dry academic subject based on economic theory or the history of transport legislation; it is a real story of people in my constituency whose lives have been and are being damaged because of the ineffectiveness of the bus system. I could spend the time allotted to me for this Adjournment debate just going through my casework. There are hundreds of cases of people who are upset and complain that, because the 149 does not turn up, they have missed hospital appointments, or because the 151 service is withdrawn they have difficulty getting to work.

In parts of my constituency, fewer than a third of people have access to a car and therefore are particularly dependent on buses and vulnerable when those buses do not turn up. It is a little known fact that outside London, Manchester, at 22 per cent., has the highest percentage of people using buses. It is well known that one of the largest factors keeping unemployed people from employment is their lack of access to transport. It is estimated from surveys that 40 per cent. of people give that as a reason for not getting a job. Therefore, failures in the bus system have a terrific economic impact and a terrific impact on those who want to use North Manchester general hospital.

A particular problem in my constituency in north Manchester has been the extremely poor performance of First group in providing services. Some 12 months ago, in one week in particular, it had 600 failures, which meant that the bus did not turn up. That means that if only 10 people wanted to use each service, 6,000 people that week were stranded or had to wait for the next service. When the passenger transport authority considered its reliability performances, it was found that on its 10-minute services a third were not making the scheduled time, and on its 15-minute services 20 per cent. were not running to schedule.

On point-to-point fares, First group has higher fares on every rate and distance compared with Stagecoach in the south of Manchester. Its weekly ticket is more expensive, although some saver tickets are better than those of other bus companies operating in the area. But overall, its performance on reliability, punctuality and fares is appalling, and that is still the case. More recently, it has averaged 300 failures a week, so there was not just a peak 12 months ago. The service has been consistently bad.

First group's appalling performance created a crisis before Christmas—it has given a number of reasons to explain why that happened. It claimed that it did not have enough drivers; but when it recruited drivers, it did not have the engineers to start the buses, so the problem did not involve drivers because the buses simply were not there.

[Mr. Graham Stringer]

When the Transport Act 1985 went through this House, it was not envisaged that that would happen because competition was supposed to ensure that an ineffective, badly operated company, which First group is in north Manchester, could not succeed. Other bus companies should have come in, provided a better service and competed on fares, the market should have worked well and the passengers should have been happy.

That has not happened because the people who framed the 1985 Act got it wrong. Nationally, 85 per cent. of the market has been consolidated by five companies, and that situation has been replicated in Greater Manchester. In the north and west of the city, First group run between 80 and 85 per cent. of services, and Stagecoach has a similar dominance of the market in the south of the city. Although about 40 bus companies operate in Greater Manchester, two of them dominate the market. That is a cartel—a monopoly situation—and it was not supposed to happen under the 1985 Act. I am happy to call the situation a cartel, because if it has got a black, cold nose, it wags its tail and it barks, then it is a dog. The two major operators in Manchester engage in little competition and they form a cartel that disadvantages the travelling public.

What are the remedies? The 1985 Act did not work in the way in which it was envisaged. I have written to the Office of Fair Trading on a number of occasions, and it always asks, "Where is your evidence that there is anti-competitive behaviour? Where is your evidence that meetings have taken place between Stagecoach and First group to arrange those anti-competitive practices?" I do not have such evidence. The evidence is that services are poor and that competition is lacking. The OFT says, "The market should take care of that."

The Transport Committee has seen that the OFT does not have a high regard for evidence because the OFT relies on dogma and theory. When it argued the case for deregulated hackney carriages, we took evidence in the Transport Committee showing that where taxis are deregulated, against theoretical expectations fares increase beyond the average and waiting times increase. It simply ignored that evidence and said that competition would drive down fares and waiting times, which has not happened in practice, and it views bus services in a similar way.

I do not know whether you have seen "Planet of the Apes", Mr. Deputy Speaker. The OFT reminds me of the apes who were in charge of the planet and who believed that flight was impossible. When the human beings, who had travelled forward in time, made a paper aeroplane, the apes simply did not believe that it flew. That is how the OFT operates. For an integrated, effective transport system, we need integrated routes so that the timetables meet and people can change from one bus to another. The OFT says that that is anti-competitive and it tries to stop the co-ordination of services. It has failed within the bus industry, and it has no role in examining buses.

Let us consider the traffic commissioner, with whom I believe the Greater Manchester passenger transport authority is in communication. If it was effective in persuading her of the unreliability and lack of punctuality of First group, what are her remedies? They are to fine the company or tell it to remove the service. Removing the service would not be helpful to the people whom I represent when other groups prefer not to operate those routes. First group sometimes tells me that that is because its computer systems try to reduce the dead mileage between the destination and the garages. If that means that it stays on the same routes and does not compete much with Stagecoach and other operators, that is another method of getting computers to arrange an anti-competitive contract for the company.

What remedies exist in the Transport Act 2000? Can we have a quality contract that would enable the specification of service levels and fares and ensure that competition occurred at the tendering stage, with the public sector controlling the routes? I welcome the fact that the Under-Secretary is consulting on reducing the 21-month rule for introducing a quality contract when the scheme has been agreed. However, I do not believe that there is much hope that Greater Manchester or anywhere else can go down the quality contracts route because the hurdle in section 124 of having to prove that a quality contract is the only practicable way of implementing the authority's policies is simply too high.

In Coventry, which tried to introduce a quality contract, Arriva flooded the area with buses and claimed that there was no need. It might take three and a half or four and a half years to implement a quality contract. If the bus operators do not want it, they can change what they are doing to prevent the PTA from surmounting the legislative hurdle.

What is happening in Manchester and Greater Manchester? Since deregulation in 1986, a drop in passengers of between 30 and 40 per cent. has occurred in all metropolitan areas, including Greater Manchester. There is potentially good news in the bare statistics, which show that, during the past three or four years, the number of people who use buses in Manchester has increased by 6 per cent. However, when we look into that, we find that it has made the position worse because the major operators, not only in Greater Manchester but in other metropolitan areas, are consolidating their services on the main routes, where they pick up more passengers, but withdrawing from the non-radial and cross-conurbation routes and from marginal areas. That leads to social isolation and makes using buses more difficult.

Companies are also withdrawing services from the weekends and times outside the rush hour. They put more and more buses on the radial routes and during the morning and evening rush hours. People who want to travel at other times are finding it difficult to do so. That led the National Audit Office, in its recent report on trams, to point out that it is not a sensible use of public money to have private sector operators competing against a light railway system. The Government have put money—I hope that they will put some more—into the tram system in Greater Manchester.

When bus companies consolidate on the radial routes, it means that, if the PTA wants to keep the routes going, it must put the route up for tender. The costs to the PTA in Greater Manchester have more than doubled to £13 million. There is little competition and the bus companies that previously ran the routes tender for them, usually at a considerably higher cost. That is the experience throughout the country.

We find the public sector supporting the buses through concessionary fares in increasing amounts—it is between £55 million to £60 million in Greater Manchester. Also, it is not widely recognised that, as the buses travel backwards and forwards more on the radial routes, they are doing more miles, even though they are going to fewer places. Even when passenger numbers were decreasing, the buses were making that first consolidation and doing more miles, which means that they get more bus service operator grant.

More money is going into concessionary fares—£60 million in the case of Greater Manchester—via supported tendered services, and the bus service operator grant is going up as mileage goes up, yet we are getting a worse service. In fact, public money is being used to isolate communities and make the public transport system worse. I do not find it tolerable that public money should be used in that way. It is a fact that throughout the metropolitan areas, 30 to 40 per cent. of the bus services' income comes from the public purse, but the passenger transport authorities and county councils have no control over how that money is used. The travelling public find that very difficult to understand.

I believe that bus services should be re-regulated, but they are opposed to that idea. That is not surprising. The one area that was not deregulated in 1986 was London. There, the bus companies get 8 per cent. of their income from the public purse, whereas those in the metropolitan areas get considerably more than that. Over the period since deregulation, and with very low subsidies, there has not been the loss of passengers in Greater London that there has been in the metropolitan areas, and with more money going into the system, we are now seeing huge increases in the number of passengers using buses in Greater London. The Government have to answer this question: why, if a regulated scheme is good enough for London, is it not good enough for the rest of the country? It is better for the travelling public and for the public purse, people know what they are getting for their money, and the system is transparent.

I should like to finish by citing my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister, who was asked on at least two occasions when he came before the Select Committee whether it was possible to have an integrated transport system without re-regulating the buses. He was clear and unambiguous in his response, which was that that was impossible, because it is not possible to co-ordinate the services to the benefit of the travelling public. I agree with him that that is the case.

I hope that the Government will listen to the arguments and consider re-regulating the buses, whether through a pilot scheme or in some other way, because the pathway to a more sensible use of public money and to a more effective transport system—not just in Manchester but throughout the country—is through a different system from the one that we have. At the moment, the bus companies are laughing all the way to the bank. They are taking more and more money from the Exchequer and providing a service that is less and less good for the travelling public. That is leading to social exclusion and keeping people from jobs and from access to health and education services.

I do not expect my hon. Friend the Minister to stand up and say, "Yes, we will do that tomorrow", but I hope that he and the Government realise the power of the arguments that have been put tonight and that the current situation is not a sensible way of providing a transport system or of using public money.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Stringer) on securing this debate, on his contribution to the discussion on bus regulation and on recognising the importance of buses to Manchester. I can cheerfully say that I shall not disappoint him, as I am not going to say, "Yes, you can have all you want." The significance of this debate lies in a recognition—much overdue in many areas of the debate on transport—of the importance of buses.

Buses provide two thirds of all public transport journeys, and they are key to making public transport a viable alternative to the car. As my hon. Friend suggests, they also play a vital role in tackling congestion and, crucially, promoting access and inclusion. I welcome this opportunity to set out what the Government are doing to make buses central to our integrated transport strategy.

My hon. Friend alluded to the fact that buses can deliver and are beginning to do so. We have set the target of securing a 12 per cent. increase in the use of local public transport—buses and light rail—by 2010, while improving the accessibility, punctuality and reliability of services. The latest figures for England show a 3 per cent. overall increase last year, including London. Despite my hon. Friend's caveats, Greater Manchester has contributed to that, with bus patronage up 6 per cent. since 1999–2000. I congratulate both cities on that.

To dwell on the wider context for a moment, progress is already being made on fleet modernisation. The average age of the bus fleet has fallen from 9.6 to 8.1 years over the past 10 years and some 30 per cent. of full-sized buses are accessible for wheelchairs. As my hon. Friend will know, there have been significant advances in CCTV and other dimensions, not least real-time information equipment.

Of course, to achieve patronage growth and service improvement, a number of key factors have to be brought together: investment in traffic management, quality, partnership and the appropriate regulatory framework all have a role to play, as indeed does strong political leadership.

My hon. Friend has made the case for re-regulation, and I listened to his arguments carefully. I know others share his view. I certainly agree that it is essential that a city such as Manchester has high-quality bus services as part of a modern, integrated transport system. We are keen to help to create the conditions to make that happen, but we need to look closely at how best to go about it.

The fully tendered system, which my hon. Friend referred to and which operates in London, has produced impressive increases in bus patronage. Ken Livingstone has shown that buses can deliver a quality service and help to tackle congestion when combined with traffic restraint. I welcome that progress, but London is unique in its size and complexity, and it has one of the largest and most comprehensive urban transport systems in the world. Furthermore, as my hon. Friend will know, London was at a different starting point in terms of regulation. We have to think carefully before assuming that replicating the London arrangements is a necessary or sufficient condition for delivering better bus services elsewhere. It is important to recognise both that the existing regulatory framework has strengths and that that system has not been tested to the extremes or as much as could have been the case. The existing regulatory framework has the scope to encourage innovation—responding to customer needs, providing choice and attracting new custom. Many operators have risen to the challenge; indeed, Stagecoach Manchester won an award for its Unirider summer online ticket scheme at the 2003 bus industry awards.

Our experience is that the effectiveness of bus services depends on the level of partnership between local authorities and bus operators. Partnership has shown that it can deliver in some places, and we are keen to build on that. The Bus Partnership Forum has been helping to take this forward by producing many useful resources and sharing best practice.

Where that is not happening, the existing legislation makes provision for strengthening the hand of local transport authorities. The Transport Act 2000 offers a number of avenues for local authorities to pursue if appropriate. As my hon. Friend said, those include statutory quality partnerships and quality contracts. The latter allow authorities to plan and control bus services within a designated area. That can include fares, routes, timetables and driver training.

The legislative framework is already in place. The task is to make it work. We are keen to remove barriers to the introduction of a quality contract where the criteria set down in the 2000 Act can be met, and I am grateful for my hon. Friend's kind words on the consultation to reduce significantly the 21-month statutory minimum waiting period before implementation of a scheme. We are analysing the results of that consultation, and we will shortly publish for consultation guidance on applying for a quality contract. That is important, not least because metropolitan and other areas have suggested that the 21-month period has been an impediment to the regulatory framework, and we are happy to consider that.

My hon. Friend kindly made much of the amount of money going into bus services in Manchester and elsewhere, in both revenue and capital terms. That is an important part of the mix of factors that have to be brought to bear. In December, we announced a £1.9 billion capital settlement for local transport—an increase of more than £200 million on the previous year, much of which is for bus-related projects. Indeed, we have approved £26.3 million for the Greater Manchester quality bus network.

I certainly take to heart my hon. Friend's points about social inclusion. More funding is being provided for urban and rural bus challenges. Greater Manchester was notably successful in the 2003 awards, securing £2 million for six new schemes, among them precisely the sort of schemes that fill the social inclusion gap to which my hon. Friend referred. It is not the fault of people living in communities on a particular side of our great towns and cities if, for whatever historical reason, the key employment activity on that side of town has diminished or entirely gone so that most economic activity is on the other side of town. We are working closely with operators and local authorities to fill those gaps where restoring a fully fledged route would not be appropriate.

I totally agree that it is vital that we get the best use out of the public funding that goes into buses in terms of achieving our objectives. We have been looking at that in the bus subsidy review and the current spending review, the outcomes of which are due this summer. I urge just a little patience on my hon. Friend in that regard, but it is right and proper given the amount of money going in from a range of sources, including bus service operator grant and the challenge funds, that we should look to see whether we are getting entirely the service and return that we need for that investment.

I entirely agree that reliability is crucial. I am aware of the service delivery issues raised by my hon. Friend with First in northern Manchester. As he said, some of the problems have been caused by staff shortages and others by the absence of vehicles. The traffic commissioners have a vital enforcement role, and they are currently working with the bus partnership forum on gleaning better data about bus performance. I hope that Greater Manchester passenger transport executive and First can work together to ensure that users experience better service levels in problem areas.

Reliability also depends on local traffic conditions and traffic management issues such as congestion. We are encouraging local authorities to implement bus priorities to help tackle that. My hon. Friend will know that there is at best a mixed picture nationwide on that, and I believe that keenly focused operators, sharp political leadership and such things as bus priority measures are equally important to securing the service that we need. In addition, the Traffic Management Bill currently going through its parliamentary stages contains provision to encourage the smooth flow of traffic in local areas and reduce disruption caused by street works.

In recent months, we have had discussions with the Greater Manchester authorities, and others around England, about the focus of their next local transport plans. I am heartened by the amount of common ground that we have found. Greater Manchester has made huge strides in recent years—not only in patronage, although I take on board what my hon. Friend said about that. The new night bus has been very successful and trials of yellow buses are showing that they can improve safety and cut congestion.

The Government's vision is of an integrated system that encourages the use of public transport as well as offering choice. Buses are essential in that regard, but we need the right framework of regulation. We are looking in the round at public subsidy for buses.

I thank my hon. Friend for his comments and his contribution, and I wish him well in his desire to see buses playing a greater, more efficient role in Manchester as they fulfil their role in the integrated transport system that Manchester and all our urban and rural areas deserve. Whatever discussions we have about the regulatory framework, it is absolutely clear to the Government that buses are central to all that we are trying to do, not just on public transport and integrated transport, but in terms of exclusion—

Oral Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Camera Safety Partnerships

1. Mr Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Whether he has discussed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer ring-fencing revenue raised from camera safety partnerships for road safety purposes. [173493]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): The rules of the safety camera programme provide that the resources from speeding and jumping traffic lights are ring-fenced and can be applied solely to safety cameras, enforcement and information.

Mr. Mackay: Surely the Secretary of State realises that that is not good enough. First, speed cameras are raising huge sums of extra money as an alternative form of taxation. Secondly, they are not improving road safety. Thirdly, would it not be better if the ring-fencing, if he needs it, included driver instruction?

Mr. Darling: On the right hon. Gentleman's first point, the vast majority of the money that is raised goes back into the cost of installing and operating the cameras. I think that I am right in saying that about £17 million, which is a small fraction of what the Department spends, goes back to the Treasury. The important point is that all the evidence says that speed cameras do reduce the number of serious injuries. The right hon. Gentleman can shake his head if he wants to, but it is worth reflecting on the fact that the last independent study that was carried out showed a 35 per cent. reduction in the number of people killed or seriously injured. I would have thought that the time had come when road safety should not be a political football, but an issue that unites all Members of the House in ensuring that fewer people are killed and seriously injured on our roads.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Some parts of the country, such as Staffordshire, have speed awareness courses for offenders who exceed the speed limit by only a small margin. The running costs of those courses are paid by the offenders themselves, but they involve some set-up costs and a little bit of capital. Would it not make sense to allow money from speeding fines to pay for such courses to be available all over the country?

Mr. Darling: I am not sure that I would want to do anything that actively encouraged people to think about collecting fines for the purpose of generating income. As I have said on countless occasions, the best speed camera is one that does not collect a single penny in income because it has persuaded people to slow down.

The House will be aware that the Government shortly want to consult on a more variable scheme that allows fewer points to be imposed where someone is found to have gone marginally over the speed limit, with perhaps a greater penalty if they drive far too fast. One of the options that we want to consider with the Association of Chief Police Officers is whether, as an alternative to fines, we could introduce driver awareness courses. The objective must be to get across to people that speed kills. A person who is hit by a car going at 40 mph has a 90 per cent. chance of being killed. We need to get that lesson across to people. This should not be about raising money, but about encouraging people to drive safely.

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): This is a red letter day for Transport questions. For five months, the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson), the roads Minister, has stood at the Dispatch Box during Transport questions rubbishing Conservative policies on speed cameras; now, the Government have started to adopt them. On 21 April, we produced a 10-point plan for road safety. Two days ago, the Government announced that they would introduce variable penalty points for those caught speeding by cameras—number four of our 10 points. We welcome the Government's conversion. If the Secretary of State adopts one of our policies each time he has to face Transport questions, the world will become a better and safer place. Let me allow him to remove any remaining doubts that all he was doing on Sunday was producing a press release—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman mentioned Transport questions, and he must put a question.

Mr. Green: Can the Secretary of State tell us when the consultation period on this policy shift will end; and will he commit himself to introducing these changes before the end of this year?

Mr. Darling: What my colleague, the roads Minister, said was that at the beginning of this year the hon. Gentleman implied that some 4,000 cameras were in the wrong place. So far, as at 11 o'clock this morning, we have yet to hear from him about one such site.

In relation to our announcement over the weekend, there is limited value in trading political points as to who thought of what idea first, but if the hon. Gentleman wants to do that, I draw his attention to the fact that of his 10 points, four were already Government policy. As regards the variable system of penalty points, the Government first canvassed that idea in 2002.

However, in the light of the fact that every day 10 people are killed or seriously injured on our roads, would it not be better if we looked at measures that improved road safety, including reducing the speed at which people travel? I would have thought that we now have the opportunity to reach an all-party consensus in relation to such matters. If improvements can be made to speed cameras, let us make them. In addition to that, I hope next month to publish details of all speed camera sites in the country so that people can see why they are there and the difference that they are making.

I also hope to publish a further independent study, and we shall wait and see what progress has been made. However, I am optimistic that the campaign to reduce speed is having an effect.

Mr. Green: The Secretary of State did not answer the question about whether he would commit himself to doing anything about the matter. Of course we all want consensus—that is why I welcome the fact that he is adopting some of my policies. What does he say to the Police Federation, whose chairman said last week:

"I believe some cameras are there as a revenue generator. I think police get the blame for that. I think it has been quite destructive."?

Not only Conservative Members but the police, who have to enforce the traffic laws, say that the Government are wrong. They call for an audit of the position of every camera and we agree. Since the right hon. Gentleman is in the mood to adopt our policies, will he adopt the proposals for an audit of every camera position and end his current stance, which is dangerously damaging to relations between the police and the general public? He should know that, without the support of the police, he will not get better road safety in this country. He says that he is in favour of better road safety—will he adopt more of our sensible policies to achieve it?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman seems more concerned about what he regards as his policies than road safety. On the matters that he raised—inasmuch as I could discern them—we propose, as I said, to consult about a variable points system. We will do that next month and I hope that we can introduce legislation at the earliest opportunity.

The representative of the Police Federation said that some motorists, not the police generally, believe that the cameras are revenue generators. As I said previously, in the light of the controversy, I asked the Department to examine every site in the country with a view to publishing details of each camera site so that people can see why the cameras were put there and the difference that they make. I have no doubt that it will be necessary for me to ask the local partnerships to consider whether cameras should be present on some sites or whether they should be moved elsewhere. However, the vast majority save lives. It is interesting that—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must stop the Secretary of State and emphasise to Front-Bench Members that we have spent 10 minutes on one question. I must move on to Question 2.

Rail Passenger Services

2. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): What assessment has been made of the role for the public sector in the provision of rail passenger services. [173494]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): As I said in my statement to the House on 19 January, a key principle of the review is that the public and private partnership is right for the railways and will continue.

David Taylor: The Select Committee on Transport is disappointed in the Government's continued, apparently ideological insistence that the private sector is the only way in which rail passenger services can be provided. Will the Secretary of State explain why, if the public sector can be shown to be safer, more efficient and cheaper, it should not run rail passenger services? As a relatively dogma-free Minister, will he consider the Committee's call for a rethink about the option of retaining South Eastern Trains in public ownership?

Mr. Darling: On ideology, it is a big mistake to assume that everything that the public sector did on the railways was good and everything that the private sector has done is bad. My hon. Friend mentioned safety. The safety record of the railways has been improving year after year for several years.

Let me give hon. Members one reason why I believe that the public and private sectors should operate together. The private sector brings in approximately £11 million every day. Without the private sector, the public sector would have to find that money. I strongly believe that the public and private sectors can work together. That happens in many parts of the world. In this country, the relationship is not right and that is why I set up the review.

Mr. Archie Norman (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): The Secretary of State will know that the publicly-owned South Eastern Trains has performed reasonably well since it came into being under the stewardship of Michael Holden. Does he know that there are sinister rumours of a possible delay in the franchising process because of the disputes about timetabling in mid-Kent? Does he agree that the franchising process is already inordinately long and creates enormous uncertainty for investment, passengers and staff? Will he commit himself to doing everything possible to ensure that the process progresses according to the original timetable?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman will know that the Strategic Rail Authority is consulting on the Kent franchise at the moment, and it is important that that consultation tries to build as much consensus as possible. He will also know that many people in Kent have reservations about what is being proposed and are making strong representations about it. We need to get this right, and I agree with him that the objective must be to ensure that the franchising process is completed as quickly as possible, so that we can have a degree of certainty. I do not think that anything we are doing in the review will affect the Kent franchise; it certainly will not hold it up. What is needed is for the review to reach a conclusion as to what trains are necessary and when they ought to run.

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): Is the Minister aware that, according to a written answer from his Department, it is estimated that £3.85 million—nearly £4 million—is to be spent on tendering the integrated Kent franchise to facilitate the privatisation of South Eastern Trains? How much money has been spent on negotiating new passenger franchises since 1997? Would not that money have been better spent on direct investment in the rail services, rather than on wasteful franchises such as these?

Mr. Darling: No, I do not agree with my hon. Friend. While there are undoubtedly examples of franchising, and some franchisees, not having been as successful as they should have been, other examples show a better quality of service and better provision for passengers than there was in the past. I am happy to defend the fact that there is inevitably some expenditure involved in the franchising process. I strongly believe that having both private and public sector involvement in the railways is good, but it is important to ensure that the right framework and relationships exist, which is what the review process is designed to facilitate.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): I am sure that the Minister is aware that, since the South Eastern Trains franchise became an SRA company, there has been a 9 per cent. improvement in services. We have already heard that the proposals for the integrated Kent franchise have been widely condemned by passenger groups, Transport for London and councils. Will he not therefore accept the value of keeping that franchise in the public sector as a comparator of the public sector versus the private sector, especially as it seems rather a waste of £4 million to provide a franchise that does not meet passengers' aspirations?

Mr. Darling: As I said when we discussed South Eastern Trains at last month's Transport questions, there has been an improvement in performance right across the train operating companies in the south-east—not just in South Eastern Trains, which, as the hon. Gentleman says, is now being operated on behalf of the SRA, but in the companies in the private sector as well. Naturally, I am very glad that performance is improving. Indeed, at present, there are quite significant improvements in performance. The job for the railways is to ensure that that continues.

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley) (Lab): I wonder whether my right hon. Friend is aware that the recent report from the Transport Select Committee comments that:

"Nearly a third of the franchises were no longer expected to function in the entrepreneurial, risk-taking way that was one of the fundamental justifications for private sector involvement in running train services, but simply to function as fee paid agents of the SRA".

What, therefore, is the justification for these services still being run by the private sector?

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend is quite right, as was the Select Committee, to draw attention to the fact that, in 1995 and 1996, the then Government were anxious to get the whole franchise system away as quickly as possible. It is clear to me and everyone else that some of the deals struck at that time were not good value for the taxpayer. It is well known that the promises made in 1995 and 1996 by one or two franchises in particular seem to have been built on wildly optimistic assumptions. It does not follow from that, however, that having the private sector involved through franchises is wrong. Far from it: I believe that they can bring significant improvements, in terms of both financial discipline—and, therefore, costs—and customer service. There are many examples round the world of the public and private sectors working together. What was wrong in this country was that the model established during the privatisation in the early 1990s was flawed, and that is what we are putting right now.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that the public sector might enable more coaches to be run on trains? Is he concerned that c2c is proposing to redeploy five of its four-coach class 357 trains to a different line, resulting in a phasing out of the 12-coach trains on the c2c line, which is already impossibly overcrowded? Does he think that the public sector could do anything about that?

Mr. Darling: I had not realised that the hon. Gentleman was so hostile to the private sector; perhaps he should have a word with some of his colleagues. Whoever is operating the trains, whether in the public or private sector, will redeploy them from one service to another. That is what happens when one is running a railway. I do not know why c2c has decided to redeploy these five trains, but I will look into it. Perhaps if the hon. Gentleman looks in the back pages of Rail magazine—the trainspotters' guide to where every carriage is—he will find out where they have gone.

Rail Safety Regulator

3. Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): What plans he has to revise the role of the independent rail safety regulator after completion of the rail review. [173495]

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): The rail review is continuing to look at the regulation of safety. As I said in my statement to the House on 19 January, the Government will publish their proposals in the summer.

Mr. Clapham: Does my right hon. Friend agree that since the Health and Safety Commission took over the safety remit in 1990, there has been a steady improvement in safety? Does he agree that those who criticise the Health and Safety Executive for gold-plating safety on the railways are sending out the wrong signals to the public because they give the impression that safety is not the priority?

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend is absolutely right that safety must be in with the bricks. It is absolutely fundamental to the running of the railway, as it is to other parts of the transport sector. Undoubtedly, however, there are too many organisations involved in rail safety and we need to look at that in the review. When the HSE wrote to me at the time of my announcement, it made the point that there was a plethora of industry standards, some of which were over-cautious or applied in an over-cautious way. The culture of safety is of concern to the railway industry, but we must make sure that we have a far more streamlined system of responsibility. That works in other parts of the transport industry and it can work in the railways.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): If we cut away all the waffle, is not the Secretary of State attacking the regime put in place by his own Government and his predecessor, the right hon. Member for Tyneside, North (Mr. Byers)? Is it not true that the Government got it wrong and still do not know what to do? As privatisation took place 10 years ago and his Government have been in power for seven of those years, does not the blame for current problems on our rail network clearly rest with him? Will he come clean and admit to the House that, on railways, Labour has let the country down?

Mr. Darling: I notice that the hon. Gentleman could not keep his face straight. I say to him in the nicest possible way that in the months following the loss of his last seat, he must have reflected on the reasons for that loss; rail privatisation might have been one. He says that the Government do not know what we want to do. I have just been reading an article in The House magazine by the hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May)—who, sadly, is not with us today—in which she states Conservative policy; it is to wait and see what the review comes up with.

For a number of years, we tried to make the system that we inherited work. I tried to do that, but I came to the view that if I asked myself whether the system would last for the next 20 or 30 years, the answer was no. It is clear from the review and all the representations that people are looking for a more streamlined, straightforward structure. The way in which privatisation was carried out was a disaster; this country has paid a heavy cost, both financially and in terms of organisation. That is something we are sorting out.

Mr. John Smith (Vale of Glamorgan) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend assure me that whatever plans he has for reviewing rail safety, he will try to make sure that they are in place by May next year when we plan to open the Vale of Glamorgan railway line for a passenger service for the first time since Beeching shut it in the 1960s? May I invite my right hon. Friend to join me on the inaugural journey across the Porthkerry viaduct, through beautiful Rhoose, Aberthaw, Llanilltyd Fawr, Llandow and on and on?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State has received the invitation.

Freight Transport

4. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): What his policy is on encouraging more freight to be transported around the UK through south coast ports. [173496]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Kim Howells): The Government are keen to see freight transported by water rather than road where this makes sense. Our water freight grant scheme offers help towards investments, including port facilities, where these will allow freight traffic to be transported by sea or inland waterway rather than by road. The scheme can fund facilities at any port.

Tim Loughton: I am glad to hear the Minister's enthusiasm for sea transport. He will be intimately aware of the capacity of Shoreham harbour, in my constituency, for bringing aggregates and other building materials by sea for use along the south coast nearby. However, getting freight into Shoreham harbour by water will be successful only if we have the road infrastructure to get it out and distribute it. In the interests of joined-up thinking in his Government, will the Minister bring pressure to bear on his transport colleagues to ensure that road improvements around Shoreham harbour, and especially a proper link road to the A27 trunk road, go ahead? Without those, the Shoreham harbour maritime vision will simply be unworkable.

Dr. Howells: I shall certainly pass that communication to my right hon. and hon. Friends, and reassure them that there is one member of the Conservative party who obviously does not subscribe to the £600 million cuts that his party's policy will bring to transport.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): My hon. Friend will know that we are rapidly running out of capacity in the south-east ports, which is a matter of great concern. Will he give me an undertaking that no more decisions will be taken on ports development unless there is a clear and firmly adhered-to plan to expand capacity, rather than to cut it back?

Dr. Howells: I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that we must judge each application on its merits. Sometimes, when there are internationally recognised environmentally sensitive areas that must be protected, we have to take inspectorates' judgments very seriously. However, I assure my hon. Friend that we are well aware of the need to have adequate ports throughout the country to ensure that we can trade properly. We are one nation in the world that depends, probably more than all others, on our ability to trade across seas.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): Is it not clear that on ports policy, as on so many other policies, Labour has let this country down? Why is it that in respect of three key south-coast ports—Dover, Shoreham and Poole—the Minister's Department has not even been prepared to agree with the Treasury definition of those ports as public corporations, which is inhibiting vital investment?

Dr. Howells: In the port of Shoreham, for example—I know that the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) hoped that I would say more in my answer to him—we are definitely considering an application for an award of freight grant relating to facilities there. I must say to the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) that this Government take the problems of ports very seriously. They were neglected badly under the previous Government, but this Government will ensure that we have adequate port facilities so that we can trade properly.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton) (Lab): When considering the development of south-east coast ports, will my hon. Friend also consider all the other ports around the country? Inland waterways are one means of transporting freight and taking the pressure off our roads. My hon. Friend will be aware of the recent launch of a large freight-carrying vessel for our inland waterways, and we need more of those if we are to succeed. Will he support that programme?

Dr. Howells: Yes, indeed. We are very interested in helping the technology that must be developed to carry big loads, including on inland waterways. Our freight grants programme provides help towards the capital costs of equipment such as cranes where that investment will help to make water transport a viable alternative to roads. That applies to inland waterways and coastal shipping. My hon. Friend will be glad to know that this year's budget is £9.5 million. In the past two years, we have awarded 12 new water freight grants worth just over £3.5 million. Those grants will save about 17 million lorry miles during the next 10 years.

A1

5. Mr A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): If he will meet the A1 Safelink campaign to discuss future strategy for the A1 north of Newcastle. [173497]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): Yes, I will be happy to meet the right hon. Gentleman and a small delegation of representatives from the Safelink campaign group.

Mr. Beith: I look forward to that meeting. Will the Minister prepare for it by examining the A1's strategic importance to industrial development in the north-east, which is recognised by all those involved in regeneration work? Will he also take into account the increasing importance attached to the A1 by the Scottish Executive, who pointed out in the national planning framework for Scotland the importance of improving road and rail links between Edinburgh and Newcastle, and Aberdeen and Newcastle, in terms of regeneration in both countries?

Mr. Jamieson: The right hon. Gentleman will know that according to the A1 multi-modal study, which represents the local voice on this issue, there are fewer accidents on that road than on many others. It has also been said that dualling from Alnwick to Berwick is not justified in terms of traffic or of economic benefits, but that does not mean that we are not undertaking substantial work on the A1 in that area; indeed, the Stannington and Seaton Burn junctions, the Morpeth to Felton dualling and the Adderstone to Felton dualling constitute £106 million-worth of work. But as the right hon. Gentleman will appreciate, in the light of the study and the view expressed by the Scottish Executive, further work is not thought to have any economic benefit.

Light Aircraft (Noise Pollution)

6. Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): What plans he has to reduce noise pollution from light recreational aircraft. [173498]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): Light aircraft have to comply with an internationally agreed noise certification standard unless they were on the UK register before 1980. This standard was tightened for aircraft certificated after 1999. There are currently no plans for additional measures to reduce noise from light aircraft, although we expect aerodromes to set, and to enforce, appropriate rules to minimise noise nuisance.

Mr. Key: Does the Minister understand how sorry we feel for him, given this can of worms with which he must deal? My constituents are pleased to put up with the noise of fast jets and military helicopters five days a week, but for two days a week and particularly during the summer weather, their quality of life is diminished by light recreational aircraft. Indeed, hundreds of thousands of people throughout the country will have their quality of life diminished by the pilots of some 8,000 light aircraft and, of course, of those "lawnmowers" that take to the skies, and which take so long to get across them. As part of his big conversation, will he please start a debate on the balance between the right of pilots of light recreational aircraft to fly in our skies, and the right of the vast majority of our citizens to have peace and quiet?

Mr. McNulty: I am sympathetic to the points that the hon. Gentleman makes. In addition to the certification standard and the general noise standard, there are considerations in terms of the planning framework and the other frameworks that need to be taken into account. However, I shall look into the matter further and get back to the hon. Gentleman.

A14 Multi-modal Study

7. Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): If he will make a statement on the progress of the Cambridge to Huntingdon A14 multi-modal study. [173499]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): The two major projects recommended by the multi-modal study are progressing as follows. As the hon. Gentleman will know, following the receipt of objections, the guided bus system being developed by Cambridgeshire county council is to be examined at a public inquiry, which begins on 28 September. A public exhibition of the options for the A14 is expected to begin in September, and will include exhibitions in Cambridge and Huntingdon. It is expected that an announcement on the preferred route will be made in spring 2005.

Mr. Djanogly: My understanding is that if every private vehicle travelling between Huntingdon and Cambridge were left at home and public transport were used instead, the traffic flow on the A14 between those locations would be reduced by only some 5 per cent. Can the Minister therefore confirm that, whatever the outcome of the public inquiry into the proposed guided bus system, the road improvement scheme will certainly stay in place? Moreover, could he please give a date for completion of the roadworks?

Mr. McNulty: I have outlined the two major projects emerging from the multi-modal study, both of which remain in the system and are being developed. The A14 improvements form part of the programme of targeted improvements, and one set of improvements is not dependent on another. The outcome of the inquiry depends somewhat on how the objections to the guided bus system are dealt with in the first instance, but as I said, the preferred route for the A14 will be announced in spring 2005.

Traffic (A34/A40)

8. Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): What forecasts he has received about traffic levels on the A34 and A40; and if he will make a statement. [173500]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): There are currently two studies looking at the A34 between the M40 and the south coast. Those are a strategic review of the Highways Agency's programme of works for the A34 and a scoping study by the regional planning body and Government office for the south-east to decide how to address the wider role of transport in the area. Average flows on the A34 in 2003 were approximately 34,000 vehicles each way. The hon. Gentleman will know that the A40 around Oxford is currently the responsibility of Oxfordshire county council.

Mr. Cameron: I am grateful for that answer, but will the Minister ensure that the review of the A34 that he mentioned includes the single carriageway stretch of the A40 between Witney and Oxford? Is he aware that that road has some of the worst jams in the south of England every morning and every evening? Is he further aware that the transport network review being carried out by Oxfordshire county council is predicting that traffic volumes on that stretch of road could increase by another 20 to 25 per cent? Does he understand that that could turn it into a giant car park, as a result of which the whole west Oxfordshire economy would grind to a halt? Given that the county council is now considering the option of widening the road, will he ensure that his Department stands ready to fund this much-needed project?

Mr. Jamieson: As has been pointed out to the hon. Gentleman in the past, the A34 is the responsibility of the Highways Agency and we are undertaking an appropriate study of that particular road to establish what improvements need to be made. I am also aware that Oxfordshire county council is undertaking a review of its own roads, but I am not as yet aware of any application to the Department for funding under local transport plans. The hon. Gentleman will know—he was told on a previous occasion—that earlier proposals for the dualling of the A40 were turned down by the Tory Government in 1994.

Ormskirk Bypass

9. Mr. Colin Pickthall (West Lancashire) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the case for the Ormskirk bypass. [173501]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Kim Howells): My hon. Friend will know that it is for Lancashire county council to determine priorities for local road building and to make bids for funding accordingly. I understand that the council proposes to develop and submit a bid for a bypass in 2005 as part of the Lancashire local transport plan. We will certainly consider any such bid on its merits.

Mr. Pickthall: Over the last 50 years it has become a tradition for roads Ministers—and, indeed, shadow roads Ministers—to appear in Ormskirk town centre to say that the congestion is terrible and that the town needs a bypass. Yet we still do not have it. I would hate the current roads Ministers to break that tradition, but I hope that they will turn up to cut the first turf of that much-needed bypass. Would my hon. Friend take it on himself to shake the county council a little to speed the matter up? As I said, we have been waiting for more than half a century.

Dr. Howells: I know that my hon. Friend has worked hard to persuade the local authorities to do something about the bypass. I can give him an undertaking that we will certainly contact Lancashire county council to see how quickly it is proceeding with the project.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): My hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) will know that the A56 village bypass in my constituency is joint second with his on the Lancashire county council list. I urge the Government to ensure that if the bypass in my constituency is built, it does not go along the line of the old railway and disused Colne to Skipton line and that the track bed is preserved. At some stage in the future, we want to be able to reopen that railway.

Dr. Howells: I will certainly take that valuable information into account.

Speed Cameras

10. Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): How many speed safety cameras have been removed in the past 12 months because they do not comply with the siting criteria. [173502]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): The safety camera partnerships keep the continuing need for their cameras and the level of enforcement under review. Those enforcement issues are best determined locally in response to local developments and concerns. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has noted as well as I have that, despite my constant reminders to the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green), at no fewer than five Question Times, we have not yet heard about the 4,000 cameras that he says were put in the wrong places.

Bob Russell: In view of the constant criticism of some newspaper editors and politicians who seemingly wish to aid and abet law-breakers, will the Minister confirm that, on an average day, 10 people are killed in road crashes and that excessive speed is a contributory factor in some of them? Does he believe that the views of those who want the speed cameras removed might change if they lost a member of their family in such a road crash?

Mr. Jamieson: The hon. Gentleman reminds us that nearly 10 people a day are killed on our roads. It is estimated that one third of those deaths, and many injuries, are caused by people travelling at inappropriate or excessive speeds. That is why we are determined that the safety camera partnerships should carry on their good work. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said, on average there has been a reduction of 35 per cent. in the number of people killed or seriously injured at places where cameras are sited. Cameras are mainly sited in urban areas, where the number of deaths and injuries involving children is falling fastest. The hon. Member for Ashford will have to consider very carefully his policy of removing the cameras without justification, which could cause the numbers of children being killed or injured to rise again.

Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich) (Lab): One of the local papers in my area recently carried a story in which the Essex safety camera partnership was said to be "effective . . . the best in the country and highly professional."

The item also quoted Rodney Bass, Essex county council's Tory highways cabinet member, as saying:

"The partnership is an extremely professional and constructive organisation."

Can my hon. Friend understand why anyone, including one of the Opposition Front-Bench team, should be calling for the partnership to be scrapped?

Mr. Jamieson: I have been wondering about that. There seems to be something of a split among Conservatives on this matter. Front-Bench spokesmen here say one thing, but many Conservative local authority leaders—not least Rodney Bass—tell us something else. Many have written to us, asking to relax the standards required for fitting the cameras, or saying how necessary the cameras are. Some openly disagree with Tory Members about the need for cameras in their areas. I think that this would be a good time for the hon. Member for Ashford and his colleagues to back off from their previous position, as it is clearly nonsensical. It would be good sense for everyone if we could reach some common accord on the issue of road safety.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): How many people have lost their driving licences in the past 12 months after accumulating 12 points as a result of speed cameras and other measures?

Mr. Jamieson: A substantial number of people will have lost their licences in that time because they will have accumulated 12 points. People who get caught and are given three or six penalty points must reflect carefully on their driving and the speed at which they do it. Some people may have lost their licences, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman that a large number of people are alive today, and have not been seriously injured, because of the cameras that are in place.

Road Works (Congestion)

11. Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): What steps he is taking to ease congestion during road works on trunk routes. [173503]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): The Highways Agency designs roadworks in a manner that minimises disruption to the road user. Where possible, planned works take place during off-peak hours. As many lanes as possible are kept open, following notification to the public.

Mr. Plaskitt: My hon. Friend will be aware that the Highways Agency is carrying out an extensive works programme at junction 15 on the M40, the Longbridge roundabout. That is a very severe pinch point in the road network. I am very pleased that the work is being carried out, and I lobbied hard for it for a long time. While it is being carried out, however, carriageway restrictions from time to time cause very severe congestion. I have asked the agency to look at how the work is phased, and to consider doing more at night, but it is not very keen. Will my hon. Friend discuss the Longbridge work with the agency, to see whether these temporary difficulties can be overcome?

Mr. Jamieson: I can tell my hon. Friend that I have done that already, in the light of the parliamentary question that he has tabled. I understand his concern, on behalf of his constituents, about the delays on that stretch of road. The work being carried out is necessary to improve traffic flow and safety. My hon. Friend will be pleased to know that the work on the island will be completed in the next two weeks, and that all the works in the area will be finished by September. Unfortunately, night work is not always possible on this project. That is due in part to the need to ensure the safety of the work force, as there is a hole 1 m deep at the side of the road, and to the fact that the work being undertaken is of a type that it is difficult to conduct during the night. However, my hon. Friend makes a serious point, and I shall urge the Highways Agency further to expedite the work.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): The Minister is always very helpful, but will he ensure that there is more co-operation between the Highways Agency, local highway authorities and the utility companies? That would mean that, when a trunk road was subject to road works being carried out by the utility companies, the alternative route—which may not be a trunk road—would not be subject to works at the same time. To my mind, such co-operation would be sensible and would limit congestion.

Mr. Jamieson: My hon. Friend—[Laughter.] The hon. Gentleman said such nice things about me, I thought that I would define him as my hon. Friend. He makes a good point. The Highways Agency is looking to make sure that the works that it carries out are, where possible, co-ordinated with other local works. The hon. Gentleman will know that the new centre in Birmingham and the new regional information centres that are being set up will give far better information to motorists. Also, traffic offices are now in place around the midlands—not quite into the hon. Gentleman's area yet—and they are helping to keep the traffic flowing.

The hon. Gentleman makes a serious point and it is something that we are mindful of in all the programmed work that the Highways Agency undertakes.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware that roadworks are caused largely by damage from heavy vehicles. I am sure that he will be familiar with the fourth power law, relating axle weight to road damage. Would it not be a sensible way forward to invest more heavily in rail freight, especially that which is capable of taking road trailers on trains? That would take traffic off the roads, reduce the level of road damage and reduce congestion.

Mr. Jamieson: My hon. Friend asks a very clever question. Of course we are making efforts to take freight from the roads on to rail where we can, and where possible on to water, as the Minister of State said earlier. Notwithstanding that, the road network will still be needed to carry the vast bulk of traffic. Most roadworks are due to deterioration caused by all road users over a long time. So it is not an either/or. We must spend money on our rail system for freight and passengers, but it is essential to keep the road system in good condition. I am pleased to say that the Highways Agency roads are probably some of the best maintained not just in the country but in Europe.

Rail Passenger Services

12. Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): What assessment he has made of the reliability of information provided to passengers (a) on stations and (b) on trains about services and alterations to them. [173504]

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Dr. Kim Howells): The latest national passenger survey shows that 13 per cent. of respondents were dissatisfied with the provision of information about train times and platforms at stations and 23 per cent. dissatisfied with the provision of information during the journey.

Mr. Luff: I thank the Minister for that genuinely helpful reply. I have decided that, should the charms of this place ever be subdued in my breast, I will find another way to serve my constituents—to stand on the platforms at Droitwich Spa, Worcester Shrub Hill or Worcester Foregate Street stations and advise them what the trains are actually doing. I remind the Minister of scenes of chaos at Worcester Shrub Hill on Monday when trains were transformed while standing at platforms or eventually, of course, cancelled. When the Minister is talking to train operating companies, will he ask them to review all their procedures in relation to information? When he is talking to the Strategic Rail Authority, will he ask them to give a high priority to information systems within the funding available to them?

Dr. Howells: I can certainly do that. The hon. Gentleman will have to put on a bit more weight if he is going to become the Fat Controller of Worcestershire, but I have no doubt he could do the job if he were asked. There is nothing more infuriating than being on a train that has stopped without explanation or indication of when it is likely to move again. The point is a very important one.

A number of train operating companies have taken this task very seriously. I pick out—

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): GNER.

Dr. Howells: Certainly. I think First Great Western is improving a good deal and South West Trains now has some impressive electronic kit at stations which keeps the public well informed in real time about where trains are and how long it will be before they get to the station.

John Cryer (Hornchurch) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that a contributory factor to the problems that have just been alluded to is that when the railways were privatised eight years ago there was a complete lack of vertical integration? Britain's railways had always been vertically integrated going right back to the 1820s when construction was first started on the network. Does my hon. Friend agree that there should be some move towards reintroducing vertical integration? There seems to be indications from the Government that that may be the case. If it is to take place, the most sensible way to do it would be inside the public sector rather than our handing ever greater tranches of power to the private sector, which has already made such a hash of running Britain's railways.

Dr. Howells: I would not agree with my hon. Friend's last point. He is very young still, but I can remember what British Rail was actually like. I advise him not to look back at that bit of history through rose-tinted spectacles. It was very difficult, at times. One of the key themes of the rail review is to discover how the parts of the railway can speak to each other much more coherently, so that we can inform passengers where trains are, how long delays are likely to be and so on. Some interesting experiments in integration are taking place, including one run by South West Trains in which the Wessex train control centre is doing some valuable work.

CABINET OFFICE

The Minister was asked—

Emergency Planning

21. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): What the civil contingencies grant for emergency planning was for Greater London, (a) in total and (b) broken down by borough, in each year since 2000. [173513]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Phil Woolas): With leave, Mr. Speaker, I have been asked to reply. I wish to pass on the apologies of my hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office who—I am delighted to inform the House—is taking paternity leave because of the birth of his daughter. I am sure the whole House will wish to pass on their good wishes to him and his family.

The civil defence grant is paid as a contribution to the emergency planning function of those local authorities that have a statutory duty of civil defence, which in London is the 32 boroughs, the Corporation of London, and the London Fire and Emergency Planning Authority. The total payments to those authorities have increased from £1.75 million in 2000–01, to £2.8 million in 2004–05.

Simon Hughes: I should be grateful if the Minister would pass on our best wishes to the Minister for the Cabinet Office and his family.

Does the Minister accept that all those authorities have told the Government that they have not been given enough? Does he accept that the money that they have been told they may get this year they still have not received? When will the negotiations, which are apparently still continuing, about the money London needs for civil defence and emergency planning be completed so that there can be certainty about the services available to this city and its citizens to protect against an undesirable and obviously unwished for terrorist attack?

Mr. Woolas: I thank the hon. Gentleman for an important question. I accept that local authorities say that they do not get enough money and they are within their rights to do so. However, I have checked the situation and I can tell the House that the amount of civil defence grants paid to the boroughs has increased from £1.74 million in 2000–01 to £2.8 million now. The hon. Gentleman will recognise that while local authorities play a key role in civil defence, they are not the only agency involved. Discussions are indeed continuing between my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local and Regional Government and the representatives of London authorities.

Mr. David Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): Could my hon. Friend explain to my constituents in provincial England how the balance of funding for civil contingencies is decided and, in particular, address the concerns of some of them that most of the money is going to London, which may not adequately reflect the real balance of risk in the UK?

Mr. Woolas: I thank my hon. Friend for that important question. What is referred to as resilience work is important throughout the UK. The Government have provided an extra £330 million for that purpose, in addition to the local authority money. That sum was earmarked before the tragedy of 9/11. Of course, the regional resilience teams have been established in the devolved authorities and throughout each English region, and they are being provided with the resources that they need to do that important job.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): But surely the Minister is aware that since 2002 the grant has been frozen and that the Government's intention is to continue that freeze? How are London's councils to manage the new duties imposed on them under the Civil Contingencies Bill and how can the Government claim to be increasing London's security when they have frozen that important grant? Does that not confirm what the Metropolitan police said in the Project Unicorn report that Government policy is "outdated"? Is not that yet another, more serious example of Labour letting London down?

Mr. Woolas: It is not: the contrary is the case. The Project Unicorn report was commissioned by the Metropolitan police and there has been press speculation about it, but that simply goes to show the important point that in looking at such reports the Government are taking their responsibility extremely seriously.

Mr. Heald: "Outdated"?

Mr. Woolas: The hon. Gentleman says that the policy is outdated, but I put it to him that the robust policies already being co-ordinated across all Government agencies, as well as local authorities—which is obviously important—are being put into an even more robust framework through the Civil Contingencies Bill, which the House will debate next week. We are far from not taking our responsibilities seriously and far from not providing the necessary resources; whereas his party would reduce public expenditure in that area.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Some of my constituents have told me that they are nervous about their children coming to London on school trips, especially to visit the House of Commons, owing to concerns about security on the London underground and in London generally. What reassurance can the Minister give my constituents? Does he believe that the exorbitant headlines in some national newspapers, which make people more nervous about visiting London, are winning the terrorists' battle for them?

Mr. Woolas: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. There is always a danger that scaremongering will achieve by propaganda what terrorists want to achieve by violence. However, when researching this portfolio, I was very, very pleased by the amount of effort that is going into London. The fundamental review of London's resilience arrangements has been carried out and there is a new London-wide strategic emergency-planning regime. Enhanced command and control centres are in place and there are specific plans to deal with different types of possible terrorist attack. The Mayor—the very excellent London Mayor—has provided for 100 extra British Transport police officers. I can also inform the House that the closed-circuit television network on the London underground system is the most extensive anywhere in the world.

22. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): If he will make a statement on e-delivery of Government services. [173515]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Phil Woolas): The latest reported figures show that 68 per cent. of Government services are now available online. Departments continue to report steady progress towards the target of delivering all services electronically by 2005 and, most important, achieving high levels of use of those services. To maximise take-up of services, the new Directgov site—www.direct.gov.uk—brings together information and services from many Whitehall Departments so that members of the public can have a single access point.

Miss McIntosh: Will the Minister describe to the House the difficulties that have been experienced in rolling out and implementing the e-delivery programme in almost every Department? Can he understand the frustration of our constituents who are being driven dotty by this dotcom roll-out? Does he agree that there is no substitute for having a real person at the end of a phone line when those difficulties are experienced?

Mr. Woolas: I respect the hon. Lady's point, but I do not agree. Of course, there are difficulties in implementing the strategy, but I should have thought that the House would see that it is positive and shows that Departments across the range are working closely together. That is what my hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office is doing—I can give the House some real examples. Last year, the system enabled 705,000 people to fill out their self-assessment tax forms and more than 60,000 people successfully obtained their passport. It provides a good service for the public and saves money for the taxpayer. I should have thought that the hon. Lady would support that.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): Will the Minister pass on to his hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office my congratulations on the delivery—if not the e-delivery—of his child?

Will the hon. Gentleman clarify a point on the 2005 target for getting all services online? Does that mean January 2005, mid-year 2005 or the end of 2005?

Mr. Woolas: It means what it says. It means 2005—next year. So far, the figure is 68 per cent. and I am confident that further good news will be published shortly. Incidentally, according to a survey commissioned by the Cabinet Office from a respected City organisation, our e-environment is the second best in the world; we are second only to Denmark.

On the hon. Gentleman's specific question, if the date is not the end of 2005 I shall write and tell him.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): The Minister mentioned the number of people who have applied for passports and done their tax returns online. Will he outline what the Cabinet Office is doing to increase the availability of services for people who are not online?

Mr. Woolas: Of course that is a very important follow-up question. The capacity to get those services is all very well, but it is whether they are used that counts. Indeed, the Government have improved and refined their target in a way that the House would support. It is not enough just to achieve that target by 2005; the take-up is important, and we are providing extra money—more than £1 billion across Departments and more than £30 million to the regional agencies—to help us to achieve that aim.

BILL PRESENTED

Children's Food

Ms Debra Shipley, supported by Mr. Robert Walter, Mr. Paul Burstow, Mr. Graham Allen, Vera Baird, Mr. Ernie Ross, Peter Bottomley, Mr. Andy Reed, Mr. Paul Tyler, Alan Howarth, Angela Eagle and Mr. Simon Thomas, presented a Bill regarding the marketing, promotion and sale of food and drink to and for children; to make provision for education and the dissemination of information about children's diet, nutrition and health; to place certain duties on the Food Standards Agency; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 15 October, and to be printed [Bill 110].

Points of Order

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will, no doubt, be aware of the terrible events going on in the Gaza strip, with the Israeli armed forces slaughtering large numbers of Palestinians day after day, and demolishing huge numbers of homes, making large numbers of innocent people homeless—all in violation of international law and human decency. I rise to ask for your guidance on how we can raise this matter as an issue of urgency, so that whatever our Government can do to intervene to try to stop these events can be done as soon as possible.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Foreign Office questions will not be taken until 15 June but, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) says, we should have an opportunity to raise this matter in view of the deep disquiet and concern that exist in the House, and certainly in the country at large, about what the Israelis are doing. I am totally opposed to suicide bombing and terrorism as such, but innocent civilians are undoubtedly being killed, many homes are being demolished—we have seen it on television—and the Palestinians are being forced to live in tents. Those are terrible events, so I hope that there will be an opportunity for a Minister to come to the House, where we can ask questions, press for the British Government to dissociate themselves very strongly indeed from what is happening and urge the British Government to ask President Bush so to dissociate himself. What is happening now in the Gaza strip is totally unacceptable. For that reason I hope, Sir, that you can advise us how we can raise this matter as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: These are very troubled and serious matters indeed, but both the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Gentleman are well aware of the procedures of the House, and they will know that I cannot bring a Minister to the House unless an application has been made for an urgent question; but, of course, the relevant Ministers will have heard the comments and the concern that has been expressed and, no doubt, will take whatever action they feel is necessary in informing the House. The right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Gentleman know the rules of the House, and they know what they can do to bring a Minister to the House.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to raise a point of order of which I have given you some notice; I apologise that it was not more notice. In reviewing my written parliamentary answers in preparation for my oral question on today's Order Paper, I discovered that I tabled a question on 19 November 2003, to the Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety, the hon. Member for Salford (Ms Blears), to which the reply was:

> "I will write to the hon. Member and place a copy of my letter in the Library."—[Official Report, 19 November 2003; Vol. 413, c. 1035W.]

In investigating the matter this morning, I found that I have still not had a reply in the Library. I understand that, at the end of last year, there were a substantial number of such cases. Although the number has fallen, there may still be several of them, and it is unacceptable for Ministers to say that they will write to hon. Members and then not do so. I seek your advice on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving me warning of this matter. I will investigate it and come back to him.

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Have you been approached by the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport about her coming to the House to make a statement about tomorrow's planned auction of the papers of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle? You will know that there is substantial public concern that due process has not been followed by Christie's on this issue. It is proposing the break-up of papers that would be better placed in the British Library to serve the public good. Such is the concern that, last Friday, the British Library made it clear that the sellers are refusing to make available documents to confirm the legal title of the papers that are being sold. With just 24 hours to go before the planned auction, is there anything that Members can do to raise the issue on behalf of the public interest?

Mr. Speaker: There are certain things that hon. Members can do to raise these matters, but I have no powers to raise them. It is up to the hon. Gentleman to approach the Department and Ministers with his deep concerns.

Doorstep Selling (Property Repairs)

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to prohibit unsolicited household visits to sell property repairs, maintenance and improvements; to provide penalties and powers of arrest in connection with this prohibition; to require all doorstep vendors of property repairs, maintenance and improvements to give seven days' notice in writing of an intended visit to a home; and to extend property owners' rights to cancel any contract entered into for the provision of property repairs, maintenance or improvement; and for connected purposes.

The abuses that the Bill seeks to control are serious and widespread. A Trading Standards Institute survey in November 2002 revealed that, in the previous two years, nearly 10 per cent. of householders reported problems with or following cold calling for property repairs, maintenance and improvements. Translated nationwide, that would equate to 2.5 million householders being affected. An Office of Fair Trading "snapshot" survey in March 2002 found that 45 per cent. of doorstep selling complaints made to trading standards officers related to home maintenance repairs and improvements. The sums involved are not trivial. The average value of services for which people have been billed when they complain about property repairs was £2,264.

A ban on cold calling for property repairs and maintenance would be popular. The Trading Standards Institute report that I mentioned found that nearly 96 per cent. of householders do not want doorstep sellers cold calling. It is not just the amount of money involved or the number of people affected that make the Bill so necessary. Cold calling for property repairs is not just a way for cowboy builders to drum up trade; it has also become a preferred cover for criminals targeting vulnerable, frail and elderly people.

The case of a Mr. D reported in a West Sussex trading standards and Help the Aged inquiry is sadly typical. He is aged 87 and was approached at home by a group of men to whom he ultimately gave £9,200. The men originally said that his front drive needed doing. They started clearing the drive and then said that the back needed doing. They then said that the job was bigger than they thought and they wanted more money. This was refused after the intervention of Mr. D's friend, but it was only through the subsequent involvement of trading standards and Help the Aged that these predators were finally warned off.

Evidence is strong of a link between this sort of activity and distraction burglary, and there is also disturbing evidence of repeat targeting of the most vulnerable victims by organised criminal gangs. The comprehensive April 2003 Trading Standards Institute report argues for a ban and quotes one offender:

"Another team may have been and done work there and found them to be a soft touch . . . They might be moving on or feel it's risky to go back and do it again. They will sell us the house for a cut of our take, or we might give them a soft touch of our own in exchange."

Recently, these vile, Artful Dodger-style modes of criminality have rightly attracted significant attention in the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Mr. Truswell) has raised the issue in two Adjournment debates, and has championed trading standards initiatives to tackle the problem. The hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) told us in an Adjournment debate that his own father had been a victim, and the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) highlighted similar abuses in his recent Property Repairs (Prohibition of Cold-Calling) Bill. I am grateful to all of them for their support.

Last week, hon. Members may have seen coverage of the report by the Office of Fair Trading on doorstep selling, which was produced in response to the super-complaint from Citizens Advice. It is an important examination of that undesirable activity and the techniques involved, including the way in which those people worm their way into the confidence of elderly and often housebound people. It offered constructive suggestions, which Ministers will want to consider closely, including a welcome proposal for consultation on a ban on work or payment within seven days. The OFT is looking at the case for banning cold calling for property repairs and maintenance, and has suggested that "the DTI should consult on the option of such a ban and on specific issues and alternatives involved".

In view of the mounting evidence of abuse, I would strongly urge Ministers to go further and move swiftly to consult directly on legislation to implement such a ban.

A ban on such cold calling has already been discussed, and has the strong support of Help the Aged, for whose assistance with the Bill I am indebted. Jan Williams of the organisation wrote:

"Too often, when consumers are confronted on the doorstep, they end up paying high prices for work . . . not needed in the first place . . . and are left feeling embarrassed, their confidence is damaged, and they no longer feel able to live independently. Banning doorstep trading for property repairs would mean rogue traders were unable to take advantage of older people."

A ban also has the support of the Trading Standards Institute, whose team, including Brian Steele, the Leeds police co-ordinator of its distraction burglary project, and Stuart Pudney, head of trading standards for North Yorkshire, have worked tirelessly to gather evidence. Indeed, Ron Gainsford, chief executive of the Trading Standards Institute, said:

"The Institute has been working hard for over a year to gain support for this initiative . . . Older and vulnerable adults are often persuaded to part with thousands of pounds for shoddy or unnecessary work, and in some cases, losing their entire life savings."

Victim Support, Neighbourhood Watch and Sense, the charity for people with deaf-blindness and associated disabilities, support a ban. Importantly, it has the backing of the Federation of Master Builders, which says:

"Vulnerable consumers should be protected from being pressurised into purchasing repairs on their doorstep, often at grossly inflated prices and with shoddy workmanship".

A ban has the support of Detective Sergeant David Stone of Operation Liberal, a consortium of 11 police forces dealing with distraction burglary. I am delighted that Assistant Chief Constable Graham Gerrard, the senior police representative on the Home Office distraction burglary taskforce, has confirmed that the police "are often called to investigate cases where work is either carried out to inferior standards or payment is obtained and no work is undertaken. There are also cases where grossly inflated costs are claimed by the property repairers and intimidation is used to make the householder pay. Legislation that bans cold calling will greatly reduce the opportunities for rogue traders."

I do not wish to damn everyone who promotes goods door to door or companies that have demonstrated their probity and professionalism over many years. My proposal would impose nothing more than a mild inconvenience on them, but only the absolute clarity of a ban, backed up with tough enforcement powers, will protect elderly and vulnerable people from the vultures who prey on them.

The scale of some abuses and the harm done is shocking. I shall conclude with the story of Mr. H, whose daughter contacted trading standards after discovering that her father had been systematically targeted by rogue traders for about four years. An unknown trader carried out some work for Mr. H, then claimed that his garage needed underpinning, demanding over £10,000 to carry out the work. It then appeared that a trader had been returning almost fortnightly to carry out building work and obtain money. No paperwork, no receipts and no invoices had ever been issued. Mr. H had remortgaged his home in order to pay the trader a sum of approximately £80,000.

Help the Aged made it clear to me when we discussed options for action in this area that without a complete ban on cold calling for property repairs, backed with powers of arrest, those criminal elements would continue to be able to target vulnerable older people. That generation, many of whom in the second world war helped save our country and the values we hold dear, deserve better than that. I hope the House will give leave to introduce the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gordon Marsden, Mr. Paul Truswell, Mr. Andrew Robathan, Sandra Gidley, Dr. Julian Lewis, Mrs. Joan Humble, Lawrie Quinn, Ann Clwyd, Dr. Howard Stoate, Mr. Mike Hancock and Mr. David Drew.

Doorstep Selling (Property Repairs)

Mr. Gordon Marsden accordingly presented a Bill to prohibit unsolicited household visits to sell property repairs, maintenance and improvements; to provide penalties and powers of arrest in connection with this prohibition; to require all doorstep vendors of property repairs, maintenance and improvements to give seven days' notice in writing of an intended visit to a home; and to extend property owners' rights to cancel any contract entered into for the provision of property repairs, maintenance or improvement; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 16 July, and to be printed. [Bill 111].

Pensions Bill (Programme) (No. 3)

12.47 pm

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): I beg to move,

That the Order of 2nd March 2004 (Pensions Bill (Programme)) as amended by the Order of 19th April 2004 be amended by the substitution for paragraphs 4 and 5 of the following—

'4. Proceedings on consideration shall be taken in the order shown in the first column of the following Table. In that column, any reference to new Clauses or Amendments relating to Part 1, 3, 4 or 5 does not include new Clauses or Amendments relating to any arrangements for financial assistance for members where pension schemes are wound up.

5. The proceedings shown in the first column of the Table shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the time specified in the second column.

Proceedings	Time for conclusion of proceedings
New Clauses standing in the name of a Minister of the Crown, other than new Clauses relating to Part 2 or to any other arrangements for financial assistance for members where pension schemes are wound up; remaining new Clauses and Amendments relating to Part 1; remaining new Clauses and Amendments relating to Part 3; remaining new Clauses and amendments relating to Part 4; remaining new Clauses and amendments relating to Part 5	At the moment of interruption on the first allotted day.
New Clauses and Amendments relating to any arrangements otherwise than through the Pension Protection Fund for financial assistance for members where pension schemes are wound up or relating to the categories of scheme in relation to which the Pension Protection Fund applies	Two hours before the moment of interruption on the second allotted day.
New Clauses and Amendments relating to Part 2; remaining new Clauses and Amendments relating to Part 6; remaining new Clauses and Amendments relating to Part 7; remaining new Clauses; Amendments relating to Schedules; new Schedules	Three hours before the moment of interruption on the third allotted day.

5A. In the Table "allotted day" means a day on which the Bill is put down on the main business as first Government Order of the Day.

5B. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on the third allotted day.'.

The Pensions Bill is a long and technically complex piece of legislation. Following considerable scrutiny during 22 sittings—all enjoyable, I might add—in Standing Committee B, we are now returning to the House for consideration and Third Reading. Not only is the Bill large; it is also very important legislation, and hon. Members deserve time to discuss the amendments tabled at this stage, without debate being unduly restricted. We have a very full agenda to deal with on Report, and for this reason the Government propose to set aside a greater length of time than originally planned for the consideration and Third Reading of the Bill.

Members of the Standing Committee will recognise some of the amendments before us over the next few days, but the Government are tabling further new clauses to reflect changes brought about by both the Finance Bill and the European directive on occupational pensions. We will be hearing further about those subjects later today.

The programme motion before us means that we also intend to discuss today all the Government new clauses. We also intend to take today any amendments or Opposition new clauses that relate to the regulator, scheme-specific funding, retirement planning and part 5 of the Bill, which relates to personal and occupational pension schemes. This will give us a full programme of deliberation today.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Malcolm Wicks: Perhaps I can anticipate my right hon. Friend's question.

The exception to the new clauses is that Government new clause 34—this might have been my right hon. Friend's question—

Mr. Field: The English is poor.

Malcolm Wicks: Yes, the English is poor. The exception is that Government new clause 34 will be taken tomorrow, together with amendments to it. That will be followed by new clauses and amendments that relate to the pension protection fund. The Government are fully aware that many hon. Members will want to join in the discussion of this new clause and the remaining business on the PPF. For this reason we believe it is important to set aside a reasonable amount of time for consideration of the subject and so have added a further day's debate for this important new measure. I trust that hon. Members in all parts of the House will welcome the opportunity to support the Government's new proposals in this crucial area. We will conclude our business and any remaining amendments on Thursday, before moving to Third Reading on Thursday afternoon.

Throughout our deliberations in Standing Committee we have had constructive debate on all the issues, and I am grateful to the hon. Members for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) and for Northavon (Mr. Webb) for their co-operation—I hope that I can still say that in three days' time. They sought assurances that the timetable would allow sufficient time to discuss new clauses and amendments on Report, and I hope they agree that the Government have paid heed to their requests by providing the extra time.

I do not want to use up valuable time by debating this motion for longer than is necessary, because it seems more sensible and productive to spend our time discussing the real issues of concern to the House.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): The Minister is right: we should not allow the programme motion to delay us for too long, but I shall make some quick comments on what he just said and the process by which the Bill has been considered in the House. I did not serve in Committee, and I pay tribute to the members of the Committee from both sides of the House who took on that onerous obligation.

When we heard that we would get three days on Report, we were pleasantly surprised because we thought that that would give us time to consider the Bill properly. We did not expect the Government to concede three days with quite such alacrity. At first, I thought that it was because the Minister is a reasonable man, but I now see that it is because we are considering 28 Government new clauses and 128 Government amendments. Even with three days, we cannot be confident that it will be possible properly to scrutinise 28 Government new clauses and 128 Government amendments.

This debate is the latest example of how the Government have presented the Bill. Hundreds of Government amendments and 36 Government new clauses were introduced in Committee, where the Minister, who is smiling in a slightly guilty way, said:

"I had better not describe it"—

the Bill—

"as a work in progress".—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 9 March 2004; c. 34.]

The Bill is clearly work in progress, and it has been subject to continuous amendment as it has made its way through this House.

The Green Paper was produced in December 2002 and the White Paper came out in June 2003, but nearly one year later, amendments are being tabled with virtually no time for scrutiny, which suggests that the Government lack a clear and rigorous strategy to tackle the pensions crisis. The Minister is like a schoolboy who is in a perpetual crisis about getting his homework in on time.

It is good to see the Minister in the House. We thought that he might be in Blackpool speaking to the National Pensioners Convention, where my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) is now. Cynics might suggest that one reason why the Bill is on Report today is to give the Minister a good reason not to go to Blackpool to confront the pensioners, who might have told him what they think of the Government's record on pensions.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are going far too wide of the programme motion.

Mr. Willetts: I apologise if I am ranging more widely than I should. Does the Minister want to intervene?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister does not want to intervene because he would be out of order, and the hon. Gentleman is out of order.

Mr. Willetts: I shall restrict myself to saying that I am pleased to see the Minister in the House today, despite the possible alternative engagements.

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Andrew Smith): Will the hon. Gentleman apologise when he learns that a Minister is attending today's National Pensioners Convention conference?

Mr. Willetts: I am aware that the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle), is attending the conference, but she is not responsible for pensions. The Minister should be at the National Pensioners Convention conference.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must get on to the programme motion.

Mr. Willetts: We will scrutinise the Bill as best we can, but it is difficult for the Commons to perform that role when so many Government new clauses and amendments are produced at such short notice. Outside bodies, which have considerable expertise to offer this House and which may be directly affected by the provisions, also find it difficult to put forward their comments in those circumstances. Perhaps the other place will take the opportunity to correct the mistakes that slip through here because we do not have sufficient time to scrutinise the Bill properly.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): Who could object to a three-day debate on Report, which, on the face of it, offers ample scope for debate?

I thank the Department for Work and Pensions because, along with all the new clauses that we must cover in the next three days, we have been given a briefing, which reached my pigeonhole this morning—obviously, I have read all of it. Some of the briefing relates to new clauses that we will consider in a matter of minutes, which makes a mockery of the suggestion that we are scrutinising this important Bill. We are enormously grateful for the briefing, which we will speed-read and spew back out as best we can.

Instead of moving this programme motion, the Government should have recommitted the Bill to Standing Committee, especially given the substantial new clause 34. New clause 34 arrived on our fax machines on Friday lunchtime, and we have had no time to scrutinise it in detail. As the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) rightly says, a lot of the material is technical. It took a long time for people to realise some of the major flaws introduced by the Pensions Act 1995, and I fear that the Bill will introduce many more unforeseen consequences, which just a few more days of mature reflection and detailed scrutiny in Committee would enable us to prevent.

Although the DWP has been helpful by advising us of what was coming, the Bill is not finished—some Government new clauses have not even been written yet. If we want a good Pensions Bill, we need proper scrutiny. Three days on the Floor of the House is not adequate when we are considering Government amendments on which the ink is still wet. The Bill should return to Standing Committee, and we do not believe that the programme motion provides for proper scrutiny.

Malcolm Wicks: Although we do not want to be drawn on this matter, on occasions in the distant past Ministers have been reprimanded for not coming to this House of Commons. This is the first occasion on which I have been challenged for being in the House of Commons rather than by the seaside in Blackpool. I prefer being here to being in Blackpool, because the Pensions Bill is on Report, and my duty as Minister for Pensions is to the House of Commons.

Mr. Willetts: The objection is that the Pensions Bill is being taken on the same day as the National Pensioners Convention conference in Blackpool.

Malcolm Wicks: Feebler and feebler. The shadow Minister of State, the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson), must judge where his priority lies today, and I think that his duty is to this House of Commons.

On the serious issues, we said many times in Committee that the Bill is technical. I have made the point that we have had to amend it, and I apologise for that because I realise that it inconveniences those who wish to scrutinise it. We have always done our best to introduce information at appropriate times, but I have explained in Committee and to the whole House that we were under pressure to introduce the Bill. All other things being equal, we would have taken a year or two to get the Bill absolutely right, with all the semi-colons in the right places, perhaps by introducing a draft Bill. All other things are not equal, however, and tremendous pressure exists to bring security to those people in private companies who have final salary pension schemes and who risk losing all or a large proportion of their pensions, if their company becomes insolvent. Although people are impatient because we cannot introduce such security until April next year, they would be very impatient if we were not to introduce it for another year or two. Therefore, although I apologise as a matter of courtesy, I do not apologise for the fact that the Government are introducing the Bill, even if it means that we have to amend it more heavily and more often than would normally be the case.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): As I am sure the Minister understands, some people cannot retire at the moment such is their uncertainty about their pensionability. It is an issue of life and death for some people—that is why we have to introduce the Bill, get it right and do it quickly.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying from the programme motion.

Malcolm Wicks: Let me sum up by saying that notwithstanding the Bill's complexity, we think that three days is a very adequate amount of time for the House to consider it on Report and Third Reading.

Orders of the Day

Pensions Bill

[1ST ALLOTTED DAY]

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 24

EARLY LEAVERS: CASH TRANSFER SUMS AND CONTRIBUTION REFUNDS

'After section 101 of the Pension Schemes Act 1993 (c. 48) insert—

"CHAPTER 5

Early leavers: cash transfer sums and contribution refunds

101AA Scope of Chapter 5

(1) This Chapter applies to any member of an occupational pension scheme to which Chapter 1 applies (see section 69(3)) if—

(a) his pensionable service terminates before he attains normal pension age, and

(b) on the date on which his pensionable service terminates—

(i) the three month condition is satisfied, but

(ii) he does not have relevant accrued rights to benefit under the scheme.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), the three month condition is that the period of the member's pensionable service under the scheme, taken together with—

(a) any previous period of his pensionable service under the scheme, and

(b) any period throughout which he was employed in linked qualifying service under another scheme, amounts to at least three months.

(3) A period counts for the purposes of paragraph (a) or (b) of subsection (2) only so far as it counts towards qualification for long service benefit within the meaning of Chapter 1.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (1), "relevant accrued rights to benefit under the scheme", in relation to a member of a scheme, means rights which—

(a) have accrued to or in respect of him under the scheme, and

(b) entitle him to the relevant benefits which would have accrued to or in respect of him under the applicable rules if paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 71(1) (and the word "and" immediately preceding them) did not have effect.

(5) References in the following provisions of this Chapter to a member, in relation to an occupational pension scheme, are to a member of the scheme to whom this Chapter applies.

101AB Right to cash transfer sum and contribution refund

(1) On the termination of his pensionable service, a member of an occupational pension scheme acquires a right to whichever one he elects of the following options—

(a) a cash transfer sum;

(b) a contribution refund.

(2) Subsection (1) is subject to the following provisions of this Chapter.

(3) In this Chapter "cash transfer sum" means, in relation to a member of an occupational pension scheme, the cash equivalent, at the date on which his pensionable service terminates, of the benefits mentioned in section 101AA(4)(b).

(4) In this Chapter, "contribution refund" means, in relation to a member of an occupational pension scheme, a sum representing the aggregate of—

(a) the member's employee contributions to the scheme, and

(b) where transfer credits have been allowed to the member under the scheme by virtue of a payment ("the transfer payment") made by the trustees or managers of another occupational pension scheme, the member's employee contributions to that other scheme, so far as they—

(i) relate to the transfer payment, and

(ii) do not, in aggregate, exceed the amount of the transfer payment.

(5) In subsection (4), "employee contributions" means, in relation to a member and an occupational pension scheme, contributions made to the scheme by or on behalf of the member on his own account, but does not include—

(a) a transfer payment by virtue of which transfer credits have been allowed to the member under the scheme, or

(b) any pension credit or amount paid to the scheme which is attributable (directly or indirectly) to a pension credit.

101AC Notification of right to cash transfer sum or contribution refund

(1) This section applies where the pensionable service of a member of an occupational pension scheme has terminated.

(2) The trustees or managers of the scheme must—

(a) within a reasonable period after the termination give the member a statement in writing containing information adequate to explain—

(i) the nature of the right acquired by him under section 101AB, and

(ii) how he may exercise the right, and such other information as may be prescribed, and

(b) afford the member a reasonable period after giving him that statement within which to exercise the right.

(3) The statement given under subsection (2)(a) must specify, in particular—

(a) in relation to the cash transfer sum to which the member acquires a right under section 101AB, its amount and the permitted ways in which the member can use it,

(b) the amount of the contribution refund to which the member so acquires a right, and

(c) the last day on which the member may, disregarding section 101AI(2), exercise the right ("the reply date").

(4) Information which may be prescribed under subsection (2)(a) includes, in particular—

(a) information about any tax liability in respect of, or deduction required or permitted to be made from, the cash transfer sum or contribution refund, and

(b) information about the effect on other rights of the member (whether under the applicable rules or otherwise) of exercising the right.

(5) The trustees or managers may notify the member that, if he does not exercise the right mentioned in subsection (2)(a)(i) on or before the reply date, the trustees or managers will be entitled to pay the contribution refund to him.

(6) Where the trustees or managers of the scheme fail to comply with subsection (2), section 10 of the Pensions Act 1995 (c. 26) (civil penalties) applies to any trustee or manager who has failed to take all reasonable steps to secure compliance.

101AD Exercise of right under section 101AB

(1) This section applies where a member of an occupational pension scheme acquires a right under section 101AB.

(2) The member may exercise the right by giving a notice in writing to that effect to the trustees or managers stating—

(a) which of the options under section 101AB(1) he elects, and

(b) if he elects for the cash transfer sum, the permitted way in which he requires that sum to be used.

(3) The notice under subsection (2) must be given on or before—

(a) the reply date, or

(b) such later date as the trustees or managers may allow in his case under section 101AI(2).

101AE Permitted ways of using cash transfer sum

(1) This section applies in relation to a cash transfer sum to which a member of an occupational pension scheme acquires a right under section 101AB.

(2) The ways in which the cash transfer sum may be used are—

(a) for acquiring transfer credits allowed under the rules of another occupational pension scheme—

(i) whose trustees or managers are able and willing to accept the cash transfer sum, and

(ii) which satisfies prescribed requirements,

(b) for acquiring rights allowed under the rules of a personal pension scheme—

(i) whose trustees or managers are able and willing to accept the cash transfer sum, and

(ii) which satisfies prescribed requirements,

(c) for purchasing one or more appropriate annuities,

(d) in such circumstances as may be prescribed, for subscribing to other pension arrangements which satisfy prescribed requirements.

(3) For the purposes of subsection (2), "appropriate annuity" means an annuity which satisfies prescribed requirements and is purchased from an insurer who—

(a) falls within section 19(4)(a),

(b) is chosen by the member, and

(c) is willing to accept payment on account of the member from the trustees or managers of the scheme.

101AF Calculation of cash transfer sum and contribution refund

(1) Cash transfer sums are to be calculated and verified in the prescribed manner.

(2) Any calculation of a contribution refund must conform with such requirements as may be prescribed.

(3) Regulations may provide—

(a) for amounts to be deducted in respect of administrative costs in calculating cash transfer sums;

(b) for a cash transfer sum or contribution refund to be increased or reduced in prescribed circumstances.

(4) The circumstances that may be prescribed under subsection (3)(b) include in particular—

(a) a failure by the trustees or managers of the scheme to comply with section 101AG(2) or (4) in relation to the cash transfer sum or contribution refund, and

(b) the state of funding of the scheme.

(5) Regulations under subsection (3)(b) may provide—

(a) for a cash transfer sum to be reduced so that the member has no right to have any amount paid by way of cash transfer sum in respect of him;

(b) for a contribution refund to be reduced so that the member has no right to receive any amount by way of contribution refund under this Chapter.

101AG Duties of trustees or managers following exercise of right

(1) This section applies where a member of an occupational pension scheme has exercised a right under section 101AB in accordance with section 101AD.

(2) Where the member has elected for the cash transfer sum, the trustees or managers of the scheme must, within a reasonable period beginning with the date on which the right was exercised, do what is needed to carry out the requirement specified in the member's notice under section 101AD(2)(b).

(3) When the trustees or managers have done what is needed to carry out that requirement, they are discharged from any obligation—

(a) in respect of any rights (including conditional rights) of, or in respect of, the member to relevant benefits under the applicable rules, and

(b) to make any other payment by way of refund to or in respect of the member of, or in respect of—

(i) the contributions, or any payment, mentioned in section 101AB(4), or

(ii) any other contributions made to the scheme, or any other scheme, in respect of the member (other than any pension credit or amount attributable (directly or indirectly) to a pension credit).

(4) Where the member has elected for the contribution refund, the trustees or managers of the scheme must, within a reasonable period beginning with the date on which the right was exercised, do what is needed to secure that the amount of the contribution refund is paid to the member or as he directs.

(5) When the trustees or managers have done what is needed to secure the payment of the contribution refund as mentioned in subsection (4)—

(a) they are discharged from any obligation in respect of any rights (including conditional rights) of, or in respect of, the member to relevant benefits under the applicable rules, and

(b) if they are required under the applicable rules, or determine in accordance with those rules, to make any payment ("the refund payment") by way of refund to or in respect of the member of, or in respect of—

(i) the contributions, or any payment, mentioned in section 101AB(4), or

(ii) any other contributions made to the scheme, or any other scheme, in respect of the member (other than any pension credit or amount attributable (directly or indirectly) to a pension credit), the amount of the contribution refund may be set off against the refund payment.

(6) Where the trustees or managers fail to comply with subsection (2) or (4), section 10 of the Pensions Act 1995 (c. 26) (civil penalties) applies to any trustee or manager who has failed to take all reasonable steps to secure compliance.

101AH Powers of trustees or managers where right not exercised

(1) This section applies where—

(a) a member of an occupational pension scheme does not exercise a right acquired by him under section 101AB on or before the reply date or such later date as the trustees or managers of the scheme allow in his case under section 101AI(2), and

(b) the trustees or managers of the scheme have notified the member as mentioned in section 101AC(5).

(2) The trustees or managers may within a reasonable period beginning with—

(a) the reply date, or

(b) if a later date has been allowed as mentioned in subsection (1), that later date, pay the contribution refund to the member.

(3) When the trustees or managers have paid the contribution refund to the member—

(a) they are discharged from any obligation in respect of any rights (including conditional rights) of, or in respect of, the member to relevant benefits under the applicable rules, and

(b) if they are required under the applicable rules, or determine in accordance with those rules, to make any payment ("the refund payment") by way of refund to or in respect of the member of, or in respect of—

(i) the contributions, or any payment, mentioned in section 101AB(4), or

(ii) any other contributions made to the scheme, or any other scheme, in respect of the member (other than any pension credit or amount attributable (directly or indirectly) to a pension credit), the amount of the contribution refund may be set off against the refund payment.

101A1 Rights under section 101AB: further provisions

(1) A member of an occupational pension scheme loses any right acquired by him under section 101AB—

(a) if the scheme is wound up, or

(b) subject to subsection (2), if he fails to exercise the right on or before the reply date.

(2) If the member has failed to exercise any such right on or before the reply date, the trustees or managers of the scheme may allow him to exercise it on or before such later date as they may determine on the application of the member.

(3) Where the trustees or managers determine a later date under subsection (2)—

(a) they must give a notice in writing to that effect to the member, and

(b) subsection (1)(b) applies in relation to the member as if the reference to the reply date were a reference to the later date.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (3) and sections 101AC(2) and 101AD(2), a document or notice may be given to a person—

(a) by delivering it to him,

(b) by leaving it at his proper address, or

(c) by sending it by post to him at that address.

(5) For the purposes of subsection (4), and section 7 of the Interpretation Act 1978 (c. 30) (service of documents by post) in its application to that subsection, the proper address of a person is—

(a) in the case of a body corporate, the address of the registered or principal office of the body, and

(b) in any other case, the last known address of the person.

(6) This Chapter is subject to any provision made by or under section 61 (deduction of contributions equivalent premium from refund of scheme contributions)—

(a) permitting any amount to be deducted from any payment of a contribution refund, or

(b) requiring the payment of a contribution refund to be delayed.

(7) In this Chapter, except where the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the following meanings—

"the applicable rules" means—

(a) the rules of the scheme, except so far as—

(i) paragraph 3 of Schedule 5 to the Social Security Act 1989 (c. 24) (equal treatment),

(ii) section 129 of this Act,

(iii) section 117 of the Pensions Act 1995 (c. 26),

(iv) section 31(4) of the Welfare Reform and Pensions Act 1999 (c. 30) (pension debits: reduction of benefit), or

(v) section 264 of the Pensions Act 2004,

overrides them,

(b) any provision of any of those Acts which overrides or modifies any of the rules of the scheme by virtue of one of the provisions mentioned in paragraph (a), and

(c) any provision which the rules of the scheme do not contain but which the scheme must contain if it is to conform with the requirements of Chapter 1 of this Part;

"member" has the meaning given in section 101AA(5);

"permitted way", in relation to a cash transfer sum, means any of the ways specified in section 101AE(2) in which the sum may be used;

"relevant benefits" means benefits which are not attributable (directly or indirectly) to a pension credit;

"reply date", in relation to a member whose pensionable service has terminated, has the meaning given in section 101AC(3)(c).".'.—[Malcolm Wicks.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

1.14 pm

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this, we may take Government amendments Nos. 147, 156, 157, 159 to 164 and 171.

Mr. Wicks: Although the Opposition would prefer me to move the new clause at the end of Blackpool pier, I am—rather conventionally and conservatively—in the House of Commons, which is appropriate.

New clause 24 introduces a new provision that will increase opportunities for pension saving for early leavers. It will give them the choice of a cash transfer sum to be taken to a stakeholder or other appropriate scheme, or a refund of their contributions. Occupational pension schemes can have rules that require employees to be members of the scheme for a specified length of time before they secure rights under the scheme. That is known as a vesting period. Legislation provides that a vesting period cannot be longer than two years.

When members leave a pension scheme after their rights have vested but before their pensions are payable, their pension rights must be preserved in the scheme, or transferred to another scheme or arrangement. However, at present, employees who leave during a vesting period may find that the best they can get is a refund of their contributions, less tax. We believe that more employees, especially those who change jobs frequently, should be given greater opportunity to build up pension rights. The new clause will apply to employees who have been members of an occupational pension scheme for at least three months but leave before the end of a vesting period.

The trustees of the scheme will be required to inform the early leavers of their entitlement to the choice between a cash transfer sum and a refund of their contributions. They will have to set out the value of each option, tell the members about the types of scheme to which a cash transfer sum may be transferred, and give them a reasonable time in which to decide. Supplied with sufficient information to make an informed choice, early leavers should, in future, be in a better position to make positive decisions about their pension savings.

Younger people in particular, who may expect to have several relatively short-term jobs at the start of their working lives, may be more attracted to joining a scheme, when one is on offer, if that means that they can start to build up savings for a pension. Hon. Members may recall that, in our Green Paper, "Simplicity, security and choice: Working and saving for retirement", we proposed that rights in all schemes should vest immediately. The quid pro quo, to avoid schemes having to administer very small pensions for many years, was that trustees should be able to transfer small pension rights below a de minimis value to a stakeholder scheme, so long as the member did not object.

Consultation on the proposals produced several concerns, to which we gave careful thought. There was much anxiety about imposing extra administrative burdens on schemes and about the risk of trustees facing mis-selling claims if they transferred de minimis amounts without the members' consent. On the other hand, the proposals were warmly welcomed by consumer groups, especially those such as the Equal Opportunities Commission, which took the view that they would be of particular benefit to many women. We therefore drew up the revised proposal as set out in the subsequent paper, "Action on occupational pensions".

We believe that the amendments present a balanced way of improving opportunities for pension saving for early leavers without the disadvantages of the original proposals. They put the focus on individuals making an informed choice about their pension savings. Although we acknowledge that there will be some extra administrative requirements on schemes, they should be less burdensome than the original proposals. Many schemes that operate a vesting period already provide contribution refunds under their own rules. All schemes already have to have arrangements in place to calculate transfer values. The extra administrative load in those cases will be in presenting the options to members. It is not great when compared with the potential benefits for members.

We estimate that funding costs could be approximately £50 million a year for all occupational schemes and that additional administration costs will be around £9 million a year—clearly, with greater impact on companies where there is a high turnover of staff. Those additional costs will of course be incorporated in the revised regulatory impact assessment for the Bill.

On the other hand, the benefits for individuals could be significant. Let us consider, for example, the case of an employee who is a member of a defined contribution scheme for 18 months, earning £20,000 a year. If employee contributions were 3 per cent. of earnings and employer contributions were 4.5 per cent., a refund of contributions would be £900. Depending on investment return, a cash transfer sum might reasonably be between £2,000 and £2,500. That would provide a significant boost to personal saving for retirement. The clause itself is quite complex because it inserts a new chapter 5 into part 4 of the Pension Schemes Act 1993.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): That example is in the guidance notes that have helpfully been provided to Members. Rather than giving the figures of £2,000 and £2,500, as the Minister has just done, the notes cite a figure which is quite precise. Are these amounts determinate? The Minister's figures had a range of about a quarter. Is there a formula involved, or do we not know what the figure will be? Perhaps there is some discretion as to how much will be involved. I am slightly puzzled by this discrepancy.

Malcolm Wicks: It will depend on returns on investments, and things of that kind. The information note gave a very precise figure, and perhaps we have very precise calculators at the Department for Work and Pensions. I have now given the House a range of between £2,000 and £2,500, which might be more realistic. If I can give the hon. Gentleman more guidance in writing, I will do so. The main point that I am trying to make is that, in introducing this choice, we are determined that the individual making the choice should have proper information, because a transfer will often be the most sensible option for a younger person, or anyone else, to choose. The differences between taking the money, as it were, and the transfer value will be quite considerable.

Part 4 of the Pension Schemes Act 1993 deals with protections for early leavers. The new chapter 5 contains many of the provisions that apply to current rights to transfer values for members whose rights have already vested by the time they leave pensionable service. I assure the House, therefore, that the significant length of this clause does not represent some new substantial burden of regulation. It is rather a self-contained section of legislation in which some of the existing requirements on transfers are brought together to underpin the new option for employees. This forms a complete legislative guide for schemes to operate.

The clause provides that the scheme's trustees or managers must give early leavers sufficient written information for them to be able to make a choice of taking either a contribution refund or a cash transfer sum, as I have just noted. They must be given a reasonable period of time to make this decision. The notice issued to them must have a date by which they need to confirm their choice in writing. A code of practice produced by the regulator will set out what is a reasonable time, and the regulator will be able to impose sanctions on trustees or managers who fail to comply with the obligations in the legislation.

If a member elects to take a cash transfer sum, the trustees must ensure that it is used in a way permitted through this clause. Permitted options include transferring the sum into another occupational pension scheme, transferring to a stakeholder scheme or other personal pension, or purchasing an annuity. The clause also provides that, if a member fails to inform the trustees or managers in writing of his choice by the reply date, or any later date allowed, the trustees may by default pay a contribution refund. The scheme will not then be left with an obligation to hold on to small amounts of pension and maintain records of them for an indefinite period.

I believe that these new provisions will be of significant benefit to early leavers in future, and I commend them to the House. I should add that amendments Nos. 147, 156, 157, 159 to 164 and 171 are technical consequential changes—to existing definitions, for example—as a result of new clause 24. I ask hon. Members to accept the amendments.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): This is the first of the 28 Government new clauses that my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) talked about and the first of those that have not been subjected to adequate parliamentary scrutiny. At least we know that one new clause—new clause 23—has been subjected to adequate scrutiny, because I introduced it in Committee, where the Government objected to it but they have now brought it back. Unfortunately, new clause 24, which is one of the most significant new clauses, has not had adequate scrutiny. As the Minister said, it gives employees who have been with a company for just three months the ability to take with them, when they leave, a refund or a cash transfer sum of the kind that is currently available only to those who have been employed for more than two years.

Of course we want to encourage people to build up pension provision. It is generally recognised on both sides of the House that people are not making adequate provision for their pensions and that younger people often make no such provision because they think that it is something that they can delay until they are settled into employment later in life. I certainly see the merit, therefore, in helping people who change jobs quite often in their younger years to build up a pension provision, although there are already products such as personal pensions available to help them to do that. With the Government's proposed changes to the taxation of pensions and the idea of a lifetime limit, for example, it will also be much easier—one hopes—for people who change careers consistently to build up their pension provision. I recognise, however, that the proposal is worth considering.

The Equal Opportunities Commission, Age Concern and the Fawcett Society have all pointed out that the measure could disproportionately help women. We discussed pension provision for women in Committee and we all agreed that it needed to be improved, although we disagreed on how that might be done.

Why has the new clause been tabled so late in the Bill's passage? I am afraid that that will be a theme for the next hour, because the measure did not come out of the blue. Nor—unlike new clause 34, which we shall discuss tomorrow—has it required crisis meetings in the Government, the bringing together of different Departments and the brokering of an agreement by the Prime Minister. It was in the Green Paper and was then amended and put into the White Paper, so why was it not included when the legislation was introduced in the House of Commons? Why was it tabled only at the very last moment, a couple of days before Report? The explanatory notes were given to Members only yesterday or this morning, depending on when we received the letter. In fact, I am not sure that I received the letter at all; I had to photocopy the one that had been given to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson)—but do not worry, I have read it anyway.

Because the measure has been introduced so late, the Government have not allowed outside organisations to make comments and criticisms or question the new clause's drafting. The Minister knows only too well that that is an important part of the legislative process. It is not simply a question of Ministers and Opposition spokesmen arguing things out across the Dispatch Box; the parliamentary process allows us to raise these issues in Parliament on behalf of outside organisations such as trade unions—I know that some hon. Members will speak on their behalf today—pension fund managers and many others. That is simply not possible when important changes such as this are introduced at the last moment.

Will the Minister say more about the significant changes that have taken place between the publication of the Green Paper, the White Paper and the Bill? He touched on the matter earlier when he said that the proposal in the Green Paper for immediate vesting was objected to by employers, although it had been welcomed by consumer organisations and people representing employees. Will he tell us more about the practical nature of those objections, because some of them will apply to people who have been working for only three months?

Will the Minister also explain why he has dropped altogether the proposal in the Green Paper for schemes that have to administer very small amounts of pension to be able to transfer the de minimis amounts to a stakeholder pension? There will still be people on low incomes who will have de minimis amounts after three months and the administration of a large number of such pension schemes could place significant burdens on the pension provider, the cost of which will have to be picked up by all the other scheme members; there is no such thing as a free lunch.

1.30 pm

I asked the National Association of Pension Funds for its view but, like the rest of us, it has struggled to keep up with the Government's new clauses. It stressed that its initial comments did not represent a settled NAPF view, but it highlighted some interesting concerns, saying that "the 3 months vesting period could potentially cause large problems for an employer who has a large turnover of staff. The result will be lots of small value benefits being vested and significant ongoing admin of these benefits as a result. A lot of the detail around the transfer value is to be prescribed so it is difficult to comment on the basis to be used. The power to transfer out must be given full protection and effective ways to do this will need to be stated."

But, of course, we do not know what these are yet. It continues:

"How viable is the transfer out of very small benefits and are other providers willing to accept these small values?"

Are there providers who will accept the value of someone who has been in employment for only three months? The NAPF also pointed out that the original two-year vesting requirements were suggested precisely because of those potential problems.

In the Green Paper, the Government said, optimistically, that the proposals could help employers to retain staff. That claim was subsequently dropped in the White Paper and the Minister did not repeat it in the House, because it might have exactly the opposite effect. The pension rights offered by a company are often an incentive to remain with a company for the long term, but these measures could give a perverse incentive that allows employees to leave after three months without having to make a commitment over a longer term. Someone will not be as settled in employment after three months as they would be after a year or two. Perhaps the Government could explain the three-month figure.

I know that, elsewhere in the Department, 13 weeks is the definition of sustainable employment in new deal programmes and the like. What is the reason for three months? What assessment have the Government made of the impact on employers' ability to retain staff? Have they any evidence to back up the claim made in the Green Paper? What are the costs? The Minister said that the measure did not represent significant extra burdens for schemes, but what is the evidence for that? We have not seen a full regulatory impact assessment, but there will be administrative costs for schemes. I know that the Minister mentioned that in passing, but he did not give hard figures. Perhaps he would undertake to provide us with a proper regulatory impact assessment.

Has the Minister considered something that was floated by the Government themselves? There may be a perverse incentive for employers to introduce waiting periods; in other words, periods after which an employee could join a scheme. In effect, that would defeat the object of the new clause. A company could take on a new employee but say that he could not be a member of the pension scheme for at least two years.

Flexibility and enabling people to build up pension funds while they move jobs is important. We are not against the principle of the new clause, but a huge amount of detail remains to be fleshed out. As it has been introduced so late in the process, it is difficult for the Opposition to undertake the scrutiny that is needed.

Mr. Webb: We welcome the spirit of new clause 24. The people affected by regular job moves or short-term employment will tend to be younger people and, perhaps, women in particular. One of the legion of reasons why many women have poor private pension rights in retirement today is a problem that we are trying to deal with through new clause 24: the fact that they may never have entered a scheme or that, if they were part-time, they had fewer rights than full-time workers. Many of those things have been changed but the new clause deals with something that remains a problem: the fact some people never get into a scheme for long enough to build up a decent pension right.

My wife left the NHS pension scheme after a fairly short period and, as they used to say, took out her superannuation. As a result, she will accrue smaller occupational pension rights. Obviously, she married wisely, so that should not be a problem but—abstracted from my present circumstances—we want women to have good pension rights in their own right, not least because they might not end up being married to their present husband as pensioners. Anything that gives people in short-term jobs, and women in particular, better pension rights has to be a good thing in principle. We welcome the principle of the new clause.

Before the thoughtful speech of the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne), I had written down, "Why now?" The Minister referred to "Action on Occupational Pensions", the White Paper that we were not allowed to call a White Paper that was published about a year ago. Why has the new clause appeared at this point in the proceedings when it is so difficult to make a serious assessment of it? It is not driven by the EU directive or by the tax simplification in the Finance Bill, which is the reason why so many parts of the process have been late.

What has been the problem? Were the drafters so busy with the other things that the Government have done that this was deemed a low priority and had to be done late in the day? I am concerned that this has been slipped in, as it were, especially given that we are all sympathetic towards the measure. I do not think that the Government want to avoid scrutiny of it; I am sure that they do not.

I intervened on the Minister to get an understanding of how much people can transfer across. In the worked example given by the Minister—someone on £20,000 a year, with 3 per cent. employee contributions and working for 18 months—one can see that, if they have their money back, they get £900, but I am puzzled as to where the cash equivalent transfer figure comes from. I thought that if they got £900, presumably the tax relief would have been considered. If one put £900 into a pension fund, it would be grossed up by the amount of tax relief, presumably, and would be worth more than £1,200. If one then added back in the value of the employer contributions, one would get a figure of about £2,500, rather than the £2,385 we have been given. The figure is not clear.

New clause 24 alone takes up six pages—one can see why we sought to divide the House on the timing of debates—that none of us really understands. [Interruption.] I am sure that the Minister does understand it; I absolve him from that, but the rest of us are struggling. For example, subsection (1) of proposed section 101AF, which is headed, "Calculation of cash transfer sum", says:

> "Cash transfer sums are to be calculated and verified in the prescribed manner",

It is apparent that dozens and dozens of regulations will be associated with the dozens of new clauses that the Government have tabled. That raises a serious issue that we might as well deal with now, rather than at every single new clause. Presumably, there will be a substantial burden on the parliamentary drafters in the Department who produce the regulations, which are the law of the land just as much as the new clauses. Have additional staff been taken on by the Government? Have the Government obtained additional parliamentary drafting resources to deal with the vast range of regulations that will be needed to support the new clauses? Given that we want this measure included—we want early leavers given good opportunities to build up pension rights—we want it to be included as soon as possible. If the Government have a couple of dozen regulations to write, we might have to wait a long time. I hope that the Minister can reassure us that his Department has the capacity needed to produce the detailed regulations required.

There are also worries about the scrutiny of those regulations. I am not aware that they will be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure. The chances are that they will be among the many negative resolutions that just appear on a list, about which many of us think, "Can we be bothered to try to force an hour and a half on that, when we can't amend it anyway?" I am worried about the Department's capacity to produce the regulations in a timely manner and in a way that will allow people to make useful comment.

My point on the cash transfer sums is that they must be definitive. To produce the figures given to us in our briefing notes, the Department must have had in mind a formula or structure for the sums. For the benefit of the wider audience who read our proceedings, will the Minister put on record the Department's current thinking on the way in which the transfer values will be calculated? A quite precise figure was given in our briefing, but the Minister implied that there would be a large range of possible transfer values. It would be helpful if the Government's thinking could be placed on record now so that, if there is a problem, actuaries and others who understand such matters far better than we in the House do can make early representations to the Government to allow them to do the best job possible when the regulations appear.

I have a further question on calculating cash equivalent transfer values. Are they intended to be actuarially neutral? In other words, is it intended that the amount of money that I will be given to put into a new pension if I leave my old one will be simply the equivalent of the money that I have put in, the money that the employer has put in and the return that we have had on it, or is some concept of incentive built in? Are the Government adding a bit at the expense of other scheme members or is there a slight penalty? Under the regulation in new section 101AF(3)(a), "amounts" may which involves something of a penalty element. Apart from that, is it intended that the transfer values should be actuarially neutral or is there some reward? The Minister hinted that there would be some reward for taking the money and reinvesting it in a new pension. Presumably, any such reward would be to the detriment of other scheme members if it were other than actuarially fair. If that were the case, we would object, so I hope that the Minister can clear up that point for us.

We want improved provision for people who leave early and, ideally, we want the money that they already have in a pension scheme to go into a new pension scheme, rather than just paying for a foreign holiday. That has to be the right direction. However, as will no doubt be remarked again this afternoon and during the coming three days, much is still being left to regulations of which we have not yet even seen drafts, so I hope that the Minister can give the House and the wider audience a clearer idea of the Government's thinking on these matters.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): If new clause 24 and its associated amendments had been introduced when the Bill was first laid before the House, I could have consulted actuarial adviser Mr. Gordon Bayley, but sadly his memorial service will be held on Thursday at St. Lawrence Jewry. The Society of Actuaries memorial notice to him shows that he was one of the people who helped to build up the pensions industry in a massive way at the National Provident Institution, because he saw that the effect of tax on pensions would allow great growth in the provision of second pensions. Both main parties now agree that that is the way to go forward where possible, and the only reason to introduce the new clause is to allow the best value to come from what remains of second pensions.

This is not the debate in which to discuss every other matter on which adjustment is necessary but, just to mention one or two, we have not solved the problem of the overseas pensioners in half the world who do not even receive upratings on their state pensions. That might be lawful, but it is a totally unjustifiable penalty on British pensioners living in the old Dominion countries, such as Canada, South Africa and Australia. Nor does this measure deal with the problem of the second wives of officers married before 1973. However, what we can do on this measure is to give in some detail the questions that the Government must answer.

One of those questions, on actuarial fairness—I am sure that Gordon Bayley would have asked me to ask this—is whether we are dealing with fairness simply in terms of the contributions made by the employer and employee, or whether we are talking about an actuarially fair share of the pension fund itself. If, for example, I am affected, and my pension fund has for some reason been invested incredibly wisely, will I receive a greater amount in the cash transfer than if I had been in a pension fund that had not been invested with particular success?

If there are adjustments in relation to taxation, can the Government say now whether the rates prescribed will be the tax rates that exist now or a collection of the tax rates that have existed since the time when I was a member of a pension scheme? If I may use a small example—I shall not take it too far, because it is not important—I have an expectation in 2009 of receiving £351 a year from the successor to the pension fund that I was in before I entered the House of Commons. I used to put neon lights outside theatres and cinemas in the west end, and the old Signs Department for which I worked, which became part of Mills and Allen, and is part of the united pension plan, will apparently give my estate £250 if I die before 2009, and will give me £351.47 if I survive long enough.

I am interested to know whether people like me will, in principle—I have had the chance of earning a pension here, so I am not concerned about the pennies—have a gain to their pension fund because they will not have to have those little pots, which will be accepted as a reason why the Government are introducing this measure. The question is whether the transfer value in is the same as that which an actuary would volunteer as the transfer value out. In the days when, in the private sector, I was responsible for the interests of pensioners and prospective pensioners, that was the question that I put. I would ask not only how much a company would give in transfer to a person who wanted to leave but how much prospective pension entitlement it would want to give to a person in those circumstances in the future, and see whether the actuary gave the same answer to both questions.

I hope that there will be some way, in consultation with the actuarial profession, insurance companies and pension managers, in which Ministers will be able to give a clear answer to that question. I do not think that it will be possible for them to give one today, because there has not been time to go into the details, but that is one question that needs asking.

A further question is on the tax treatment of pension funds. We will tie round this Government's neck until they go from office—which I hope will not be too far away—the fact of their taking away what was £5 billion a year from prospective pensioners. The study by John Littlewood for the Centre for Policy Studies shows that, although the economy may not have done too badly during the past seven years, the stock market, which is where many pension funds have gone, has gone down in real terms. When we are talking about the calculation for the transfers, we have to realise that one of the inglories of the present Government is the way in which they have diminished the funds that pensioners have held on their behalf. I hope that the Government are suitably ashamed of that.

Malcolm Wicks: I shall try to deal with some of the points raised by the hon. Member for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley) in a moment, although I shall not be drawn too far on the period before he entered the House of Commons when, as I understood his story, his name was in lights above west end cinemas. Perhaps I have deliberately misunderstood that, although I think that it led to an issue about transfer values.

I shall first deal with some of the questions of the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne), who is not in Blackpool but in the House of Commons. I am pleased to see half of his Front-Bench team here. He asked, not for the first time, why the new clause was late. There is no specific answer to that question, although the reason relates to the general answer that I gave when we were discussing the motion on the three days of debate: we have been under a great deal of pressure to get the Bill into shape because of the demands for the protection that it offers to come into force as soon as possible. Because of the need to consider the issues surrounding the pension protection fund, and the more recent concerns about Allied Steel and Wire and other workers and the regulator, this measure has had to take its place in the queue in terms of time for consideration and drafting. I am afraid that I can add nothing more on that.

The idea of simply doing away with vesting periods altogether has been touched on. The Green Paper proposal that such periods no longer be permitted was coupled with the proposal that trustees be able to transfer de minimis amounts to a stakeholder pension. Those proposals received a mixed reception and we are concerned that they would impose excessive funding and administrative costs on schemes. The provisions in the new clause strike a reasonable balance for both schemes and members, and fully support the promotion of informed choice in pension saving. It is a question of striking a balance and we hope that we have got it right.

Mr. George Osborne: On a related point about which I forgot to ask the Minister earlier, what happens to police officers and firemen, for example, in unfunded public sector schemes who leave after three months? Is the police service or fire service required to provide a cash transfer?

Malcolm Wicks: If I may, I shall come back to the hon. Gentleman on that point.

During the discussion of transfer values, it was almost implied—although not by the hon. Gentleman—that we have invented a new concept but, of course, we have not. Transfer values have been around for a very long time—since before the name of the hon. Member for Worthing, West was in cinema lights. Essentially, the answer to the question of how they are calculated is the same as the answer to the general question about transfer values. We are not establishing a new concept. Indeed, as some of us know, many people in public sector schemes can already transfer money from one scheme to another type of scheme, so I would imagine that such an arrangement is perfectly possible. For the sector as a whole, we concede that a reasonable time should be allowed for people to make use of their pension rights, but in our view that period should be three months. Two years was too long.

The hon. Member for Tatton asked whether certain providers will accept very small investments. We accept that very small amounts might cause disproportionate administrative costs, which is why an employee will have to have been in a scheme for three months to qualify for a cash transfer sum. Such a provision reflects the argument about where we should draw the line in terms of a time period. However, so far as people who have been in a scheme for up to two years are concerned, we are not talking about trivial sums, especially where such a person qualifies for more than one cash transfer sum from a succession of employments.

Peter Bottomley: Can the Minister tell us, either now or later, whether the three-month period applies not only to full-timers but to part-timers?

Malcolm Wicks: It is very important that we give equal rights to part-time and full-time workers, so the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is yes.

On the cost burden of the schemes, I did in fact give the figures during my opening speech. I am pleased to reiterate that the estimated administrative cost is £9 million a year and that the actual cost of the new pension rights could be some £50 million a year. It is clearly important that a fully revised regulatory impact assessment be published before this issue is considered in another place, and that is what we shall do. Essentially, cash transfer sums are based on the rights that the individual would have accrued in the occupational pension scheme but for the vesting rule. I do not pretend to be an actuary myself, but if any Member requires more detail on the actuarial niceties of the provision, I am happy to supply it.

I should make clear to the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb)—I thought that I had already done so, but perhaps the point was missed—one of the differences in terms of choice. During the period in question, an employee can choose to take out their contribution but not the employer's. Of course, because the transfer value is going to be used for pension purposes, it includes both the employer's and the employee's contribution. That will help to explain the arithmetic to the hon. Gentleman. [Interruption.] He looks doubtful, but we shall put new batteries in our calculator and provide him with any further information that we can.

Mr. Webb: I am not sure that the Minister has responded to the point that the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) made about the danger of the new clause being circumvented by certain schemes. If a given scheme has to count someone in straightaway, new rules could be set up that prevent someone from being in the scheme for the relevant period. Is there not a danger that the new clause could indeed be circumvented in the way that he suggested?

Malcolm Wicks: I think that one or two such schemes—in which one serves a probationary period, as it were—already exist, and I regret that fact. Of course, this issue touches on a wider question. The Government are committed to what we call the voluntary approach to spreading good practice and to encouraging and enabling employers to have proper pension schemes; we are not in the business of compulsion. However, many urge that approach on us, and the Pensions Commission will one day report on such matters. The logic that follows from the hon. Gentleman's question requires that we move towards compulsion, but that is not where we are at the moment.

Mr. George Osborne: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, and to the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) for pointing out that the Minister has not in fact answered my question. Indeed, in talking about some of the representations that they had received, the Government raised this issue themselves in their White Paper. They said:

"There were a number of concerns, not least the extra administrative burdens that would arise and the risk that these might prompt employers to introduce waiting periods, which would be a regressive step".

The Government have not answered a question that they themselves posed.

Malcolm Wicks: Such a step would be regressive, but the question is whether the Government should be able to legislate to prevent that from happening. As I said to the hon. Member for Northavon, that raises the wider question of compulsion. We do not want to go there, but of course, the door remains ever open.

It is very useful that the hon. Member for Northavon is prompting the hon. Member for Tatton on certain questions. Given that the Conservative Front Bench is only 50 per cent. full and that the shadow Minister of State cannot be here today, such co-operation is important.

In the light of my comments, I ask that the new clause be accepted.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 25

CATEGORIES OF PENSION SCHEME

'(1) Section 1 of the Pension Schemes Act 1993 (c. 48) (categories of pension scheme) is amended as follows.

(2) The provisions of the section shall become subsection (1) of the section.

(3) In that subsection, for the definitions of "occupational pension scheme" and "personal pension scheme" substitute—

""occupational pension scheme" means a pension scheme—

(a) that—

(i) for the purpose of providing benefits to, or in respect of, people with service in employments of a description, or

(ii) for that purpose and also for the purpose of providing benefits to, or in respect of, other people, is established by, or by persons who include, a person to whom subsection (2) applies, and

(b) that has its main administration in the United Kingdom or outside the member States;

"personal pension scheme" means a pension scheme that—

(a) is not an occupational pension scheme, and

(b) is established by a person within any of the paragraphs of section 144(1) of the Finance Act 2004;".

(4) After that subsection insert—

"(2) This subsection applies—

(a) where people in employments of the description concerned are employed by someone, to a person who employs such people,

(b) to a person in an employment of that description, and

(c) to a person representing interests of a description framed so as to include—

(i) interests of persons who employ people in employments of the description mentioned in paragraph (a), or

(ii) interests of people in employments of that description.

(3) For the purposes of subsection (2), if a person is in an employment of the description concerned by reason of holding an office (including an elective office) and is entitled to remuneration for holding it, the person responsible for paying the remuneration shall be taken to employ the office-holder.

(4) In the definition in subsection (1) of "occupational pension scheme", the reference to a description includes a description framed by reference to an employment being of any of two or more kinds.

(5) In subsection (1) "pension scheme" (except in the phrases "occupational pension scheme", "personal pension scheme" and "public service pension scheme") means a scheme or other arrangements, comprised in one or more instruments or agreements, having or capable of having effect so as to provide benefits to or in respect of people—

(a) on retirement,

(b) on having reached a particular age, or

(c) on termination of service in an employment.

(6) The power of the Treasury under section 144(4) of the Finance Act 2004 (power to amend sections 144 and 145) includes power consequentially to amend—

(a) paragraph (a) of the definition in subsection (1) of "personal pension scheme", and

(b) any provision in force in Northern Ireland corresponding to that paragraph.".'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 76, 132, 169, 170 and 172.

Mr. Pond: New clause 25 introduces new definitions of the occupational pension scheme and personal pension scheme in section 1 of the Pension Schemes Act 1993. The changes are a consequence of the tax simplification provisions in the Finance Bill, and they also ensure that the UK is compliant with the European Union directive on institutions for occupational retirement pensions. I shall also deal with Government amendments Nos. 76, 132, 169, 170 and 172, which are directly consequential to the changes to the definitions.

The current definition of "occupational pension scheme" is very similar to that for "personal pension scheme". If we had had to rely on those definitions alone, it could have proved difficult to decide how some schemes should be classified. In practice, that has not proved to be a problem until now, because the Inland Revenue system has always made it clear within its eight categories for determining tax approval whether a scheme is given tax approval as an occupational pension scheme or as a personal pension scheme. However, that will change under the simplified tax regime introduced in the Finance Bill. In future, schemes will register for tax purposes, rather than having to obtain approval.

Clause 143 of the Finance Bill will introduce a single simplified regime that will apply the same registration treatment to all schemes, no longer distinguishing between occupational and personal pension schemes. The definitions in the Pension Schemes Act 1993 will therefore become critical in determining to which regulatory regime a scheme will be subject—the pensions regulator for occupational pension schemes or the Financial Services Authority for personal pension schemes.

2 pm

The new definitions in the new clause will ensure that pension schemes are correctly classified. For example, the group personal pension scheme is properly classified as a personal pension scheme, not as an occupational scheme. Subsection (3) provides that an occupational pension scheme is a scheme that provides "benefits to, or in respect of," employees and ex-employees in a particular employment, as described in the scheme documentation. It may be a single-employer scheme or a multi-employer scheme. It further provides that, for the purposes of definition, an "occupational pension scheme" is one

"that has its main administration in the UK or outside" the EU. The definition of personal pension scheme is in line with that in the Finance Bill, but includes the words

"is not an occupational pension scheme".

That is to ensure that, where a company—an insurance company, for example—is authorised under clause 144(1) of the Finance Bill to establish a personal pension scheme and it has an occupational pension scheme for its own employees, that scheme is correctly classified as an occupational scheme.

Subsection (4) makes it clear that an occupational pension scheme can be established by a single employer, a group of employers or by a person representing such employers or their employees. It further defines a pension scheme as a scheme or arrangement that provides benefits "on retirement", at "a particular age" or "on termination of service". It does not include arrangements that provide only death benefits. As now, those will be excluded from the scope of the Pensions Act.

Government amendments Nos. 76, 132, 169, 170 and 172 are directly consequential on the new definitions of occupational pension scheme and personal pension scheme introduced by new clause 25.

Mr. Webb: Before the Minister moves on to the consequential amendments, I refer him to subsection (3) of the new clause. According to our helpful notes, the subsection is needed for particular schemes, such as MPs' schemes—that obviously caught our eye—or those for the police. Will he clarify what is so special about those schemes that they require a separate subsection, because I do not understand what makes them so different?

Mr. Pond: The schemes are in respect of those employees or former employees in a particular employment, as described in the scheme documentation. It could be a single-employer or a multi-employer scheme. We were seeking to clarify definitions in the new clause, so it was important to show where those schemes fitted within the structure of classifications.

The consequential Government amendments Nos. 132, 169, 170 and 172 amend the definition of "employer" in clause 275 of the Bill and in section 124 of the Pensions Act 1995. Clause 275 provides definitions of the terms used in the Bill, and section 124 does the same for part 1 of the Pensions Act 1995, which deals with occupational pensions. The amendments will ensure that the definition of employer is consistent with the new definition of an occupational pension scheme. The amendments are clarifications, which ensure that occupational pension schemes and personal pension schemes are correctly identified and that, as a result, they fall to be regulated by the appropriate authority—the pensions regulator for occupational pension schemes and the Financial Services Authority for personal pension schemes.

Mr. George Osborne: It seems strange that, after ploughing through a Bill of 282 clauses and 13 schedules, which were debated in 22 sittings in Committee, at the end of the process, the Government suddenly decide that they need to include some definitions of what is being talked about. At times, while listening to the Minister, I felt that I was attending one of the lectures about pension schemes provided by the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb)—[Interruption.] That is probably a fate worse than death, when I think about it.

I have no fundamental criticism of the new clause, but I do want to ask about the extent of joined-up thinking involved in it. As I understand it, the new clause will define all pension schemes as either occupational or personal. That sounds like a pretty good thing, but if we study the Bill, we find that it is littered with other terminology. For example, when I looked at the Bill this morning, I opened it at clause 113, which deals with money purchase schemes. We know that such schemes are personal pension schemes, but why is the terminology used in that clause different from that used in the definitional new clause? If we want simplification and if the point of the new clause is to create common terminology, should not the same terminology apply throughout the Bill? One of the problems that the wider public have with understanding pensions is the fact that different forms of words are often used to describe pretty much the same product.

That brings me to the Finance Bill. When I have finished on the Pensions Bill, my joy on Tuesday next week will be to embark in Committee for five weeks or so on consideration of the pensions tax provisions of the Finance Bill, shadowing for much of the time the Financial Secretary. I have already started to mug up on the Finance Bill, and I am sure that the Minister knows that clause 142 of it has its own set of definitions for pensions. Indeed, it has four definitions—dividing pensions into four different categories. The first is occupational, though it also calls them defined benefit schemes—another example of the use of different terminology. Secondly, the Finance Bill refers to money purchase schemes, using the words "money purchase" instead of "personal" as in this Bill. It introduces a third new category called "cash balance schemes". They do not appear in Department for Work and Pensions legislation, but in Inland Revenue legislation they do so. Finally, there are hybrid schemes. Leaving them aside—they explain themselves—we have three definitions: occupational, money purchase and cash balance. Only one—the occupational—uses the terminology in new clause 25.

There is no evidence of joined-up thinking, and it is genuinely confusing for outsiders reading the legislation to come across a whole series of different definitions and to encounter phrases used in one piece of legislation that do not appear in another. Even in the same Bill, as in the one before us, different terms are used to describe exactly the same scheme. I am all in favour of definitions. Personally, I am attracted to those set out in the new clause, which defines all pensions as either personal or occupational. When the Minister responds, will he explain why the Government have used a multitude of different phrases in different legislation and in different parts of the same legislation?

Mr. Webb: To paraphrase the Minister loosely, the purpose of new clause 25 is to deal with the complications arising from tax simplification. In the past, pensions legislation has relied on tax legislation, but that has now changed, so we have to do something to ensure that pensions legislation still works.

One matter of concern is the distinction in the new clause between occupational pensions and personal pensions, which is not as clear cut as it appears at first sight. As far as a worker in a company that runs a group personal pension is concerned, his pension is the works pension. It is the pension arranged through the employer, who may make an employer contribution, and the provider may come into the workplace to explain the scheme. As far as the worker is concerned, it is a company pension. However, the new clause states that it is not an occupational pension, but a personal pension. The practical significance of that distinction is that complaints about the different pensions must be directed to different regulators.

I have some sympathy for employees who do not understand the first thing about pensions, but they will be asked to understand that pensions can be arranged through the workplace and involve employer contributions and so on, and yet not be occupational schemes. It is possible for such pensions to be group personal schemes, in which case people must go to the FSA and not the pensions regulator when they are unhappy with the pension or when something goes wrong.

I do not want to go beyond the scope of the new clause, so I shall merely observe in passing that that is another reason why new confusion will be created by having one set of pensions regulated by the pensions regulator and another by the FSA. New clause 25 makes a clear distinction between two sorts of pensions in order to send people down different regulatory tracks, but should not both be regulated by a single pensions regulator? We are talking only about different types of pension, after all. New clause 25 perpetuates a distinction whereas the process of simplification suggests that all pensions should fall under one regulatory regime. Why do we want people to have recourse to two different regulators, when their view is the same as Alan Pickering's—that a pension is a pension is a pension? Clearly, that is not the view of the Department for Work and Pensions or, as the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) noted, the Treasury.

I have two specific and detailed questions about new clause 25. First, I intervened on the Minister in relation to proposed new subsection 3(a)(ii), which deals with pensions for MPs, police officers and so on. I am still not 100 per cent. clear as to what makes those schemes different. I suppose that Members of Parliament are employed by the Fees Office, as that is what pays our salaries. Police officers are employed by police authorities, but what makes those schemes different from an occupational scheme run by Wiggins Widgets, for example? Why does the Bill need a separate provision for those schemes?

Secondly, I do not understand why subsection 3(b) of the new clause states that an occupational pension scheme is a pension scheme which "has its main administration in the United Kingdom or outside" the EU. If I belong to the occupational scheme of, say, a French company, why would that scheme not be regarded as an occupational pension scheme under new clause 25? Not being a personal pension, the scheme would not be regulated by the pensions regulator, but neither would a scheme outside the EU. Why does the new clause have that rather bizarre scope? It provides that the only occupational schemes that count are ones in the UK or outside the EU. Surely the pensions regulator has no jurisdiction outside the EU, for goodness' sake? What on earth is that provision about? I am bewildered by that bit. I am sure that there is a good reason for it; there usually is, but the point of the provision is completely lost on me.

To sum up, I should prefer it if the Bill did not distinguish between the different types of pensions. We have tax simplification, so could we not also have pensions simplification? Could we not have one regulator for pensions, and not send people down different regulatory tracks? What is special about the schemes that I have mentioned, and what is the point of the provision in respect of the country in which a scheme's main administration takes place? Why do we have the two categories, with some sort of gap in between them? I am sure that clarification of those points by the Minister would be helpful for the House.

Mr. Pond: The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) sought to make us all jealous by telling us what his diary looks like for the next few weeks, given his involvement with the Finance Bill as well as this Pensions Bill. He asked why we were proposing a new clause that deals with definitions, given that we spent a long time discussing the Bill in Committee. I can tell him that new clause 25 and other new clauses that we are putting forward are consequential on the Finance Bill.

2.15 pm

The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) said that the Government were going in for extra complication because of the simplification being introduced in the Finance Bill. I do not go along with that characterisation, but the Inland Revenue is simplifying its procedures for exempting pension schemes and is moving away from the eight different sets of rules that currently apply to a process of registration. I think that the House will agree that that is sensible if we want to ensure that the system is more straightforward and simple, but it gives us a problem when it comes to classifying pension schemes as either occupational or personal.

The hon. Member for Northavon also said that schemes had been described in different ways throughout the Bill and our discussions, and he referred to money purchase schemes, direct contribution schemes, and so on. The important point is that those terms are descriptions of different types of pension scheme, but that we need to know whether they are classified as occupational or personal pensions. For instance, DC and DB schemes are both occupational pension schemes, but it is important to distinguish between them, as their provisions could be rather different. That is why the changes that we propose are necessary.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): My immediate diary commitment is that I must go to the Select Committee on Home Affairs very shortly, but I want to take up the point made by both the Conservative and the Liberal Democrat spokesmen. I do not know whether this matter is the subject of some other amendment, but how much information is given to employees to ensure that they understand their pension schemes and how they differ from others? Are trade unions able to give detailed information so that their members can know whether their pensions are personal or occupational, what their rights are, and how to pursue complaints?

Mr. Pond: When my hon. Friend goes to the Home Affairs Committee, I hope that he remembers to take his identity card with him, or he might not gain entry.

David Winnick: Not if I have anything to do with it.

Mr. Pond: That is precisely why I made that point.

A very important component—of this Bill and of the Government's agenda on pensions—is that people should be able to make an informed choice. We must make sure that people fully understand their responsibilities and entitlements under the various schemes. We want to make sure that the various stakeholders involved, including the trade unions and representatives of scheme members, are given as much information as possible. That is a very important part of what we are trying to achieve, with this Bill and through the wider agenda of informed choice.

The hon. Member for Tatton also asked why the Government have adopted the different approaches evident in the Bill. I can tell him that it is because we need to make sure that the appropriate mechanism for regulation—the pensions regulator or the FSA—is used.

The hon. Member for Northavon asked why all pension schemes should not be regulated by a single organisation. We discussed that matter in Committee, as he will recall. The regulator will be concerned not with the sale or conditions of sale of products such as personal pension schemes, but with making sure that occupational schemes are properly administered. Those are two quite different functions, and we feel that it is sensible to provide that they be carried out separately by separate organisations.

Mr. Webb: I accept that the sale of pension schemes is a separate matter, but what about schemes that are up and running? I think that I am right in saying that the Government intend that, in future, an employer can require an employee to join an employer-sponsored group personal pension scheme as a condition of employment. So an employer will make an employee join a scheme and will put money into it, and the scheme will be delivered through the workplace, but the employee, if he is not happy with how the money in a scheme is managed, is supposed to know that that is nothing to do with the pensions regulator. If the scheme were a defined benefit final salary scheme or something similar, the employee would have recourse to a different regulator. Does not that seem an unnecessary confusion for the employee?

Mr. Pond: We went round this course a number of times in Committee. Of course a number of provisions in the Bill will give protection to people in whatever sort of scheme that is operated, but our feeling is that it is important to have specific forms of regulation for the different types of scheme. When talking about the definition of schemes—whether they are occupational or personal—what is important is the focus of that regulation and trying to disentangle it from Inland Revenue arrangements for the tax exemption of schemes.

I think that I have—

Mr. Webb rose—

Mr. Pond: Oh, there is one further point to address before the hon. Gentleman rises to speak. He gave a hypothetical example of the French scheme and an occupational pension scheme based in another member state—a cross-border scheme. We will apply elements of pensions legislation under the provisions that we shall discuss in a few minutes when we deal with cross-border arrangements. Perhaps we could defer my response to the hon. Gentleman's point until then.

Mr. Webb: I am grateful for the Minister's response on the specific example that I gave, but the new clause refers to schemes outside member states. If the point of the new clause is to direct people to the right regulator, what dominion does the pensions regulator have over schemes based outside member states? Why is there reference to anything to do with schemes outside member states?

Mr. Pond: As I shall explain in a few moments, the regulator will have a role in relation to schemes that have a host member state, if we are talking in EU terms, from which the contributions flow. That is what I hope

[Mr. Pond]

I shall be able to clarify when we talk in a few moments about some of the cross-border and multinational issues.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 26

UK-BASED OCCUPATIONAL PENSION SCHEME TO BE TRUST WITH EFFECTIVE RULES

'(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply to an occupational pension scheme that has its main administration in the United Kingdom.

(2) If the scheme is not established under irrevocable trusts, the trustees or managers of the scheme must secure that no funding payment is accepted.

(3) If the rules stipulating—

(a) the benefits under the scheme, and

(b) any conditions subject to which benefits under the scheme accrue, are not in force, or if those rules are not set out in writing, the trustees or managers of the scheme must secure that no funding payment is accepted.

(4) Subsection (2) or (3) does not apply to an occupational pension scheme if it is a prescribed scheme or a scheme of a prescribed description.

(5) Section 10 of the Pensions Act 1995 (c. 26) (civil penalties) applies to a trustee or manager of an occupational pension scheme that has its main administration in the United Kingdom if—

(a) subsection (2) or (3) requires the trustees or managers of the scheme to secure that no funding payment is accepted,

(b) a funding payment is accepted, and

(c) the trustee or manager has failed to take all reasonable steps to secure that no funding payment is accepted.

(6) In this section "funding payment", in relation to a scheme, means a payment made to the scheme to fund benefits for, or in respect of, any or all of the members.'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Pond: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

Government new clause 27—Non-EC occupational pension scheme to be trust with UK-resident trustee.

Government new clause 28—Representative of non-EC occupational pension scheme to be treated as trustee.

Government amendments Nos. 213 and 214.

Mr. Pond: I have not had to ask the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) to be patient for too long, because we are now talking about new clauses 26, 27 and 28, which will ensure that occupational pension schemes established in the UK and those established outside the EU that have employees in the UK continue to be set up under trust. Occupational pension schemes that are established in other member states are not covered by these clauses, and I will deal with those when we come to the clauses on cross-border schemes in a few moments.

New clauses 26 to 28 are consequential on the tax simplification provisions in the Finance Bill and are in compliance with the European directive, which demands legal separation between an occupational pension scheme and a sponsoring undertaking. At the moment, it is a condition of tax approval that an occupational pension scheme is set up under trust. Under the new arrangements introduced in the Finance Bill, that condition will no longer apply. As I have explained, instead there will be a single simplified registration regime for all pension schemes for tax purposes. The same registration requirements will apply for all schemes.

It has long been the practice in UK pension schemes to use trust law to provide that separation, and this approach is recognised by the directive. We also believe that trust law continues to be the best legal basis under which occupational pension schemes in the UK should operate. The Pensions Act 1995 and other pensions legislation are built on the foundation of trust law and it offers the best means of providing security and confidence for scheme members. These clauses, therefore, maintain the requirement that an occupational pension scheme established in the UK must be set up under trust. Subsections (1) and (2) of clause 26 provide that where an occupational pension scheme has its main administration in the UK, it can accept funding payments—contributions and transfer payments—only if it is established under trust. Similarly, subsection (3) provides that a scheme must have proper written rules before it can accept funding payments, as demanded by article 9 of the directive. As schemes already have written trust deeds and rules, this is not a new or onerous requirement.

Subsection (4) allows us to make regulations to exempt certain schemes from the requirements—statutory schemes for example. Subsection (5) gives the pensions regulator the power to sanction trustees or managers who accept payments into a scheme that is not trust based or does not have proper written rules.

Clause 27 makes similar provisions for occupational schemes that have members in the UK but where the scheme is established outside the EU. It provides that such a scheme cannot accept contributions unless the scheme is established under trust and there is a trustee in the UK.

New clause 28 permits overseas schemes to appoint someone to act on their behalf in the UK, and for that person to be treated as the trustee under UK pensions legislation. Amendments Nos. 213 and 214 amend clause 62 of the Bill and are directly consequential on these new clauses. Clause 62 provides that an inspector may enter premises that are liable to inspection, in order to investigate whether specified provisions of pensions legislation are being complied with. Premises are liable to inspection if the inspector has reasonable grounds to suspect that members of the scheme are employed there, documents relevant to the administration of the scheme are being kept there, or the administration of the scheme, or work connected with the administration of the scheme, is being carried out there. These amendments are necessary so that inspections may be carried out to investigate potential breaches of the requirements of these new clauses.

The new clauses ensure that the long-established arrangement under which occupational pension schemes are established under trust law is maintained. In doing so, they provide that the legal separation of the pension scheme and the employer is also maintained, and that UK workers continue to have the protection of the Pensions Act and other pensions legislation that provides protection for UK workers.

Mr. George Osborne: I do not wish to detain the House for long. I have a question, and I begin with an observation. It seems to me that many of the new clauses are consequential on the Finance Bill. Why is the Department for Work and Pensions playing catch-up? After all, the Finance Bill has been around for more than a month, during which time we have considered the Bill in Committee. One can only assume that the new pension tax proposals were drawn up in consultation with the DWP. Far be it from me to assume that the Treasury did all this without letting the DWP know or that it merely informed the Department once the process was over. If the proposals were dreamed up with the DWP, I am surprised that they were not built into the legislation as we discussed it in Committee. There we go, that was my comment.

My question, which is straightforward, is one of information, and I do not know the answer. Are there occupational schemes that are not statutory—that is, not prescribed schemes—and are not trusts? I understand the point that the Minister made, that under the process of tax approval it is a condition that a scheme is set up as a trust, but I want to know whether there are any exceptions to that rule that will be caught by the new clause? Is the Department absolutely certain that there will be no unintended consequences, even if it is on a small number of non-trust occupational schemes. I just want to check that the Government have done their homework.

Mr. Webb: I am grateful to the Minister for returning to the point about schemes based outside the member states. That is what new clause 27 deals with. This has a slight "Britannia rules the waves" feel to it in the sense that new clause 27(2), which deals with schemes that have their main administration outside the EU, says that an employer based somewhere in the UK can pay contributions to a scheme outside the UK, say in north America, only if the conditions in subsection (4) are met. One condition in subsection (4) is that there has to be a UK-resident trustee. Say I lived in the UK but my pension scheme was run in north America. Under the provision, my employer could not pay money into my pension scheme unless it had a UK-based trustee. What would happen if my employer did pay some money into my pension scheme? After all, the scheme is based in the US, not in the UK. The pensions regulator will not march down Wall street, bang on the door and say, "You shouldn't have taken that money, you naughty people. Give it back."

2.30 pm

What is this all about? I do not understand what the Government are trying to stop. We no longer have tax-approved status, and surely the pensions regulator has no jurisdiction over a scheme based in north America or elsewhere. We will come to the issue of the EU and reciprocal arrangements later. Does new clause 27 have any force? If employers want to put money into schemes run in north America for their employees, good luck to them. If that does not satisfy the condition in new clause 27(4), that would be tough luck. What would be the consequence of failure to adhere to new clause 27, given that the pensions regulator, who is supposed to enforce such matters, would have no jurisdiction? I hope that the Minister can clarify that point, because I am at a loss to understand it.

Mr. Pond: The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) raised the issue of whether there are occupational pension schemes that are not trusts and therefore whether the new clause would have unintended consequences. I can reassure him that we have done our homework on that point. I am not expecting that inspiration will tell me that any such schemes exist, but if that inspiration hits me later in the day, I will share the information with him.

The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) asked whether new clause 27 would have any force. I should explain that the regulator will have a locus over the UK-resident trustee if a scheme has its main administration outside the UK. That is the purpose of having a trustee based in the UK. In the case of trying to have some sort of enforcement in terms of a scheme based outside the UK, he suggested that the regulator would march down Wall street, but we have not built foreign travel for such purposes into the regulator's budget. However, I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions would be happy to undertake such responsibilities. We expect that the regulator in the countries where the schemes operate will work with the domestic regulator and, therefore, the information will be supplied. The expectation is that the regulator in the other countries would use domestic regulation to ensure that scheme members' interests were properly upheld.

Mr. Webb: That was a fascinating response. The Minister initially said that the UK pensions regulator has locus when there is a trustee in the UK, and indeed that is the condition in subsection (4). I asked what would happen if that condition were not satisfied, there was no trustee in the UK and the firm said, "We don't care what British law says. We are going to put some money in our workers' American pension scheme. Get lost." Is the Minister really saying that the British pensions regulator will have to liaise with pensions regulators in every country in the world that might have the head office of a firm that employs a UK employee? Some such countries may not even have pensions regulators. What if the foreign pension regulator does not agree with the Government on the necessary requirements? I am completely bewildered by the matter. Has any dialogue taken place with regulators in other countries to see whether the Government's proposal is realistic?

Mr. Pond: As the hon. Gentleman will know, the community of pensions regulators throughout the world operates on a comradely and co-operative basis. Given that they have shared interests, in that multinational cross-border arrangements are increasingly common, our expectation is that co-operation will occur. In some circumstances, that may not happen, although the Wall street example is not necessarily a good one. We may need to revisit the issue if that proves to be the case, but we are confident that the provisions will work better than the current arrangements, albeit without being the perfect solution.

If a firm has workers in the UK, they should be covered by UK pensions legislation. If there is no UK-based trustee, it is the employer who is subject to sanctions by the regulator, and that is how sanctions would be applied in the hon. Gentleman's example of a US scheme refusing to set up a trustee in the UK.

I can tell the hon. Member for Tatton that no further inspiration has come to me on whether there are any occupational schemes that are not trust based. As far as the DWP and the Inland Revenue are concerned, we are aware of no such schemes.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 27

NON-EC OCCUPATIONAL PENSION SCHEME TO BE TRUST WITH UK-RESIDENT TRUSTEE

'(1) Subsections (2) and (3) apply to an occupational pension scheme that has its main administration outside the member States.

(2) An employer based in any part of the United Kingdom may cause a contribution to be paid to the scheme in respect of an employee (whether or not employed in the United Kingdom) only if the conditions in subsection (4) are satisfied at the time of payment.

(3) An employer based outside the United Kingdom may cause a contribution to be paid to the scheme in respect of an employee employed in the United Kingdom only if the conditions in subsection (4) are satisfied at the time of payment.

(4) Those conditions are—

(a) that the scheme is established under irrevocable trusts, and

(b) that a trustee of the scheme is resident in the United Kingdom.

(5) Subsection (2) or (3) does not apply to an occupational pension scheme if it is a prescribed scheme or a scheme of a prescribed description.

(6) Section 10 of the Pensions Act 1995 (c. 26) (civil penalties) applies to an employer who causes a contribution to be paid to an occupational pension scheme that has its main administration outside the member States if—

(a) subsection (2) or (3) applies in relation to the payment of the contribution,

(b) the conditions in subsection (4) are not satisfied at the time of payment, and

(c) the employer does not have a reasonable excuse for causing payment to occur at a time when those conditions are not satisfied.

(7) In this section "based"—

(a) in relation to an employer who is a body corporate, means incorporated, and

(b) in relation to any other employer, means resident.'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 28

REPRESENTATIVE OF NON-EC OCCUPATIONAL PENSION SCHEME TO BE TREATED AS TRUSTEE

'(1) In the case of an occupational pension scheme that has its main administration outside the member States, a reference in pensions legislation to the trustees, or a trustee, of the scheme includes a person who is for the time being appointed by the trustees of the scheme to be a representative of the scheme for the purposes of this section.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to a prescribed reference.

(3) In subsection (1) "pensions legislation" means any enactment contained in or made by virtue of—

(a) the Pension Schemes Act 1993 (c. 48),

(b) the Pensions Act 1995 (c. 26),

(c) Parts 1 to 4 of the Welfare Reform and Pensions Act 1999 (c. 30), or

(d) this Act.'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 29

ACTIVITIES OF OCCUPATIONAL PENSION SCHEMES

'(1) If an occupational pension scheme has its main administration in the United Kingdom, the trustees or managers of the scheme must secure that the activities of the scheme are limited to retirement-benefit activities.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to a scheme if it is a prescribed scheme or a scheme of a prescribed description.

(3) Section 10 of the Pensions Act 1995 (c. 26) (civil penalties) applies to a trustee or manager of a scheme to which subsection (1) applies if—

(a) the scheme has activities that are not retirement-benefit activities, and

(b) the trustee or manager has failed to take all reasonable steps to secure that the activities of the scheme are limited to retirement-benefit activities.

(4) In this section "retirement-benefit activities" means—

(a) operations related to retirement benefits, and

(b) activities arising from operations related to retirement benefits.

(5) In subsection (4) "retirement benefits" means—

(a) benefits paid by reference to reaching, or expecting to reach, retirement, and

(b) benefits that are supplementary to benefits within paragraph (a) and that are provided on an ancillary basis—

(i) in the form of payments on death, disability or termination of employment, or

(ii) in the form of support payments or services in the case of sickness, poverty or need, or death.'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Pond: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 215.

Mr. Pond: I need not detain the House too long on new clause 29, which is closely related to new clauses 25, 26, 27 and 28, which we have just discussed. It assists in the UK's transposition of European directive 2003/41/EC. This clause will implement article 7 of the directive.

The article requires the UK to limit occupational pension schemes to carrying out activities that relate either to retirement benefits, or activities that arise from that activity.

Currently, pension schemes are restricted from carrying out activities that are unrelated to pensions through requirements that arise as part of the Inland Revenue's tax approval process. Through this new clause, we largely achieve the same result. It is, however, necessary for the purposes of transposing the directive to place this requirement in pensions legislation separately from the tax approval process.

Amendment No. 215 is a consequential amendment linked to new clauses 25 to 29. It will amend clause 62 of the Bill, to ensure that the pensions regulator can inspect premises to investigate a potential breach of this clause.

Mr. George Osborne: Like the other new clauses we have discussed, new clause 29 appears to be consequential on the proposals in the Finance Bill. Subsection (2) provides an exemption for "a prescribed scheme or a scheme of a prescribed description."

I wonder whether the Minister could tell us what sort of schemes are prescribed and do not offer "retirement-benefit activities", and why subsection (2) has been included. As, presumably, we are introducing the new clause so that we comply with European legislation, would not a prescribed scheme that did not offer retirement-benefit activities be illegal under European law? In that case, what is the point of subsection (2)?

Mr. Pond: If the hon. Gentleman will bear with me on that point, I shall get back to him once I have received inspiration about the answer to his question.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 30

PAYMENT OF SURPLUS TO EMPLOYER

For section 37 of the Pensions Act 1995 (payment of surplus to employer) substitute—

"37 Payment of surplus to employer

(1) This section applies to a trust scheme if—

(a) apart from this section power is conferred on the employer or any other person to make payments to the employer out of funds held for the purposes of the scheme, and

(b) the scheme is not being wound up.

(2) Where the power referred to in subsection (1)(a) is conferred by the scheme on a person other than the trustees—

(a) it cannot be exercised by that person but may be instead be exercised by the trustees, and

(b) any restriction imposed by the scheme on the exercise of the power shall, so far as capable of doing so, apply to its exercise by the trustees.

(3) The power referred to in subsection (1)(a) may only be exercised if—

(a) the trustees have obtained a written valuation of the scheme's assets and liabilities prepared and signed by a prescribed person;

(b) there is a certificate in force—

(i) stating that in the opinion of that person the prescribed requirements are met as at the date by reference to which the assets are valued and the liabilities are calculated, and

(ii) specifying what in the opinion of that person is the maximum amount of payment that may be made to the employer;

(c) the payment does not exceed the maximum amount specified in the certificate;

(d) the trustees are be satisfied that it is in the interests of the members that the power is exercised in the manner proposed;

(e) where the power is conferred by the scheme on the employer, the employer has asked for the power to be exercised, or consented to its being exercised, in the manner proposed,

(f) there is no freezing order in order in force in relation to the scheme under section 20 of the Pensions Act 2004, and

(g) notice of the proposal to exercise the power has been given, in accordance with prescribed requirements, to the members of the scheme.

(4) Provision may be made by regulations as to—

(a) the requirements (which may be alternative requirements) that must be met, in relation to any proposed payment to the employer out of funds held for the purposes of a scheme, with respect to the value of the scheme's assets and the amount of its liabilities;

(b) the assets and liabilities to be taken into account for that purpose and the manner in which their value or amount is to be determined, calculated and verified;

(c) the maximum amount of the payment that may be made to the employer, having regard to the value of the scheme's assets and the amount of its liabilities;

(d) the giving of a certificate as to the matters mentioned in paragraphs (a) and (c); and

(e) the period for which such a certificate is to be in force.

(5) The trustees must also comply with any other prescribed requirements in connection with the making of a payment under this section.

(6) If the trustees—

(a) purport to exercise the power referred to in subsection (1)(a) without complying with the requirements of this section, or

(b) fail to comply with any requirement of regulations under subsection (5), section 10 applies to any of them who has failed to take all reasonable steps to secure compliance.

(7) If a person other than the trustees purports to exercise the power referred to in subsection (1)(a), section 10 applies to him.

(8) Regulations may provide that in prescribed circumstances this section does not apply, or applies with prescribed modifications, to schemes of a prescribed description.".'.— [Malcolm Wicks.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Malcolm Wicks: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

Government new clause 31—Payments of surplus to employer: transitional power to amend scheme.

Government amendments Nos. 175 to 180.

Malcolm Wicks: The new clauses provide new rules governing occupational pension schemes making payments to an employer from an actuarial surplus in an ongoing scheme.

[Malcolm Wicks]

Section 37 of the Pensions Act 1995 allows pension scheme trustees to make a payment to an employer only where the Inland Revenue has approved the payment as part of a strategy to reduce an excessive actuarial surplus. The Inland Revenue currently requires schemes to take steps to reduce such surpluses. Section 37 also imposes further conditions, for example, by extending limited price indexation to all the rights of members and by requirements on informing members.

The tax simplification measures in the Finance Bill remove the requirement to reduce an excessive surplus, which in turn requires a consequential amendment to section 37 of the Pensions Act. However, simply removing the reference to tax law in the Pensions Act would leave the matter of making payments to the employer entirely dependent on the rules of individual schemes. We do not believe that would provide an adequate safeguard against the inappropriate removal of funds from pension schemes, so we propose to replace section 37 with a provision that allows us to ensure that such payments are not made unless a scheme is sufficiently well funded, to the extent that it can more than cover the accrued rights of a scheme.

New clause 30 provides for the making of regulations, which will be used to ensure that payments to an employer may not be made from a defined benefit scheme unless it is funded to a level sufficient to purchase annuities and deferred annuities securing the rights of all members and beneficiaries. That is known as the full buy-out level. The scheme actuary will be required to carry out a valuation and provide a certificate confirming that those conditions have been met before a payment can be made. Trustees must also be satisfied that such a payment would be in the interests of members.

We believe that the higher threshold for the withdrawal of surplus funds serves members' interests better than the present requirement to enhance members' benefits by the application of limited price indexation to all scheme benefits before a payment to the employer can be made, so that requirement is dropped. However, existing statutory or scheme indexation will of course be reflected in the valuation of the scheme's liabilities carried out by the actuary.

The new clause also allows for rules to be made governing payments to employers from defined contribution schemes. Regulations will define the more limited number of occasions when refunds of an excess of assets over liabilities may take place in defined contribution schemes, such as where, for example, a member of an earmarked scheme takes a refund of his contributions, leaving the employer's contributions as a surplus.

The process for making a payment of surplus will be simplified, but members will have to be notified of the intention to make a payment and given time to make representations on the matter to the regulator, who has powers to intervene if the payment appears to be irregular. The Finance Bill provides that any such payments will continue to be taxed at 35 per cent.

At present, Revenue requirements for tax approval generally require scheme rules to prohibit payments to employers except in accordance with Revenue rules and with Revenue approval. Those scheme rules would be ambiguous given the removal of the Revenue requirements, so new clause 31 contains transitional provisions to allow trustees to amend their scheme rules consequential to the relaxation of Inland Revenue and current section 37 requirements. Where schemes may currently make payments of surplus to the employer, trustees may choose to continue to do so; but if they do not so amend scheme rules within five years of the commencement of the provisions, they will be unable to make such payments.

Amendments Nos. 175 to 180 are consequential to the replacement of the existing section 37 and to the requirements under schedule 22 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988. They also remove the requirement for limited price indexation to be applied to all pensions before an excess of assets over liabilities can be paid to an employer where a scheme is winding up. That is to ensure that the valuation of assets and liabilities in a scheme that is winding up is in line with the new section 37 requirements for ongoing schemes.

Mr. Webb: I apologise to the Minister for having missed the beginning of his speech. It would inform our discussion if he could clarify how it would ever be in the interests of scheme members that money was taken out of their pension fund and handed back to their employer. How could that ever satisfy the interests of members?

Malcolm Wicks: It is in the interests of members that their full pension rights should be protected, so that in due course their pensions are paid. It would, however, be absurd to argue that a pension scheme should have substantially more than it requires for that purpose. As the hon. Gentleman missed my introductory remarks, he may not realise that we are saying that in the new regime money could be paid back to an employer only when the actuary has substantiated—by signing a certificate and so on—that there is a full buy-out fund in place should that become necessary. Currently, it may seem unlikely that we could return to circumstances where there is more than enough money to meet pension rights, but after several tests money could, in those circumstances, be returned to the employer, bearing in mind that the employer is normally—although not always—the major funder of the company pension scheme.

I believe that our proposals strike a fair balance between the legitimate interests of both members and sponsoring employers. Restrictive rules on building up and retaining surplus in pension funds since the 1980s are frequently cited as having played a role in contributing to the funding problems of the last few years. At the same time, there are naturally also concerns that employers should not be able to cream off surplus funds where that could affect the fundamental well-being of the scheme—the point that we have just discussed. The complementary changes in tax and pensions law requirements are aimed at solving both those problems. In future, there will no longer be a restriction on employers who wish and are able to fund their scheme generously, but at the same time they will be able to remove funding only above a level that should not threaten the health of the scheme.

Mr. George Osborne: The new clauses bring in significant changes to the rules governing the disposal of scheme surpluses. I am beginning to sound like a cracked record, but I point out again that it is extraordinary that we have not been accorded a proper process to scrutinise something that will affect every member of an occupational scheme and many employers.

As the Minister acknowledged, the present problem is usually one of deficit rather than of surplus, but it is important to get the rules right and to prepare for a future, perhaps under a Conservative Government, when the stock market recovers and schemes are in surplus. I thus have a direct interest in ensuring that the rules are right.

One of the problems we face is that much of the detail is left to as yet unpublished and unseen regulations. Indeed, we have only just seen the new clause. The regulations will include matters such as the valuation of the assets and liabilities of schemes, which assets and liabilities are to be taken into account, the maximum amount that can be paid, who should carry out the valuation and who should inform the Inland Revenue and the pensions regulator—a very significant detail.

My favourite sentence in the explanatory notes, which I found when I was reading them last night, is:

"The Government will, as customary, consult extensively on these draft regulations before laying them before Parliament."

Very little consultation on any of those proposals is taking place. The Bill is being rushed through on Report in the House of Commons, where a couple of Members are taking part, both of whom only saw these new clauses on Friday. They had not received representations from outside bodies because they have had no chance to examine or comment on such things in detail, and the whole thing goes through on the nod. Indeed, as we heard during the debate on the previous clause, the Minister did not really know what he was putting through Parliament. Perhaps he will say something about what he imagines will be in the regulations.

Certainly, when I asked the National Association of Pension Funds what it thought of the new clause—I stress that it said that it had not had time to reach a formulated viewpoint—its initial observations were:

"Much of the detail is to be prescribed so it is difficult to comment. From the clause as it stands it is difficult to be sure what level the funding needs to be in order for a surplus payment to kick in. If the main aim is to protect the PPF then one would assume that the funding level would be to full buy-out basis. If that is the case, how useful is this clause? You would also need to get clarification of who owns the surplus and ensure that there are correct powers to pay the money back out of the fund."

The Minister said—this is clear in the explanatory notes—that in the great majority of cases, the new rules will be more restrictive than the existing Inland Revenue requirement that those provisions supersede. What assessment has the Minister made of the resulting impact on the scheme and the ability to move surpluses to employers? What consultations has he had with the industry? Will there be any unintended consequences? In Committee, we discussed the unintended consequences of the minimum funding requirement's impact on gilts, for example. Will any unintended consequence be involved in requiring schemes to hold on to surpluses that they would otherwise have disposed of?

May I ask the Minister—perhaps this is the wrong place in our proceedings on the Bill, but I do not think that it is—how these proposals interact with the European pensions directive's requirements on surpluses? I am sure that the Minister will be aware that there is enormous concern in the pensions industry that the EU directive will force company pension schemes to hold sufficient assets so that, at all times, they are able to pay out all the benefits promised to members, whereas the UK rules tend to be more flexible, allowing schemes to take a longer-term view of promised benefits, without being held to the day-to-day movements of the stock market, for example. As a result, UK schemes have not had to hold as many assets as their European counterparts. Of course, that has not only downsides when schemes turn out to be underfunded, but upsides in allowing schemes to pay more generous benefits and encouraging more companies to set up schemes.

The industry says that complying with the EU directive could cost up to £300 billion—a huge sum—and I have no reason to doubt its figures. Interestingly, at the end of last year the chief executive of the NAPF, Christine Farnish, said:

"The UK has to implement this directive. Continuing to provide a defined benefit pension is a hugely costly undertaking for supervising employer. We know a number of firms have closed their schemes to new members but our concern is that greater numbers will also close to future accruals because of these extra costs. It is unquantifiable, and finance directors do not like having that sort of risk on their balance sheets. It is very dangerous and very costly to UK schemes, and because the rules cannot be scheme-specific, will no doubt lead to endless battles in the court. It is ridiculous; it is not the real world."

That is what the chief executive of one of the most respected pensions organisations has said.

I mention the EU pensions directive because these proposals relate to scheme funding and the interaction with the disposal of surpluses. Are these new clauses compliant with that directive, or will the Government have to return with further new clauses, perhaps in the other place? How will the Government deal with the industry's concerns on this important point?

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East) (Lab/Co-op): However much I welcome the announcements on retrospective matters, I do not want that welcome to blunt my critical faculties in relation to these new clauses. To vest in a regulator the right to say whether a surplus can be considered in terms of the employer's benefit is a bridge too far.

I have considered regulators across a range of industries and I have not yet found one from a trade union background. They all seem to come from that group of people who have been involved in the world of the City for many years. I am drawn again to the wisdom of Woody Guthrie, the American folk singer. [Interruption.] Yes, he guides me on so many things.

John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland) (Lab): Here we go.

Mr. Purchase: No, no—my hon. Friend will be interested in this. On occasion, Woody Guthrie said:

[Mr. Purchase]

"I've been robbed more times by a man with a fountain pen than I ever have been by a man with a six-gun."

I have noticed that the Minister is holding a pen—it may not be a fountain pen—and the complexities of what he was explaining, which I tried desperately hard to follow, leave me a little apprehensive. Again, the conspiracy theory may be coming to the forefront, but who will the regulator be, who will he listen to and what note will he take of the workers' interests? How much will he or she be in hock to his or her colleagues in the City, who, frankly have only one interest in life: to ensure that they and their colleagues benefit to the greatest extent that they possibly can from our hard-earned wages?

We have gone through a recent period in history when, in another way, companies have taken very long pension holidays because the funds have been so much in surplus that it seemed pointless adding any more money to them. Yet we now find, of course, in the changed circumstances of a much reduced stock market valuation of pension funds, that that money could have been usefully put towards ensuring that workers actually got their pensions.

I welcome the announcements about retrospective pension failures because it is natural justice that something should be done, but are we not putting ourselves in the very same position again? Is it not likely that in the not-too-distant future—perhaps just 10 years down the line—a similar set of circumstances will occur where a surplus is paid back to an employer?

I make the point, as an aside, that we are talking about deferred wages. However they might be defined legally, the money is part of people's wages. It is theirs; it is not for someone to take it away from them again, which is what has been happening and to which I imagine these new clauses are designed to put an end. However, by any name we are talking about the employer taking out the money that has been put in by them exclusively, using whatever mechanism—the very dodgy one of a regulator worries me more than enough—when the money involved should be paid to the workers in any event but is taken back from them to pay a bonus, which is all I can call it, to an employer who can convince the regulator, or someone else, that the fund is so much in surplus that it is pointless not to take out that money. I think that I have a legitimate reason to worry.

The Minister will know that probably upwards of 500 people in Wolverhampton will, I hope, benefit from the retrospective provisions. What I do not want to happen is that whoever is standing here in 10, 15 or 20 years' time has to say exactly the same thing because the money that should rightfully be in workers' pockets, or at least in a very safe fund, has found its way back to the employer's pockets at the expense of the workers, who then find themselves with no pension. I hope that the Minister will give us a very convincing reply about why I should have any confidence in a regulator. However, if there must be a regulator, could that regulator have a duty to consult the workers' representatives before deciding to pay back any surplus?

Mr. Webb: I was asked by one of the broadcasters about today's deliberations, and I said that this debate was very much one for anoraks. However, this new clause touches on meaty issues relating to pensions, to our concerns about our constituents' pension rights and to the circumstances in which money can be taken out of pension funds. These are practical and important issues. I hope that "Today in Parliament" is listening.

I want to ask the Government to withdraw the new clause because there is a mistake in it. I am sure that the House has read all the texts carefully, but I have a confession to make. I have only just read the fine print of new clause 30 which will replace section 37 of the Pensions Act 1995, and I refer the Minister to proposed new subsection (3)(d). It says that "the trustees are be satisfied that it is in the interests of the members".

The phrase "trustees are be satisfied" is not grammatical.

I will come to the point about pension surpluses in a minute, but I assume that the fact that the grammar is wrong partly reflects the speed with which the new clauses and amendments were tabled. I assume that the Government do not want an ungrammatical sentence to become part of the law of the land, but I do not know what "trustees are be satisfied" means.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): "Are be" sounds like west country to me.

Mr. Webb: Yes, the phrase does have a west country ring to it, but I hope that the Minister will withdraw the new clause and table it again in another place with the grammatical error corrected.

There are other reasons why we should have substantive reservations about the new clause. Let me be sure that I understand what is going on. The Finance Bill and the pension simplification are getting rid of the 105 per cent. rule, and that must be a good thing. I hope that the Minister will stop me if I am wrong, but I understand that that rule—which said that a scheme that gets to 105 per cent. funding is so badly over-funded that we must take money out of it—is going. If I am right, that is a good and welcome change.

Whereas one of the ways in which a surplus could be disposed of hitherto was by providing enhanced benefits, the new clause says that there is no longer a requirement for that to be the first thing that a scheme does. The enhanced benefits that no longer have to be provided are indexation benefits—other than those already in the scheme rules—that relate to pre-1997 service. Post-1997 service must be indexed. Given that we are only in 2004, if someone coming up to pension age has worked in a company all their working life, three quarters or more of their service could be pre-1997 and could have no indexation rights attached to it at all. Surely if there is a surplus in the fund, the first call on that surplus should be to do something about the non-indexation of rights earned pre-1997. Money should not go out of the fund instead. If we are interested in avoiding pensioner poverty, in building up occupational pensions and in increasing funded pension rights, the first call should be pre-1997 indexation. It is surely wrong that the new clause allows an employer to request that money be taken out of the fund to the benefit of the employer when scheme members will receive pensions that will, to all intents and purposes, be frozen because of very limited price indexation. That worries me greatly.

The Government's goal is to raise from 40 per cent. to 60 per cent. the proportion of income in retirement that comes from funded pension schemes. Although the new clause might be an own goal, the Government can further their objectives by saying that before so-called surplus money can be taken out of a pension fund, it must be spent on the bare minimum of indexation of pre-1997 entitlements. That surely should have the first call. Although I welcome the abolition of the 105 per cent. rule—I never understood why we had to have it in the first place—I am unhappy about the suggestion that firms can simply take the money.

The Minister said that there would be a certification process and that the change would be in members' interests. However, I do not understand how it can ever be in members' interests for money to be taken out of a fund when their pre-1997 rights have not been indexed. When I intervened on the Minister, he said that the scheme has to provide buy-out rights. In other words, before a surplus comes out of a fund, the scheme must prove that it has enough money to meet the buy-out equivalent rights of some of the scheme members. However, those buy-outs presumably do not cover indexation for pre-1997, so there is no guarantee that the interests of the scheme's members will be looked after in respect of their pre-1997 rights, which, as I said, could be the majority of the accrued rights.

Although there must be certification that a change must be in the interests of the members, the test does not appear to be very strong. Therefore, the Minister should revisit the new clause not only because the grammar is wrong, but because it does not boost occupational pensions. It potentially undermines them.

The past few years have shown us that the valuation of funds is hugely volatile and that a certification at a point in time that there is enough money in the fund may prove to be wrong some years down the track. Given that stock markets can fall by half in three years, a certificate on a particular day that the valuation is enough to meet future liabilities is far from the same as saying that that will always be the case. One cannot certify that a scheme will always have enough money to meet the liabilities. One can only say at a point in time that it is one's best guess that there is enough money. That is not sufficient protection for scheme members.

I am simply not convinced that the new clause will protect the best interests of scheme members. When there is surplus, the requirement first to provide for indexation has been explicitly abolished, so I do not think that the interests of members will be served. This is a substantive issue and I am worried. I hope that the Minister can reassure us that scheme members' interests really will be served by the change.

Mr. Miller: Thank you for calling me, Madam Deputy Speaker. You missed an interesting exchange with my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase), who quoted Woody Guthrie. I thought that he was about to burst into song, but he made pertinent points about the circumstances in which surpluses arise. You will be aware that, in a previous life, I used to negotiate with large companies about the distribution of their surpluses for the benefit of fund members.

I wish to make two points. First, I welcome the fact that the proposal will be subject to consultation. During the consultation, a couple of important points need to be examined. The courts in this country have long accepted that, when there is a massive surplus, employers are entitled to seek the recovery of some of that on the grounds that they took risks in bad times and are therefore entitled to some of the money back in good times.

If that principle remains—we should examine that point with care—a separate set of circumstances applies when a takeover takes place. The courts frequently fail pension funds if, in a takeover, an incoming employer takes none of the risks but seeks to take a significant part of the gains. Many of the trade unions that now form Amicus used that argument against Lord Weinstock when GEC took over Plessey, and it became an important piece of case law. However, now that the Minister is developing the regulations, he has the opportunity to protect the members of funds that may be in surplus by preventing an incoming employer from distributing those funds. I firmly believe that those funds should be distributed only in the interests of existing fund members.

Secondly, prior to the granting of certificate and any attempt to recover surpluses, it is incumbent on good employers to seek to maximise the benefits of the scheme up to the Inland Revenue maximums. I hope that both those points are taken on board in the consultation and the development of the regulations.

Paul Holmes (Chesterfield) (LD): I wish to pick up a point made in an intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb), which was later elaborated by the hon. Members for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) and for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller). When I return to my constituency on Friday I will talk to people previously employed by two or three firms in Chesterfield who have lost their pensions, and I hope that the Minister can help me to answer questions about the removal of excess money in a pension scheme, which they have been asking for the past three years.

Chesterfield Cylinders was one of the six firms that were part of United Engineering Forgings, which lost much of its pension fund in 2001—an issue that I have raised both in letters to the Minister and in the Chamber. In the intervening period, members of the pension fund have raised something that I have been unable to explain fully, although the contribution of the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston will help me to do so in future.

In the past, employers took pension holidays, as legislation required them to do, because the pension fund was doing extremely well and had "excessive surpluses". In the bad times, however, they were not required to make up all the difference. From next year, with the establishment of the pension protection fund and so on, some of those problems will not arise, but I still struggle with the concept, discussed by other hon. Members, of having an excessive amount of money in a pension fund. If it is doing well, perhaps because the stock market is strong, why is it not worth keeping that surplus as a hedge against future years when the stock market does less well? In Committee we discussed the American protection fund, which did extremely well for 30 years. Pension funds overall did very well, and there was no significant challenge to the protection fund. Recently, however, it has experienced a few bad years. Why cannot excesses in pension funds from earlier years, when the stock market and companies did extremely well, be banked and hedged against future bad years?

The members of the work force at Chesterfield Cylinders or, more recently, at Coalite near Chesterfield, cannot understand why, given that their employers took pension holidays in the past, they have been told that there is no money to meet their deferred wages or investment in their future pension. They have lost out, but only a few years ago the surplus money was there.

Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South) (Lab): I, too, welcome the abolition of the 105 per cent. rule, which is detrimental to many companies and schemes. I speak from personal experience, as Hoover in Cambuslang, which also had factories in Merthyr and Perivale, was the subject of a takeover. It was bought by Chicago Pacific because it had a surplus of more than £270 million in its pension scheme. There is a danger that the new clause would allow other employers a similar opportunity. If we took a snapshot of the stock market at any time we might find that there was a surplus in funds, but that surplus might not exist six months or a year later.

I accept the point about index linking and percentages before 1997, but I do not accept that surpluses in pension schemes are a problem. I only wish that there had been such surpluses in the past few years, as we would not need the pension protection fund that we are establishing. Workers always believed that trustees were appointed to look after the best interests of scheme members and that the scheme was separate from their employer's finances so it would always be protected. However, over the past few years that has proved not to be the case. While I welcome the consultation and the abolition of the 105 per cent. rule, I would prefer us to see a healthy surplus in a pension scheme than find ourselves in the position of having to fund a scheme such as the PPF, even though that is a welcome innovation. I would prefer schemes to be properly funded, and the best way to encourage good occupational pension schemes is to ensure that the legislation is correct. We have an opportunity in the Bill to look carefully at what we are doing, so that, hopefully, we can encourage employers and employees to make a contribution to saving for the future.

Malcolm Wicks: Members have made a useful scrutiny of the proposals, enlivened by a question about the use of English and reference to the great Woody Guthrie, an inspiration to many of us, including Mr. Dylan, the great US poet. We will take a number of issues on board in the consultation, including matters raised in the final few speeches on the new clause. My hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) made an important point on which we shall reflect when developing our consultation plans.

John Robertson: Does my hon. Friend not accept that the Government do not have to take on board points made in the consultation? Something more than consultation is needed.

Malcolm Wicks: Indeed. I hope to cover that later.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) and I are glad to focus on the weighty matter of pensions, given the sad circumstances in which the team that we both passionately support finds itself. We have no reason to prevent employers from seeking a refund from a scheme that is genuinely overfunded, and we believe that the full buy-out standard provides a safeguard against the inappropriate reduction of scheme funds.

Mr. Webb: Will the Minister give way?

Malcolm Wicks: I am happy to do so in a moment, but first I should like to make progress on an issue raised by several hon. Members. As I set out in my opening remarks, the tax regime does not allow schemes to hold funds 5 per cent. above their requirements, but that will soon change. It is therefore important that we look at circumstances surrounding a possible surplus. I reiterate that this is not about exercising a light touch and allowing trustees to give money back to employers in various circumstances. The requirements for a full buy-out are extremely tough indeed. As I have said, new clause 30 provides for the making of regulations, which will ensure that payments to an employer may not be made from a defined benefit scheme unless it is funded to a level sufficient to purchase annuities and deferred annuities securing the rights of all members and beneficiaries—the "full buy-out" level. That is a very tough level. The full buy-out standard provides a significantly higher margin of error for stock market fluctuations, for example, than other possible methods of valuation do. I went on to make the point that that would have to be certified by the scheme actuary before anything of the kind was possible.

Mr. Webb: On the meaning of "full buy-out", can the Minister confirm that full buy-out does not include pre-1997 indexation?

Malcolm Wicks: No, it does not require that. Notwithstanding the situation where a surplus may go back to the employer, going into pre-1997 indexation may store up serious trouble for the future. It might seem a useful thing to do, but in terms of the costs over the longer term, there may be serious financial implications, probably way above the amount that may be returned to the employer.

One of the things that has not come out in the debate is that we are not talking about a situation or an era in which the employer's contribution or the employer's need to make occupational pension provision is compulsory. We are not in that position. All of us are concerned about companies that have made judgments in recent times to end or down-rate their occupational pension provision. We should be mindful that there is always the danger that some employers will start to walk away if we put more and more obligations on them.

I reiterate what I said earlier: the crucial point—it is almost a simplistic point to make about pension schemes—is that a scheme should be adequate to provide pensions now and in the future. That is its purpose. It is not the purpose of a pension scheme to become a reserve that is well above what might be required. In the Bill we are putting new obligations on pension schemes, not least the obligations relating to the regulator and the pension protection fund. We are telling schemes that they must contribute to a new pension protection fund. Some call that a burden. I call it a proper obligation in the 21st century, but we must be sensible. If a very significant surplus is built up, way above what is necessary for the pension requirement, in the tough circumstances specified it might be reasonable for that to be returned to the employer. I cannot see the difficulty about that.

Mr. Purchase: My hon. Friend used the words "now and in the future". Does he agree that the future has never been accurately defined? The whole of financial history shows that it is almost impossible to predict the future over any great length of time. Does my hon. Friend accept that the new clause, which he presents to us as a way of offering greater protection to employees, still provides the opportunity for money to be taken out of the fund, whereas if it were left in, it would provide greater certainty against an uncertain future?

Malcolm Wicks: I understand where my hon. Friend is coming from and I take his warning that none of us can predict the future in that sense, but surely the sensible approach and the obligation is to ensure that pension schemes have sufficient money for the purpose. We are saying—this is quite a high requirement—that there should be sufficient money for full buy-out, should that prove necessary. For us to say that it is an obligation on schemes, and therefore on employers, to have funds way above that level would put an onus on employers that may put some off from continuing their final salary pension schemes. That is a real danger.

We do not want to so over-egg the pension pudding that it could lead to the demise of decent occupational pension schemes. That is our concern. I say that at a time when many Opposition Members accuse us of putting new burdens on employers. We are happy to defend that. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) is nodding because the Opposition declined to give the Bill a Second Reading. They declined to allow us to introduce a Bill providing for the pension protection fund. That is where they are coming from.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East is coming from a more respectable position. I am arguing that we need to get the balance right between the costs on schemes and therefore on employers, and proper protection for future pensioners.

Mr. Tynan rose—

Mr. Webb rose—

Malcolm Wicks: I shall give way first to my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) and then to my honourable opponent, the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb).

Mr. Tynan: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way. Does he accept that previously, when pension schemes had a surplus, there was considerable regulation on those schemes and on the employer to prevent surpluses being taken out, which would endanger the scheme? It was only because of the level of the stock market at that time that a surplus accrued to schemes. Once the surplus had been taken from the scheme and the stock market fell, there was no surplus and the scheme was in real difficulty. We could be in the same position in the future. In the circumstances, I caution my hon. Friend to look seriously—I understand that it is consultation—at what is being proposed. I still believe that a viable pension scheme could become unviable a year down the line, if the surplus had been taken from the scheme.

Malcolm Wicks: That is a perfectly reasonable argument, but I hope my hon. Friend will take on board what I am saying. We are not proposing that in a light touch way, willy-nilly, surpluses can be given back to employers. We are stipulating a tough requirement and that the actuary must be satisfied. If he is not satisfied, the regulator can move in. Full buy-out is a very high requirement.

Some decent employers are perfectly properly putting significant amounts of shareholders' money into pension schemes to improve their finances. I do not think it is so unreasonable—I am repeating myself—that if they are in surplus, subject to the safeguards that I presented, that should be allowed.

We have had a useful debate and perhaps we should shortly wind it up. There was an interesting exchange about language and the phrase "trustees are be satisfied". We thought for a moment that the hon. Member for Northavon used to be the professor of English literature at Bath university. Someone, but I had better not say who it was in case he is accused of regionalism, thought that that was how people spoke in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. I was outraged by the very suggestion. The phrase is not an example of English usage in that part of the country, but rather more mundanely, an error. I wonder, Madam Deputy Speaker, whether it may be treated as an evident printing error, rather than something that requires amendment. I hope that might be possible.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I should say that the Chair is prepared to treat the superfluous word "be" in section 37(3)(d) of the inserted text as an obvious printing error, which will be corrected.

Malcolm Wicks: I am very grateful. That will save all of us time.

I ask the House to support the new clause. I was touched by the reminder of Woody Guthrie. As I recall, he was responsible for that great patriotic song—patriotic in the proper sense—"This Land is Your Land". The purpose of the Bill is to ensure that pensions belong to people—"this pension is our pension". It is very much what we are about. On that lyrical note, I hope that the House are be satisfied with the amendments.

New Clause 31

PAYMENTS OF SURPLUS TO EMPLOYER: TRANSITIONAL POWER TO AMEND SCHEME

'(1) This section applies to a scheme which immediately before the commencement of section (Payment of surplus to employer) was one to which section 37 of the Pensions Act 1995 applied (see subsection (1) of that section, as it then had effect).

(2) No payment to the employer may be made out of funds held for the purposes of the scheme except by virtue of a resolution of the trustees under this section.

This applies even if the payment is one proposed to be made in fulfilment of an agreement or arrangement entered into before the commencement of this section.

(3) Where the scheme was so expressed as (apart from section 37, as it then applied) to confer power to make payments to the employer out of funds held for the purposes of the scheme otherwise than in pursuance of proposals approved under paragraph 6(1) of Schedule 22 to the Income and Corporation Tax Act 1988, the trustees may resolve that the power—

(a) shall become exercisable according to its terms, or

(b) shall become so exercisable, but only in such circumstances and subject to such conditions as may be specified in the resolution.

(4) Where the scheme was so expressed as to confer power to make payments to the employer out of funds held for the purposes of the scheme only in pursuance of proposals approved under paragraph 6(1) of Schedule 22 to the Income and Corporation Tax Act 1988, the trustees may resolve that the power shall instead be exercisable in such circumstances and subject to such conditions as may be specified in the resolution.

(5) In either case the trustees must be satisfied that it is in the interests of the members of the scheme that the power is exercised in the manner proposed.

(6) The power conferred by subsection (3) or (4)—

(a) may not be exercised unless notice of the proposal to exercise it has been given, in accordance with prescribed requirements, to the employer and to the members of the scheme,

(b) may only be exercised once, and

(c) ceases to be exercisable five years after the commencement of this section.

(7) The exercise of any power to make payments to the employer by virtue of a resolution under this section is subject to section 37 of the Pensions Act 1995 as substituted by section (Payment of surplus to employer).'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 18

POWER TO MAKE REGULATIONS GOVERNING INVESTMENT BY TRUSTEES OF OCCUPATIONAL PENSION SCHEMES

'(1) Section 36 of the Pensions Act 1995 (c.26) (choosing investments) is amended as follows.

(2) For subsection (1) substitute—

"(1) The trustees of a trust scheme must exercise their powers of investment in accordance with regulations and in accordance with subsections (3) and (4), and any fund manager to whom any discretion has been delegated under section 34 must exercise the discretion in accordance with regulations.

(1A) Regulations under subsection (1) may, in particular—

(a) specify criteria to be applied in choosing investments, and

(b) require diversification of investments."

(3) Omit subsection (2).

(4) In subsection (3) for "the matters mentioned in subsection (2) and" substitute "the requirements of regulations under subsection (1), so far as relating to the suitability of investments, and to".

(5) For subsection (8) substitute—

"(8) If the trustees of a trust scheme—

(a) fail to comply with regulations under subsection (1), or

(b) do not obtain and consider advice in accordance with this section, section 10 applies to any trustee who has failed to take all reasonable steps to secure compliance."

(6) After subsection (8) insert—

"(9) Regulations may exclude the application of any of the preceding provisions of this section to any scheme which is of a prescribed description.".'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.45 pm

Mr. Pond: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

Government new clause 19—Borrowing by trustees of occupational pension schemes.

Government amendments Nos. 166, 167 and 173.

Mr. Pond: New clauses 18 and 19 insert new powers into the Pensions Act 1995 to fulfil our obligations to implement the provisions of the EU occupational pensions directive on pension scheme investments and borrowing. Most of the pensions directive either already exists in UK law or is being incorporated through our own domestic agenda for pensions reform. However, to make transparent our compliance with the directive in respect of how schemes may invest, we intend to make regulations making explicit, in line with article 18 of the directive, the requirement that trustees invest in accordance with the "prudent person approach". On this side of the House, we know all about prudence.

New clause 18 amends section 36 of the Pensions Act 1995 to allow regulations to require trustees or fund managers to consider the additional requirements when making investment decisions. In broad terms, the requirements will include the need for investments not to affect adversely the overall quality of the investment portfolio, for them to be made predominately on regulated markets and for any investment in derivatives to be part of a strategy of risk reduction or efficient portfolio management.

In addition, new clause 19 allows for the making of regulations providing that schemes may borrow money only on a temporary basis for liquidity purposes and prohibiting them from guaranteeing loans. The provisions are not a Trojan horse designed to impose major restrictions on trustees' ability to manage their scheme's investments. Our policy intention is to disturb as little as possible the ways in which schemes may currently invest. By placing the detailed requirements in secondary, rather than primary, legislation, we will be able to consult extensively on the best way of incorporating the directive's requirements without placing undue restrictions on pension schemes and to ensure that the provisions in pensions law are consistent and coherent with the analogous rules for other financial service products. We shall therefore consult further on the details and we plan, as is customary, to consult on the draft regulations.

Amendments Nos. 166, 167 and 173 are consequential amendments to the Pensions Act 1995 required by the insertion of the new powers. Amendment No. 167 is a further consequential amendment that removes the reference to section 3 of the Pensions Act from section 36 of that Act.

Mr. George Osborne: Again, significant changes are being brought in at short notice with little consultation. The new clause introduces rules that affect the way in which pension schemes can invest and borrow. Investment is one of the most important activities that pension schemes undertake. Laughably, the Government say in their explanatory notes that they will consult on this measure extensively, "as is customary". We are getting used to the customary consultation of the Government. This is no way to make good law.

The Government think that they need to take on these regulatory powers to ensure compliance with the EU directive. The Minister for Pensions did not answer my points about the directive in the previous debate because he was so busy dealing with interventions from his colleagues, but we will discuss the directive further in the next group of new clauses.

The purpose of new clause 18 is to write into UK law the "prudent person principle", as the Under-Secretary puts it. He talks about prudence. When the tectonic plates start shifting, it is incredible how junior Ministers get their ducks in a row and start to sniff the wind—[Interruption]—to mix my metaphors, as the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) correctly points out.

Is the new clause strictly necessary? The Government need to justify it more than they have done. The English common law—as well as the Scottish common law—already imposes a duty on trustees to act with prudence when making investments. The Government thought that that, in effect, required trustees to act within the terms of the directive, so the Government were satisfied with the status quo. However, they have decided that to ensure compliance with the terms of directive and make that transparent, they will incorporate explicitly the requirements of the directive into domestic legislation.

In other words, the Government think that the status quo is adequate but want to make absolutely, doubly sure, so they will regulate, legislate and gold-plate some more. They will write into UK law some specific considerations—not that we have seen the regulations, which would be far too much to ask. They have indicated that the regulations will ensure that "assets are invested in a manner to ensure the security, quality, liquidity and profitability of the portfolio as a whole."

There will also be a requirement that assets be invested predominantly in regulated markets and the explanatory notes contain a list of others.

There will be a significant set of rules for pension schemes that will prescribe in legislation—in a way that is not prescribed at present—exactly how schemes invest. We have not seen the regulations; as I say, the Government think that they may not be necessary because the common law principle probably covers the matter. Despite that, they are introducing these new regulations to ensure compliance with an EU directive with which the Government think we comply anyway. It seems to be a waste of our legislative time.

Mr. Webb: There is a distinction between the way in which UK law has hitherto dealt with these matters and the way in which the EU directive requirement will require us to deal with them in the future. The UK law adopts a principled approach, asking what a prudent person would have done, whereas the EU directive is specific and prescriptive and has a list of things that one can and cannot do. I should have thought that the way in which UK law does these things was better because of the general principle underlying the legislation.

Critically, one does not need to be able to guess in advance what the future shape of financial markets and instruments might be. To give an example, we have not seen the regulations, but the explanatory notes give us a hint as to what they might be. The notes contain a reference to "investments in derivatives." Given that derivatives are themselves a relatively modern invention—I use the term loosely—in the future, there will be new financial instruments. Under UK law, we would not have to worry about that because of the prudent person principle. We do not have to pass a new regulation every time there is a new financial instrument to say whether people may or may not invest in that instrument within the scope of a pension fund. However, if we are governed by the EU directive, the Government think that, to be on the safe side, we had better produce regulations that list explicitly what the directive says that we may or may not do.

Presumably—I hope that the Minister can confirm this—the next time the financial whizz kids invent a new financial product, we will need a new regulation and the Government will have to decide for each new financial instrument whether it is the sort of thing that pension funds may invest in. Governments, by their very nature, are not up to speed on the latest financial instruments, so there would then be a lag and any pension fund could say in its defence that it was clear that it was allowed to invest in the new financial instrument because there had not been a regulation on it, and it was not therefore listed as something that pensions could not invest in. There would no longer be general principle at work, but a list of prescribed things that a fund could or could not do.

That seems an inferior way of regulating pensions and I wonder whether the Minister, on the ground that no one is listening, could offer his personal observations on whether the traditional UK law approach—the general principle of prudence—is better than the EU-driven approach in which everything has to be spelled out and specified, with regulations constantly updated to keep pace with change. Does he share my view that the good old UK way was better?

Mr. Tynan: I want to share with the House one of my experiences as a trustee of the pension fund of the Amalgamated Engineering and Electrical Union workers' scheme. I understand that the reason for the new clause is to give more protection to ensure that investments are sound and that a scheme is viable in the long term. When I was a trustee of that scheme, we had a rule—which seemed strange to me, coming from a trade union background—that said that 80 per cent. of the investments had to be in gilts and that 20 per cent. could be in equities. I know that that does not come under the new clause, but it would be interesting to hear the Minister's view on whether we should limit risk by saying that investments in pension schemes should be based partly on gilts, not just on equities, so that there is a mixture to give some protection. That would create an interesting scenario in terms of how fund managers would invest in pension schemes to protect the rights of the workers and employees for whom the scheme was there.

Mr. Pond: I shall deal first with the comments of the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne), who suggested that the new clause arrived late in the day. He will understand that we are seeking through it to try to ensure that we are fully compliant with the European directive and, given that the definitive text of the directive was not available to us until last September and that we as a Government are committed to the process of consultation, we inevitably needed time to bring the proposals forward.

The hon. Gentleman is right in one of his contentions: to a large extent, the provision makes little difference to how we operate the regulation of pensions in the UK or the investment decisions that are a matter for trustees within certain bounds, because much of what is in the directive already reflects common practice in the UK. However, we want to ensure that trustees act in a way that is appropriately described as "prudent", although most trustees operate very prudently as matters stand.

That point was also made by the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb), who suggested that the approach is not sufficiently flexible and that there is a real distinction between the UK approach and that in the directive. If he looks carefully at the directive, he will see that there is much less of a distinction than he perhaps implied. We are seeking to set the boundaries within which trustees may make their decisions, but considerable flexibility is built in. There is very little imposition on pension schemes precisely because the measures in the directive reflect current UK practice. The issue is one of transparency, and the question also arises of whether common law itself is adequate to demonstrate compliance with the directive, rather than changing the way in which we do things. We are advised that, on that basis, we need to introduce these provisions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) asked how risk-averse I thought fund managers and trustees should be and talked about the balance between gilts and equities or, indeed, derivatives. I have no view on this matter, because the decision is one for fund managers and trustees. They must judge what is in the best interests of scheme members to ensure that returns are maximised, but they must do so in a manner that is "prudent". That is why that phrase is so important.

The hon. Member for Tatton complained that my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions did not respond to his point about surpluses during the debate on the previous new clause. I cannot believe that that is so, and just in case he did not hear the response, I repeat that we are compliant on surpluses. The directive does not require schemes to be funded daily to full buy-out levels. Our surplus requirements come into play only when scheme funding is significantly higher, so there is no compliance issue.

I hope that Members understand that we are introducing these provisions largely through regulation to ensure a proper consultation process, so that there is no disruption to the operation of the scheme, and to provide the flexibility that the hon. Member for Northavon rightly craves.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 19

BORROWING BY TRUSTEES OF OCCUPATIONAL PENSION SCHEMES

'After section 36 of the Pensions Act 1995 (c. 26) insert—

"36A Restriction on borrowing by trustees

Regulations may prohibit the trustees of a trust scheme, or the fund manager to whom any discretion has been delegated under section 34, from borrowing money or acting as a guarantor, except in prescribed cases.".'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 5

OCCUPATIONAL PENSION SCHEME RECEIVING CONTRIBUTIONS FROM EUROPEAN EMPLOYER

'(1) The trustees or managers of an occupational pension scheme must not accept any contribution to the scheme from a European employer unless all the following conditions are met.

(2) Condition A is that the trustees or managers of the scheme are authorised by the Regulator under section (General authorisation to accept contributions from European employers).

(3) Condition B is that the trustees or managers of the scheme are approved by the Regulator under section (Approval in relation to particular European employer) in relation to the European employer.

(4) Condition C is that either—

(a) the period of 2 months beginning with the date on which the Regulator notified the trustees or managers of the scheme under section (Approval in relation to particular European employer)(2)(a)(ii) has expired, or

(b) before the end of that period, the trustees or managers have in accordance with section (Notification of legal requirements of host member State outside United Kingdom) been provided by the Regulator with information as to the social and labour law of the host member State.

(5) If the trustees or managers of a scheme fail to comply with subsection (1), section 10 of the Pensions Act 1995 (c. 26) (civil penalties) applies to any trustee or manager who has failed to take all reasonable steps to secure compliance.

(6) In this Part—
"European employer" means any employer who—

(a) in the case of a body corporate, is incorporated in a member State other than the United Kingdom, and

(b) in any other case, is resident in such a member State;
"host member State", in relation to a European employer, means a member State determined in accordance with regulations.'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Pond: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

Government new clause 6—General authorisation to accept contributions from European employers.

Government new clause 7—Approval in relation to particular European employer.

Government new clause 8—Notification of legal requirements of host member State outside United Kingdom.

Government new clause 9—Duty of trustees or managers to act consistently with law of host member State.

Government new clause 10—Functions of Regulator in relation to institutions administered in other member States.

Government new clause 11—Interpretation of Part.

Government amendments Nos. 59 to 61.

Mr. Pond: We are already well into our European journey, and we shall be talking further about the European directive. As the House is aware, we have an obligation to implement the provisions of directive 2003/41/EC, which is known as the occupational pensions directive. As has been said, many of the directive's requirements already exist in UK law or are being incorporated through our own domestic agenda for pension reform. However, new clause 5 is the first of seven new clauses that implement an area of the occupational pensions directive not previously covered to date: cross-border activity, which has already been discussed to some extent this afternoon.

Cross-border activity occurs where an occupational pension scheme administered in one EU member state—described as the home member state—accepts contributions from employers located in another member state, which is described as the host member state. The directive's cross-border provisions are important because they represent a first step towards a single market for occupational retirement provision. New clause 5 sets out the conditions that a scheme must meet before it can start to operate on a cross-border basis. To summarise, a scheme must be authorised to operate on a cross-border basis by the pensions regulator, and it must have exchanged specific information with the regulator, in the form of a notice of intention to operate on a cross-border basis with a specified European employer from a host member state.

The scheme must then have secured the regulator's approval to its accepting contributions from that employer on a cross-border basis.

New clause 6 concerns the first general stage of authorisation that an occupational pension scheme will need to obtain from the pensions regulator before it can begin operating on a cross-border basis. To obtain that authorisation, a scheme will need to demonstrate compliance with all the provisions of the directive.

New clause 7 deals with the additional approval required under the directive by a UK pension scheme provider that wants to operate cross border, once it has chosen a specified member state employer for its proposed cross-border activities. That will involve the regulator assessing the scheme's proposed operations for its compatibility with the legal requirements of the member state in which it proposes to do business.

The regulator will already have liaised with its European counterparts through the formal European regulator network to determine the broad legal requirements of each member state's pensions legislation—known in the directive as "social and labour law". A cross-border pension scheme will need to submit a notice of intention to the regulator and subsequently receive approval in respect of each new sponsoring member state employer with which it wishes to do cross-border business.

New clause 8 places a duty on the pensions regulator to pass on to the prospective UK cross-border pension scheme the details of the social and labour laws of the host member state in which it intends to operate.

New clause 9 places an important duty on cross-border scheme trustees or managers to operate in a manner that complies with the relevant social and labour law of the member state from which employer contributions are being paid. Failure to comply with another member state's social and labour law will, under the terms of section 10 of the Pensions Act 1995, be a sanctionable offence. The pensions regulator will also have the power to revoke authorisation to operate cross border.

I should explain that although the pensions regulator will have the power to take action in such cases, it is not a function of the UK regulator actually to police the social and labour laws of another host member state. That is the responsibility of the regulatory authority of that host member state. Where such a breach is detected, article 20(9) of the directive allows the regulatory body concerned to notify the UK regulator of any irregularity, and it will then be for the UK regulator to act in co-ordination with the host member state regulator to put a stop to that breach of law.

New clause 10 places duties on the UK pensions regulator when acting in a host member state capacity. It applies where the cross-border pension scheme is based in another member state and it is accepting contributions from a UK employer. There are three basic obligations placed on the regulator in those circumstances. The first obligation arises when it receives a notice of intention from the regulatory authority of another member state that a scheme in that member state intends to accept contributions from a UK employer. In such a case, the regulator is required to forward to that regulatory authority details of any relevant UK law that the cross-border pension scheme will need to comply with in its UK operations—over and above the scheme's domestic pension laws.

Secondly, the regulator is required to notify the pension scheme's domestic regulatory authority of any significant changes in relevant UK pensions law. Thirdly, the regulator is to be responsible for monitoring the cross-border scheme's compliance with relevant UK law. Where an irregularity is detected, the regulator is to notify the scheme's domestic regulatory authority, so that action can be taken to rectify the situation. In addition, where the cross-border scheme is breaching the relevant UK social and labour law, subsections (5) to (7) permit the regulator to take action in respect of a UK employer sponsoring a cross-border scheme in another member state.

New clause 11 simply defines a number of terms used in this part of the Bill.

Consequential amendments Nos. 59 to 61 concern the role of the pensions regulator in supervising cross-border pension schemes. The pensions regulator, acting as the UK's "competent authority", will have a vital role to play in supervising such schemes. The amendments will enhance the functions of the regulator to take account of certain cross-border provisions of the directive. Put briefly, they collectively empower the regulator to carry out the two-stage authorisation and approval set out in new clauses 6 and 7 for UK pension schemes wishing to operate cross border. They also add, as a function of the regulator, the power to revoke either the general authorisation for cross-border activity or the specific approval for cross-border activity with a specified European employer.

The amendments also make it a function of the regulator to issue notices directing UK employers that they must take steps specified in the notice in order to remedy a situation where a non-UK EU member state pension scheme, sponsored by the UK employer in question, has breached UK pensions law. They also make it a function of the regulator to issue notices directing UK employers to cease to make contributions to such schemes where there is, or has been, a breach of relevant UK pensions law. The amendments also ensure that the regulator's standard procedures apply to those decisions, and that they may be delegated to the regulator's determinations panel.

The House will note that we are taking regulation-making powers in a number of areas to do with cross-border activity. I make no apology for that. If a single, cross-border market is to develop, implementing this directive will very much be a co-operative process. However, member states are currently proceeding with implementation at different rates. In view of that, we wish to take advantage of the greater flexibility offered by secondary legislation, which will enable us to react appropriately to developments in other member states, if and when required.

Mr. George Osborne: The Minister has made quite a defence of secondary legislation, both in his most recent contribution and in the wind-up to the previous debate. He said that it provides the Government with more flexibility, and allows them to consult more widely than would be the case if a provision were introduced by means of primary legislation brought before Parliament. Unfortunately, that says a lot about the Government's attitude to the Bill. The Minister for Pensions said that it was a work in progress, and we are seeing that unfold before our eyes.

It is fair to say that we have talked, in connection with recent new clauses, about the potential costs and red tape associated with the EU directive. I accused the Minister of gold-plating in the previous debate, but it is right for us to acknowledge that significant benefits could accrue to the UK financial services industry if we get this matter right. The UK industry is the most developed and sophisticated in Europe, and one would hope that it would be best placed to take advantage of a genuine cross-border market in financial services.

The document produced by the European Federation for Retirement Provision has, of course, been my bedtime reading for some time. [Interruption.] I am glad that that news has woken up the House of Commons. The federation is chaired by the familiar figure of Alan Pickering, who has estimated that the directive, if it works and achieves what he hopes it will achieve, could benefit European pensions by an extra €10 billion. That would be a boon to pension scheme members and to the UK financial services industry, but we must get the details right.

[Mr. George Osborne]

I make no apology for repeating my complaint that it is extraordinary that we have had to wait until now to see the detail of how the Government will implement the directive. The Minister gave the excuse a few minutes ago that the text was produced only in September, but that is eight months ago. The Government have had a long time to consult on it.

Mr. Pond: We have been consulting on it.

Mr. Osborne: The Minister says that the Government have been consulting on the directive, but they have not undertaken active consultation with the industry on the specific detail of legislation. Industry representatives have told me over the past few days that they have not had time to study the new clauses, so it is not true that there has been active consultation.

Indeed, the directive was adopted by the Council of Ministers more than a year ago. I shall not begin a lengthy debate about how the Council of Ministers could agree something three or four months before being given the final text. I have some limited experience of working with bodies such as the Council of Ministers, and such behaviour is unfortunately somewhat familiar. Nevertheless, the Government have had many months to consult on the final text—or the negotiating position that was agreed at the Council of Ministers.

As far as I can understand this group of new clauses, they place certain obligations on the regulator—we are talking mainly about the UK regulator, although of course similar obligations are placed on the regulators of other member states—to keep schemes informed as to the social and labour laws of host member states. Will the regulator be able to rely on the Governments of other member states to keep us informed of changes to their social and labour laws? Obviously, with so many members of the EU now, those laws will be changing all the time in many different countries. Is it the regulator's job to keep on top of that and monitor developments, or is it the duty of member states to keep the regulator informed of changes? Who is liable for the accuracy of the information that the regulator passes on to UK schemes?

Is it the pensions regulator's job to say, "Hold on, the Hungarian Parliament has just changed its employment law"? Can he rely on the letter from the Hungarian embassy and simply pass that on to UK schemes, or will he have to check that that was exactly what was agreed? We know from experience in this place that we pass laws assuming that they will be interpreted in a certain way. They then get to the courts and are interpreted in another way. So whose job is it to keep on top of developments as they unfold in member states? Is it an ongoing requirement to keep schemes informed of the changes as they happen, or is it just a requirement when they are set up? Will the regulator be expected to produce a bulletin saying, "Look at the new law in Slovakia. Look at what has happened in Cyprus. Look at the Finnish Parliament's decision on this social law"? The point that I am making is that it will be a huge amount of work. Is the regulator up to it and who will be responsible for the accuracy of the information?

The directive refers to social and labour laws, but what about tax laws? If, for example, a large American company has its European headquarters in Frankfurt and opens a cross-border scheme based in Britain for all its European employees, do our tax laws apply or do they apply only to individuals working in the United Kingdom? I am talking about the new lifetime allowances, annual allowances and so on. Does UK tax law apply to an employee working in the UK for a Greek company that has a cross-border scheme based in Luxembourg? How will it work in practice? These are complicated issues. The directive refers only to social and labour laws, but what about tax laws? As we have discovered this afternoon, much of the pensions legislation here is being driven by changes to the laws governing the taxation of pensions.

I began by saying that the directive offers great potential to the financial services industry in this country, but it is important that we can implement it without being overly bureaucratic and without asking too much of the regulator.

Mr. Pond: I thank the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) for his acknowledgement of the importance of the provisions to ensure that we build effectively a single market in occupational pensions in such a way not only that we allow the development of that aspect of the European financial services market but that citizens from different member states are given opportunities to have their pension rights protected.

The definitive text was not available to us until September last year, but I said that we had consulted on the directive, not that we had consulted on these clauses, which are based on that consultation. Of course, in bringing forward the regulations, we will consult further, so that people have an opportunity to show how the proposals will work in practice.

The hon. Gentleman asked specifically whether it would be the regulator's job to keep abreast of changes in social and labour laws in other member states. It is, of course, a requirement on the regulator in the host member state to keep us informed of what is happening in that state. The regulator will likewise have to inform those schemes operating in those states. That must be based on co-operation between regulators in the various member states, and—as the hon. Gentleman will be aware—there are proposals to establish a committee of regulators across Europe to consider just those practical issues. I am sure that hon. Members will be eager to find out how they might join that cross-European committee.

The hon. Gentleman also asked how the cross-border proposals will work with the tax simplification proposals, and I can tell him that we have debated clauses dealing with the new rules simplifying the taxation of pension schemes and we will debate further such clauses. Under those rules, a pension scheme with either a UK or an EEA-based administrator will be able to register with the Inland Revenue as long as the scheme meets UK legislative requirements. The scheme may include members who are not resident in the UK. That means that contributions paid to it will attract UK tax relief against earnings that are charged to UK tax. The Government are considering the situation and will produce proposals for those who come to the UK and wish to claim UK tax relief on contributions to overseas pensions schemes of which they are already members. I hope that that clarifies the two specific points that the hon. Gentleman raised.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 6

GENERAL AUTHORISATION TO ACCEPT CONTRIBUTIONS FROM EUROPEAN EMPLOYERS

'(1) An application by the trustees or managers of an occupational pension scheme for authorisation under this section must be made to the Regulator in the prescribed form and in the prescribed manner.

(2) Regulations may make provision as to—

(a) the revocation by the Regulator of authorisation under this section, and

(b) the criteria to be applied by the Regulator in reaching any decision relating to the grant or revocation of authorisation.'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 7

APPROVAL IN RELATION TO PARTICULAR EUROPEAN EMPLOYER

'(1) An application by the trustees or managers of an occupational pension scheme for approval under this section in relation to a European employer is made by the trustees or managers of the scheme giving the Regulator in the prescribed manner a notice ("the notice of intention") in the prescribed form which—

(a) specifies the European employer ("the specified employer"),

(b) states his intention, subject to approval under this section, to accept contributions from the specified employer,

(c) specifies the host member State, and

(d) contains other prescribed information.

(2) On receipt of the notice of intention, the Regulator must within 3 months—

(a) where the Regulator is satisfied that the persons giving the notice of intention meet prescribed conditions—

(i) notify the competent authority of the host member State of the receipt by the Regulator of the notice of intention and of the contents of the notice, and

(ii) notify the persons who gave the notice of intention that they are approved for the purposes of this section in relation to the specified employer, or

(b) in any other case, notify the persons who gave the notification that they are not so approved.

(3) If the Regulator does not act under subsection (2)(a) or (b) within the period of 3 months beginning with the day on which the notice of intention was received, the persons who gave the notice of intention are to be taken to have been approved for the purposes of this section in relation to the specified employer at the end of the period.

(4) Regulations may make provision as to—

(a) the revocation by the Regulator of approval under this section, and

(b) the criteria to be applied by the Regulator in reaching any decision relating to the revocation of approval.'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 8

NOTIFICATION OF LEGAL REQUIREMENTS OF HOST MEMBER STATE OUTSIDE UNITED KINGDOM

'Where—

(a) the Regulator has notified the competent authority of the host member State under subsection (2)(a)(i) of section (Approval in relation to particular European employer), and

(b) in pursuance of Article 20(5) of the Directive, the Regulator receives information from the competent authority as to requirements of the social and labour law of the host member State, the Regulator must as soon as reasonably practicable forward that information to the person who gave the notice of intention under section (Approval in relation to particular European employer).'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 9

DUTY OF TRUSTEES OR MANAGERS TO ACT CONSISTENTLY WITH LAW OF HOST MEMBER STATE

'(1) Where the trustees or managers of an occupational pension scheme receive contributions to the scheme from a European employer, the trustees or managers must ensure that the scheme, so far as it relates to members who are or have been employed by the employer, is operated in a way which is consistent with the requirements of the social and labour law of the host member State.

(2) Regulations may modify any provision of pensions legislation in its application to members of an occupational pension scheme in respect of which the employer is a European employer.

(3) If the trustees or managers of a scheme fail to comply with subsection (1), section 10 of the Pensions Act 1995 (c. 26) (civil penalties) applies to any trustee or manager who has failed to take all reasonable steps to secure compliance.

(4) In this section "pensions legislation" means—

(a) the Pension Schemes Act 1993 (c. 48),

(b) Part 1 of the Pensions Act 1995 (c. 26), other than sections 62 to 66A of that Act (equal treatment),

(c) Part 1 or section 33 of the Welfare Reform and Pensions Act 1999 (c. 30), or

(d) this Act.'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 10

FUNCTIONS OF REGULATOR IN RELATION TO INSTITUTIONS ADMINISTERED IN OTHER MEMBER STATES

'(1) Where a UK employer makes (or proposes to make) contributions to a European pensions institution, any function which Article 20 of the Directive requires or authorises to be exercised by the competent authorities of the host member State is exercisable by the Regulator.

(2) If the Regulator receives a notification in pursuance of Article 20(4) of the Directive from the competent authority in another member State, the Regulator must within 2 months inform that authority of any relevant legal requirements

(3) Where there is a significant change in any relevant legal requirements, the Regulator must as soon as reasonably practicable inform any competent authority in relation to which it has provided information under subsection (2) of that change.

(4) Where a UK employer makes contributions to a European pensions institution, the Regulator must—

(a) monitor the compliance of that institution with the relevant legal requirements, and

(b) if the Regulator becomes aware of any contravention by the institution of any relevant legal requirements, inform the competent authority of that member State of the failure.

(5) If the Regulator is satisfied that a European pensions institution which receives contributions from a UK employer is contravening any relevant legal requirements, the Regulator may issue a notice to the UK employer directing him—

(a) to take or refrain from taking such steps as are specified in the notice in order to remedy the failure by the institution, or to cease to make further contributions to the institution.

(6) Regulations may make further provision about the effect of a notice under subsection (5)(b), including provision conferring functions on the Regulator.

(7) Section 10 of the Pensions Act 1995 (civil penalties) applies to any UK employer who, without reasonable excuse, fails to comply with a notice under subsection (5).

(8) In this section—

"European pensions institution" means an institution for occupational retirement provision, as defined by Article 6(a) of the Directive, that has its main administration in a member State other than the United Kingdom;

"relevant legal requirements" means such requirements of the law relating to occupational pensions, as it applies in any part of the United Kingdom, as may be prescribed;

"UK employer" means an employer who—

(a) in the case of a body corporate, is incorporated under the law of the United Kingdom or any part of the United Kingdom, or

(b) in any other case, is resident in the United Kingdom.'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 11

INTERPRETATION OF PART

'In this Part—

"competent authority", in relation to a member State other than the United Kingdom, means a national authority designated in accordance with the law of that State to carry out the duties provided for in the Directive;

"the Directive" means Directive 2003/41/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council on the activities and supervision of institutions for occupational retirement provision;

"European employer" has the meaning given by section (Occupational pension scheme receiving contributions from European employer)(6);

"host member State", in relation to a European employer, has the meaning given by section (Occupational pension scheme receiving contributions from European employer)(6);

"social and labour law", in relation to a member State other than the United Kingdom, means the social and labour law (within the meaning of Article 20 of the Directive) of that State relevant to occupational pensions.'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 12

RESTORATION ORDERS WHERE TRANSACTIONS AT AN UNDERVALUE

'(1) This section applies in relation to an occupational pension scheme other than—

(a) a money purchase scheme, or

(b) a prescribed scheme or a scheme of a prescribed description.

(2) The Regulator may make a restoration order in respect of a transaction involving assets of the scheme if—

(a) a relevant event has occurred in relation to the employer in relation to the scheme, and

(b) the transaction is a transaction at an undervalue entered into with a person at a time which—

(i) is on or after 11th June 2003, but

(ii) is not more than two years before the occurrence of the relevant event in relation to the employer.

(3) A restoration order in respect of a transaction involving assets of a scheme is such an order as the Regulator thinks fit for restoring the position to what it would have been if the transaction had not been entered into.

(4) For the purposes of this section a relevant event occurs in relation to the employer in relation to a scheme if and when on or after the appointed day—

(a) an insolvency event occurs in relation to the employer, or

(b) the trustees or managers of the scheme make an application under subsection (1) of section 116 or receive a notice from the Board of the Pension Protection Fund under subsection (5)(a) of that section (applications and notifications prior to the Board assuming responsibility for a scheme).

(5) For the purposes of subsection (4)—

(a) the "appointed day" means the day appointed under section 113(2) (no pension protection under Chapter 3 of Part 2 if the scheme begins winding up before the day appointed by the Secretary of State),

(b) section 110 (meaning of "insolvency event") applies for the purposes of determining if and when an insolvency event has occurred in relation to the employer, and

(c) the reference to an insolvency event in relation to the employer does not include an insolvency event which occurred in relation to him before he became the employer in relation to the scheme.

(6) For the purposes of this section and section [Restoration orders: supplementary], a transaction involving assets of a scheme is a transaction at an undervalue entered into with a person ("P") if the trustees or managers of the scheme or appropriate persons in relation to the scheme—

(a) make a gift to P or otherwise enter into a transaction with P on terms that provide for no consideration to be provided towards the scheme, or

(b) enter into a transaction with P for a consideration the value of which, in money or money's worth, is significantly less than the value, in money or money's worth, of the consideration provided by or on behalf of the trustees or managers of the scheme.

(7) In subsection (6) "appropriate persons" in relation to a scheme means a person who, or several persons each of whom is a person who, at the time at which the transaction in question is entered into, is—

(a) a person of a prescribed description, and

(b) entitled to exercise powers in relation to the scheme.

(8) For the purposes of this section and section [Restoration orders: supplementary]—

"assets" includes future assets,

"transaction" includes a gift, agreement or arrangement and references to entering into a transaction are to be construed accordingly.

(9) The provisions of this section apply without prejudice to the availability of any other remedy, even in relation to a transaction where the trustees or managers of the scheme or appropriate persons in question had no power to enter into the transaction.'.—[Malcolm Wicks.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Malcolm Wicks: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

Government new clause 13—Restoration orders: supplementary.

Government new clause 14—Content and effect of a restoration order.

Government new clause 15—Contribution notice where failure to comply with restoration order.

Government new clause 16—Content and effect of a section [Contribution notice where failure to comply with restoration order] contribution notice.

Government new clause 17—Debt due from the employer in the case of multi-employer schemes.

Government amendments Nos. 74, 75, 77, 88, 100, 107 to 110, 112 to 118, 127, 128, 133 and 136 to 142.

Malcolm Wicks: These new clauses represent a further tranche of provision designed to mitigate the risks of moral hazard for the pension protection fund. They add to and complement the new powers introduced in Committee that aim to safeguard the integrity and sustainability of the PPF and avoid placing an unfair burden on responsible levy payers.

As I said in Committee, there are a number of forms of moral hazard that we must address. The admissible rules and "recent discretionary increases" provisions in schedule 7 of the Bill are designed to protect the PPF against actions taken by schemes in order to increase the benefits that could be payable by the new fund. New clauses 20 to 22, which we will debate later today, also bolster that aspect of protection.

Clauses 35 to 46, which we introduced in Committee, are designed to protect the PPF and scheme members from another type of moral hazard: the risk posed by unscrupulous employers who might seek to use company structures and business transactions as a cover for side-stepping their pension obligations. Many of the amendments in this large group follow on from those new clauses and make consequential amendments to other aspects of the Bill to ensure consistency.

The purpose of new clauses 12 to 16 is to protect the PPF against actions that reduce the assets in a scheme that could potentially be taken into the PPF. The clauses allow the regulator to issue a restoration order directing that the position of the scheme be restored where the scheme has entered into a "transaction at an undervalue" within a two-year period leading up to an insolvency event—as set out in clause 110—or application or notification under clause 115. The clauses provide for enforcement of the restoration order, if necessary, via a contribution notice.

A transaction at an undervalue is exactly what it says—a transaction involving scheme assets that results in the scheme receiving no consideration, or consideration that is less than the market value, in return. That could include, for example, trustees being persuaded to purchase a property on the basis of planning permission for a development that does not actually exist, or a director of a company persuading trustees to offer him a transfer on a very generous basis to prevent his benefits being reduced by the compensation cap should the scheme enter the PPF.

There is currently provision in insolvency legislation retrospectively to undo "transactions at an undervalue" involving company assets, which occur in the run-up to insolvency. New clauses 12 to 16 introduce similar provision in respect of transactions involving scheme assets, in order both to protect scheme members from having the assets of their scheme unfairly depleted and to guard against the possibility of the PPF having to assume responsibility for such schemes where it otherwise would not have done so.

In common with the anti-avoidance provisions introduced in Committee, the new clauses will be operated and enforced by the regulator in the context of meeting its objectives to reduce calls on the PPF and protect the benefits of scheme members. The pensions regulator will have the intelligence and expertise as a result of day-to-day monitoring work on pension schemes to deal proactively with the risks of moral hazard. The powers in new clauses 12 to 16 are reserved to the determinations panel and exercised by standard procedure; they are also subject to the powers to vary and revoke contained in clause 90.

In line with clauses 35 to 38, which give the regulator power to issue contribution notices where there is evidence of avoidance of employer debt, the power to issue restoration orders where there is a scheme transaction at an undervalue will apply to actions taken after 11 June 2003, when the proposal to introduce the PPF was announced. It will ensure that where a transaction at an undervalue has taken place since that date, the scheme's position can be restored and members' pensions protected. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State clearly warned:

"We will have to introduce protection against engineering designed to circumvent the intent of our proposals."—[Official Report, 11 June 2003; Vol. 406, c. 696.]

New clause 17 enables us to take forward the proposal to reform the position in relation to the application of debt on withdrawal from associated multi-employer schemes that I announced in Committee. The provision complements the new powers in clauses 39 to 46, which allow the regulator to issue financial support directions where an "insufficiently resourced" or service company is the sole sponsoring employer of a pension scheme.

The current legislation on withdrawal from multi-employer schemes provides for circumstances where, provided there are other companies left in such a scheme, a company can withdraw from the scheme and cease to be a sponsoring employer so that it will not be liable for any shortfall if the scheme winds up in the future. Currently, employers can do that relatively cheaply, as the withdrawal debt is based on the minimum funding requirement—the MFR.

New clause 17 introduces a new provision that enables section 75 of the Pensions Act 1995 to be modified to provide flexibility in calculating the section

[Malcolm Wicks]

75 debt when a participating employer withdraws from a multi-employer scheme with associated employers. The detail of that provision will be set out in regulations; that mirrors the approach taken in legislation governing multi-employer schemes where provision is made in secondary legislation to reflect the diverse and complex nature of such schemes.

The regulation-making powers in new clause 17, which will not be retrospective, will provide that a full buy-out debt should be triggered unless an appropriate support arrangement is put in place and approved by the pensions regulator, in which case the debt will be recalculated and a scheme-specific debt will be payable.

4.30 pm

The financial support arrangements will be similar to those outlined in clauses 39 to 46. For example, joint and several liability for pension liabilities could be applied across the whole company group, so that the debt on the employer in the event that the scheme should wind up in the future could be claimed against any member of the group. Alternatively, the ultimate parent company in the group, whether or not participating in the scheme, could agree to meet the withdrawing employer's pension liabilities if the scheme were to wind up in the future.

In addition, there will also be the option to transfer pension liabilities to an appropriate new scheme when the employer withdraws. That would also reduce—in some cases, to zero—the debt payable, as any member's liabilities actually transferred out of the scheme will be included in the calculation of the debt.

Regulations under the new clause will provide that any person identified in the withdrawal arrangements must consent to them and that any breakdown in the withdrawal arrangements may lead to a contribution notice being issued to those identified in the arrangements.

In tandem with clauses 39 to 46, new clause 17 is designed to avoid situations where, whether by chance or design, withdrawal from multi-employer arrangements leaves pension liabilities in a company that is substantially weaker than the rest or other parts of the group. Such a situation increases the risk that the scheme will be abandoned without being able to recover the full scheme costs from the employer, leaving the PPF to pick up the bill and the risk that certain members will have their benefits cut, even if other parts of the group could meet the cost.

Finally, this group contains a number of technical amendments, consequential on clauses added in Committee. Those amendments will ensure consistency between the new moral hazard provisions and the rest of the Bill. For example, amendments Nos. 112 to 118 will ensure that amounts recovered in respect of debts due under any of the moral hazard powers can be subsumed into the pension protection fund once the PPF board has assumed responsibility for a scheme. Amendments Nos. 136 to 142 will add those new powers in relation to moral hazard that are reserved to the determinations panel under schedule 2, which lists the reserved regulatory functions.

Hon. Members will appreciate how important it is that the regulator has the right tools to enable him properly to protect the PPF from abuse, and I urge hon. Members to accept these new clauses and amendments.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): I assure the Minister that, yes, we do understand the need to protect the PPF from exploitation and abuse. Indeed, I checked the original statement on the creation of the fund, made back in June 2003, and we specifically raised that issue with the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions. We understand the overall purpose of the provisions, but this is an example of the dangers of legislating in haste and repenting at leisure, because there is growing concern in the business community about the effects of some of those provisions.

I hope that the Minister is at least willing to undertake to consider the provisions further in the light of some of the representations that he has received and which we have received as well. Perhaps I can briefly give some examples of those concerns.

The PPF and the regulator will have draconian powers. In practice, a new contingent risk will be placed on companies, company directors and shareholders. Those in the business community are concerned that that will put at risk capital, shareholders' capital and dividends in a way that they had not expected. Does the Minister accept that he should consider not just the protection of the PPF, but the proposals' effect on the ability of British business to raise capital and reward capital, given the new risk to directors and the providers of capital?

That raises a specific point that has been made to us and, I am sure, to the Minister. Will the regulator solely take account of the PPF and the need to protect its finances or will he also be able to take account of the financial position of the employer and the parent company? Is that a relevant consideration for the regulator in exercising the powers set out in the new clauses? For example, what would the position be if the exercise of the power in the new clauses were to tip a company over into bankruptcy? Is that a relevant consideration for the regulator or is it beyond the focus that the new clauses give to him? It would be helpful if the Minister could comment on that.

The Minister referred particularly to new clause 17, so may I press him on that? Like the Minister and Members on both sides, we have been approached by the Association of Consulting Actuaries, which is unhappy about the provisions for multi-employer schemes. We rather like multi-employer schemes and, given the Minister's affinity for the co-operative movement and continental industry-wide schemes, I presume that he likes them too. However, the provisions are quite tough for such schemes and the ACA has suggested that "the proposal that any employer within a group of associated employers be compelled to make up . . . some or all of a scheme shortfall should be restricted to the scheme shortfall over PPF level benefits, and not the full scheme shortfall."

It will be interesting to hear him comment on that, because the ACA's proposal would limit the burden that is imposed by these provisions.

I also want to ask the Minister about retrospectivity. Does he believe that these provisions, which go back to 11 June 2003, are retrospective and fully covered by the statement that was made then? That is what he appeared to maintain earlier. Again, lawyers are concerned that these provisions would be difficult to defend and would be open to challenge under human rights law on the grounds that they are retrospective and constitute an unjustified risk to people's ability to enjoy their property. We would also appreciate the Minister's comments on the human rights aspects of the provisions.

Mr. Webb: As ever, it is a pleasure to welcome the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), with his insightful contributions, back to our proceedings.

I always get the sense of playing catch-up when the Government try to close a loophole that they fear they have just created. They have created the PPF and, quite properly, they do not want it to be abused because of the knock-on effect that that would have on the levy on employers. Having created this thing, they have sat down to think how people might abuse it. They therefore introduce provisions to second-guess the way in which the fund might be abused and to close each possible loophole in turn.

I think that I am right in saying that these new clauses are the third set relating to moral hazard. We had ones quite late in Committee to do with not putting a pension fund in the hands of an employer who had virtually no assets, because he would almost inevitably make a call upon the PPF. However, I have a slightly nagging fear. Although the Government might have correctly guessed the most obvious ways of dealing with the matter, ingenious employers, accountants and—dare I say it?—even actuaries might think of new ways of circumventing the Government's intentions. We now have an open book with a pen in the Minister's hand so that, every time the Department thinks of another clever wheeze, it can write half a dozen new clauses to stop it. However, what will happen when the ink is dry, the Bill has become an Act and a clever financial wizard comes up with another moral hazard to put an unfair burden on the PPF?

In Committee, we asked the Minister whether there should not be a stronger anti-moral hazard provision in the Bill. The Government who, with the best advice in the world, are unlikely to foresee the next clever wheeze to create a burden on the PPF, are unlikely to have enough parliamentary time to introduce primary legislation to deal with such a wheeze, which could leave the fund open to abuse. When I made that point to the Minister he offered a human rights defence and said that we could not have a general anti-avoidance rule because it might be draconian and contravene human rights legislation. Has he had a chance to reflect on that argument, and is that still the Government's position? Each group of new clauses appears to be satisfactory—no one wants assets to be sold at an implausibly low value, thereby weakening the pension scheme or the position of the employer and leading to an unnecessary claim on the PPF—but they deal only with individual examples. The Minister said that in each group of new clauses the Government have given themselves broad powers, which is mildly reassuring, but it is not reassuring enough. Is the piecemeal approach of anticipating the nasty schemes that nasty people might devise and trying explicitly to prevent them necessarily the right way to deal with such issues?

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if we were talking about housing benefit instead of pension protection we would call such activity fraud, not moral hazard? People claiming housing benefit would be deemed to be doing things to take advantage of the system and would be banned from making a claim. Just because it is big business, that does not mean that we should not face up to the problem and say that anything that is done simply to take advantage of the scheme or to rip it off should be banned.

Mr. Webb: Indeed, that is the general thrust of my argument which, however, was not expressed quite as forcefully as the hon. Gentleman's contention—I was tiptoeing around the issue. There are general presumptions about the nature of housing benefit fraud. Lying on the form is obviously fraud, but artificially depressing one's earnings to get more housing benefit is less clear-cut. However, there should be a presumption that artificial activities, the principal or sole aim of which is to make an unnecessary claim on the PPF, should be prohibited in general, rather than being prohibited individually, as there will always be others that we have not thought of. I should be grateful for further reassurance from the Minister on that point.

The hon. Member for Havant made a fair point about retrospection. The Minister read out a general hint from the Secretary of State on 11 June 2003 about the undesirability of certain actions. I doubt, however, whether that would stand up in court. We might want an employer to be caught by an anti-avoidance law, but none the less he might argue that in the past 12 months his firm undertook some asset transactions and that the Secretary of State's remarks on 11 June could not be interpreted as making that an unlawful avoidance of a restoration notice.

I am also worried about the two-year limit. First, does there need to be a date at all? If an employer at any point artificially depresses the value of a fund, should we not take action? Why do we want the two-year cut-off? If it can be demonstrated that the action taken was entirely artificial, why does it matter whether it took place two years and a day earlier or one year, 364 days earlier? The fund was artificially depressed and its position was weakened. Even if a claim is made on the pension protection fund just over two years later, the PPF has still suffered. It may be argued that once two years have elapsed it is hard to prove that something was done in response to something else, but the two-year limit is entirely arbitrary. Can the Minister therefore explain why it was selected?

4.45 pm

We do not want any action to be taken that leads to an artificial claim on the PPF, so why two years? Is there some other part of pensions legislation that uses two years, or is there just a broad-brush assumption that once two years have gone by, one can no longer prove the case? Surely these matters should be judged on the merits of each individual case, which would imply that the fixed two-year rule is removed and replaced by a general provision that if anything that was done artificially reduced the value of the fund, leading to a claim on the PPF, and if it can be demonstrated that that is why it was done, the regulator is allowed to make some sort of restoration order.

I appreciate that that falls foul of the point made by the hon. Member for Havant about the open-ended nature of the liability on the directors and so forth, but clearly if something had occurred more than two years previously, it would be difficult to prove. If it could be proven that the effect on the fund was completely artificial, the people responsible should not be allowed to get away with it.

As ever, the spirit of the new clause is right. We want to close the loopholes, but I am not convinced that the piecemeal approach to closing loopholes is the way that we should be going.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): I shall speak on Government amendments Nos. 74 and 75 as they apply to clause 35. Amendment No. 74 qualifies the retrospective date of 11 June to a certain extent, but does not deal with some of the wider concerns about clause 35, which I think the Minister will concede was added at a very late stage in the proceedings on the Bill. In my view, the clause needs substantial redrafting. As my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) said, it goes far too wide in its scope and may well end up discouraging investment in precisely those companies where investment is needed, not least to address any weaknesses in the pension fund.

First, I fully understand the concerns that led to the clause. I say that to the Minister straight away. I do not doubt the abuses that occurred, and I do not doubt that he is right to try and tackle the issue of moral hazard. It is one thing to impose further duties on directors—I declare an interest as a company director, recorded in the register, of course—as directors accept their responsibilities for the company of which they are directors. However, the clause goes very much further than directors and could catch not just shareholders and investors, as my hon. Friend the Member for Havant said, but any person associated with them—in the words of subsection (3)(b), "a person connected with, or an associate of, the employer".

I should like the Minister to explain what that means. Does it mean a friend of the employer? Does it mean a fellow member of a racing syndicate or a fellow owner in a holiday complex? Does it mean just a very good friend of the employer? The way the clause is drawn, it goes far too wide. It could mean that a contribution notice is addressed to almost anybody, and the regulator will therefore not only be able to go on a fishing expedition among the directors or former directors of a company, or among the shareholders and business investors or business angels behind the company, but after any friend of the employer. That goes too far.

Secondly, the test of reasonableness that is laid down in the clause is ultimately self-serving. It seems to be reasonable so long as the regulator thinks it is reasonable. There appears to be no appeal provision. The Minister may correct me if I am wrong, but in the batch of new clauses that he has produced today or those that he produced at the very end of the Committee proceedings, I can see no appeal provision. In other words, the action of the regulator does not even have to be reasonable. It has to be reasonable only in the regulator's opinion. Again, that goes too far.

Finally, the regulator will be free to go after that person's assets—as I said, not simply a director, a shareholder or an investor, but an associate of the employer. The regulator will be able to go after his house, his shares and his assets. There is no limit to the sort of liability of a person who happened to be associated with the employer.

Kevin Brennan: First, what would such people have to fear from, as the hon. Gentleman describes it, a fishing expedition? Secondly, the pensions regulator would, of course, be subject to judicial review if he acted unreasonably.

Mr. Fallon: I accept the second point, but it would be hard for the Minister to rely on the provision being subject to judicial review in the courts. What is reasonable should be set out in statute and not simply left to the regulator's opinion. The hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan) says that even a friend of an employer should be pursued to the ends of the earth, but I do not agree. A connection should be proved, preferably involving the directors of the company, but certainly involving somebody who has been legally associated with that company and its affairs.

The provision is also too wide because it covers not only actions, but failures to act. It is difficult to be sure that one has failed to do something, and it is certainly difficult to be sure that one has failed to do something in a period that has already passed. If someone wants to correct an error with a pension fund, it is now too late to do so because the provision is, of course, retrospective to June 2003, which will cause a few problems.

If shareholders, investors, directors or friends of directors are personally liable and may have their assets seized to make good a pensions deficit in a subsidiary of a company that happened to belong to a friend of theirs, they are surely less likely to invest in or be involved with such companies. That might well discourage overseas investment, which the Minister may want. Those involved in running companies where a difficulty has occurred with the pension fund face a dilemma: if the liabilities mount up and they declare the company insolvent, they become personally liable up to the extent of their assets—houses and wealth—for any apparent deficiency, and the only way in which they can avoid that and protect their personal assets is to trade fraudulently.

I do not doubt the Minister's intention, and he is right to tackle moral hazard, but he must bear in mind that hard cases sometimes make bad law. The provision is too widely drawn, and, to his credit, he admitted that in Committee. He said:

"We have deliberately framed the powers broadly."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 27 April 2004; c. 776.]

If he will not reflect on how the powers are framed, I hope that the other place will have more time than us to ensure that the provision is more equitable for those involved in business and that it is fit for the worthwhile purpose for which he designed it.

Mr. Frank Field: I support the Government, who must draw a certain satisfaction from the fact that although detailed criticisms are being made, no one is speaking against the provision's drift, which is that we should protect the fund.

I share the anger felt by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan) on behalf of constituents who believe that their pension savings were stolen by the actions of their employers, which should be judged in the courts. It is proper for the Government to try to close as many loopholes as possible and, presumably, to make amendments in the other place, but I have a couple of warnings. Although my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West and I represent constituents who have lost all or part of their pension savings, the Government's responsibility in framing the measures is greater than simply bringing our constituents retrospective justice.

As I see it, the Government's proposals face two danger zones. Those relate not so much to what has happened in the past—because under new clause 34 a group of people who have been badly treated will get some redress—as to what some employers may try to do between now and the fund coming into operation, and what might happen in the very early stages of its life. I assume that the Government's great concern is not that if we go on fishing expeditions we might be able to land a few people in court, but that there may be one or more major closures between now and the early stages of the fund that swamp the finances of that organisation.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister, who has been listening carefully to the debate, takes considerable pleasure in the support that has come from Members on both sides of the House in agreeing that we must close as many loopholes as possible. However, I hope that in devising ways of doing so he will not be blind to the danger zone that we have now entered, whereby unscrupulous employers may try to offload some very significant liabilities on to the fund. If they were successful in doing so, its life might be crippled and limited. Although these debates are important, we should focus our vision on the period from now until the vesting of the fund, and then to the early stages of its life.

Malcolm Wicks: This has been a useful discussion. I heed the warning from my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). We need to be smart and astute about how those with poor intentions may read these debates about our intentions, because we must be ahead of the game. That is partly why we have opted for fairly broad powers, despite gentle criticism that they might be too broad, as well as some criticism that they may be insufficient to keep up with events. I do not think that I should apologise for that.

After I spoke, the debate was led by the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), who previously spoke memorably of the need to protect against companies that

"slied their pension responsibilities to a different legal entity, like a snake shedding its skin, and emerge as a company without pensions."—[Official Report, 11 June 2003; Vol. 406, c. 685.]

Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave a similar warning. The debate therefore centres on whether we have got this broadly right or wrong.

In response to the hon. Member for Havant, the regulator will have the power to issue a contribution notice to a person, but only in certain circumstances: if that person was a party to an act or a failure to act, the main purpose of which was to avoid any section 75 debt or to reduce such a debt or prevent its becoming due; the person was the employer in relation to the pension scheme, or connected or associated with the employer at the time of the act or failure to act; and the regulator thinks it reasonable to impose liability on that person. We are then mindful of several other criteria. When deciding whether it is reasonable to impose liability on any person, the regulator will have to consider a range of factors such as the degree of involvement of that person in the act or failure to act, and the financial circumstances of that person—for example, if the person is a company, whether the sum required would make it insolvent.

Those are important issues, although I am bound to say that the best way of not getting involved in this no doubt nasty business with the regulator is to be an honest and proper person. Those who behave honestly will have nothing to fear. The existing body, which will become the regulator, the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority—OPRA—is aware of possible cases where, in spite of the Secretary of State's warning, it appears that some employers may have already taken action to dump liabilities on the pension protection fund.

The new clauses are designed to guard against such manipulation and will apply to actions that are taken after 11 June 2003, when the proposal to introduce the PPF was announced. The Government believe that that limited retrospection is proportionate as a matter of law. If some people are wringing their hands because of the retrospection, I am glad about it. They have every reason to wring their hands and we have every reason to ensure that they do not overcome Parliament's will, hence the limited retrospection.

The hon. Member for Havant asked reasonable questions about multi-employer schemes. The current position, which allows companies to leave a scheme and its pension liabilities behind, is unfair because it leaves the other employers to pick up the bill. Those employers may not be able to afford that, leaving members and the PPF to pick it up in future. The new clauses provide for flexible arrangements to allow companies to pay a lower debt, including, for example, the company that transfers its liabilities to a new scheme.

I want to clarify one of the remarks in my opening speech. I left out a vital negative.

Mr. Willetts: No one noticed.

Malcolm Wicks: I was disappointed that no one noticed; indeed, I was disappointed that I did not notice. I should have said that new clause 17, which amends section 75 of the Pensions Act 1995, provides for any members' liabilities that are transferred out of the scheme not to be included in the calculation of that debt.

The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) asked about new wheezes. I suppose that it is a reasonable description in this period of hayfever. We are advised that a general, continuing moral hazard power is inconsistent with human rights. That remains the case. Some of us in some political parties must have regard to human rights and we believe that the new clauses are sufficiently broad to cover all circumstances. However, I take seriously the hon. Gentleman's anxieties, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead echoed. We need to be careful and ahead of the game.

Mr. Frank Field: Did my hon. Friend notice that the plea for general powers came from the Liberal Democrat Benches? He said that they might go against the European convention on human rights, yet the Liberal Democrats are the strongest defenders of the European conventions.

Malcolm Wicks: Life is full of joyful irony and I am pleased on this occasion to be regarded as something of an old-fashioned Liberal.

We were asked why a time of two years had been set. There will never be a clear scientific answer to that sort of question about where to draw the line. The power is primarily intended to protect the PPF and scheme members from transactions that occur when the scheme is or may be in jeopardy. Establishing a broad and flexible power creates a balance between certainty and protection. It should allow the regulator to achieve protection, but limits the time scale when the power can be exercised. A scheme's funding position is most likely to be in jeopardy in the period before an insolvency. The insolvency may be the trigger for the involvement of the new PPF. Outside that period, the regulator may use the power in clause 17, which has more limited scope.

Let me deal with the points of the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon)—now sadly only one oak, due to natural calamity. I believe that others have been planted. I hope that that is the case, otherwise we shall table a new clause to that effect. He expressed a proper concern about whom we mean by connected or associated persons. As an old-fashioned Liberal, I believe that we should not be draconian about that. I am advised that section 435 of the Insolvency Act 1986 defines the relevant test. It provides that the regulator may require a contribution to be paid only when it is reasonable to do so. Subsection (5) deals with factors to assist in determining who may reasonably be required to pay. Let me try to reassure the hon. Gentleman that this is not an unreasonable catch-all. We only want to go after the people whom we are required to go after. Perhaps I can spell that out to the hon. Gentleman in a letter, to give him reassurance in response to his perfectly reasonable questions. Indeed, I think he raised some other points to that effect.

Within the new regulator, we shall have the admittedly slightly quaintly named determinations panel, which will be at arm's length from the main regulator's powers, and which will provide a check and a balance. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan) said earlier, if people are not satisfied with a decision, they may seek permission to appeal to the Court of Appeal on a point of law. I hope that I have covered most of the points that have been raised and I urge the House to accept the new clause.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 13

RESTORATION ORDERS: SUPPLEMENTARY

'(1) This section applies in relation to a restoration order under section [Restoration orders where transactions at an undervalue] in respect of a transaction involving assets of a scheme ("the transaction").

(2) The restoration order may in particular—

(a) require any assets of the scheme (whether money or other property) which were transferred as part of the transaction to be transferred back—

(i) to the trustees or managers of the scheme, or

(ii) where the Board of the Pension Protection Fund has assumed responsibility for the scheme, to the Board;

(b) require any property to be transferred to the trustees or managers of the scheme or, where the Board has assumed responsibility for the scheme, to the Board if it represents in any person's hands—

(i) any of the assets of the scheme which were transferred as part of the transaction, or

(ii) property derived from any such assets so transferred,

(c) require such property as the Regulator may specify in the order, in respect of any consideration for the transaction received by the trustees or managers of the scheme, to be transferred—

(i) by the trustees or managers of the scheme, or

(ii) where the Board has assumed responsibility for the scheme, by the Board, to such persons as the Regulator may specify in the order;

(d) require any person to pay, in respect of benefits received by him as a result of the transaction, such sums (not exceeding the value of the benefit received by him) as the Regulator may specify in the order—

(i) to the trustees or managers of the scheme, or

(ii) where the Board has assumed responsibility for the scheme, to the Board.

(3) A restoration order is of no effect to the extent that it prejudices any interest in property which was acquired in good faith and for value or any interest deriving from such an interest.

(4) Nothing in subsection (3) prevents a restoration order requiring a person to pay a sum of money if the person received a benefit as a result of the transaction otherwise than in good faith and for value.

(5) Where a person has acquired an interest in property from a person or has received a benefit as a result of the transaction and—

(a) he is one of the trustees or managers or appropriate persons who entered into the transaction as mentioned in subsection (6) of section [Restoration orders where transactions at an undervalue], or

(b) at the time of the acquisition or receipt—

(i) he has notice of the fact that the transaction was a transaction at an undervalue,

(ii) he is a trustee or manager, or the employer, in relation to the scheme, or

(iii) he is connected with, or an associate of, any of the persons mentioned in paragraph (a) or (b)(ii), then, unless the contrary is shown, it is to be presumed for the purposes of subsections (3) and (4) that the interest was acquired or the benefit was received otherwise than in good faith.

(6) For the purposes of this section—

(a) section 249 of the Insolvency Act 1986 (c. 45) (connected persons) applies as it applies for the purposes of any provision of the first Group of Parts of that Act,

(b) section 435 of that Act (associated persons) applies as it applies for the purposes of that Act, and

(c) section 74 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1985 (c. 66) (associated persons) applies as it applies for the purposes of that Act.

(7) For the purposes of this section "property" includes—

(a) money, goods, things in action, land and every description of property wherever situated, and

(b) obligations and every description of interest, whether present or future or vested or contingent, arising out of, or incidental to, property.

(8) References in this section to where the Board has assumed responsibility for a scheme are to where the Board has assumed responsibility for the scheme under Chapter 3 of Part 2 (pension protection).'.—[Mr. Heppell.]

New Clause 14

CONTENT AND EFFECT OF A RESTORATION ORDER

'(1) This section applies where a restoration order is made under section [Restoration orders where transactions at an undervalue] in respect of a transaction involving assets of a scheme.

(2) Where the restoration order imposes an obligation on a person to do something, the order must specify the period within which the obligation must be complied with.

(3) Where the restoration order imposes an obligation on a person ("A") to transfer or pay a sum of money to a person specified in the order ("B"), the sum is to be treated as a debt due from A to B.

(4) Where the trustees or managers of the scheme are the persons to whom the debt is due, the Regulator may on their behalf, exercise such powers as the trustees or managers have to recover the debt.

(5) But during any assessment period (within the meaning of section 119) in relation to the scheme, the rights and powers of the trustees or managers of the scheme in relation to any debt due to them by virtue of a restoration order are exercisable by the Board of the Pension Protection Fund to the exclusion of the trustees or managers and the Regulator.

(6) Where, by virtue of subsection (5), any amount is transferred or paid to the Board in respect of a debt due by virtue of a restoration order, the Board must pay the amount to the trustees or managers of the scheme.'.—[Mr. Heppell.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 15

CONTRIBUTION NOTICE WHERE FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH RESTORATION ORDER

'(1) This section applies where—

(a) a restoration order is made under section [Restoration orders where transactions at an undervalue] in respect of a transaction involving assets of a scheme ("the transaction"), and

(b) a person fails to comply with an obligation imposed on him by the order which is not an obligation to transfer or pay a sum of money.

(2) The Regulator may issue a notice to the person stating that the person is under a liability to pay the sum specified in the notice (a "contribution notice")—

(a) to the trustees or managers of the scheme, or

(b) where the Board of the Pension Protection Fund has assumed responsibility for the scheme under Chapter 3 of Part 2 (pension protection), to the Board.

(3) The sum specified by the Regulator in a contribution notice may be either the whole or a specified part of the shortfall sum in relation to the scheme.

(4) The shortfall sum in relation to the scheme is the amount which the Regulator estimates to be the amount of the decrease in the value of the assets of the scheme as a result of the transaction having been entered into.'.—[Mr. Heppell.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 16

CONTENT AND EFFECT OF A SECTION [CONTRIBUTION NOTICE WHERE FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH RESTORATION ORDER] CONTRIBUTION NOTICE

'(1) This section applies where a contribution notice is issued to a person under section [Contribution notices where failure to comply with restoration order].

(2) The contribution notice must—

(a) contain a statement of the matters which it is asserted constitute the failure to comply with the restoration order under section [Restoration orders where transactions at an undervalue] in respect of which the notice is issued, and

(b) specify the sum which the person is stated to be under a liability to pay.

(3) Where the contribution notice states that the person is under a liability to pay the sum specified in the notice to the trustees or managers of the scheme, the sum is to be treated as a debt due from the person to the trustees or managers of the scheme.

(4) In such a case, the Regulator may, on behalf of the trustees or managers of the scheme, exercise such powers as the trustees or managers have to recover the debt.

(5) But during any assessment period (within the meaning of section 119) in relation to the scheme, the rights and powers of the trustees or managers of the scheme in relation to any debt due to them by virtue of a contribution notice, are exercisable by the Board of the Pension Protection Fund to the exclusion of the trustees or managers and the Regulator.

(6) Where, by virtue of subsection (5), any amount is paid to the Board in respect of a debt due by virtue of a contribution notice, the Board must pay the amount to the trustees or managers of the scheme.

(7) Where the contribution notice states that the person is under a liability to pay the sum specified in the notice to the Board, the sum is to be treated as a debt due from the person to the Board.'.—[Mr. Heppell.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 17

DEBT DUE FROM THE EMPLOYER IN THE CASE OF MULTI-EMPLOYER SCHEMES

'After section 75 of the Pensions Act 1995 (c. 26) (deficiencies in the assets) insert—

"75A Deficiencies in the assets: multi-employer schemes

(1) Regulations may modify section 75 (deficiencies in the assets) as it applies in relation to multi-employer schemes.

(2) The regulations may in particular provide for the circumstances in which a debt is to be treated as due under section 75 from an employer in relation to a multi-employer scheme (a "multi-employer debt").

(3) Those circumstances may include circumstances other than those in which the scheme is being wound up or a relevant event occurs (within the meaning of section 75).

[Malcolm Wicks]

(4) For the purposes of regulations under this section, regulations under section 75(5) may prescribe alternative manners for determining, calculating and verifying—

(a) the liabilities and assets of the scheme to be taken into account, and

(b) their amount or value.

(5) The regulations under this section may in particular—

(a) provide for the application of each of the prescribed alternative manners under section 75(5) to depend upon whether prescribed requirements are met;

(b) provide that, where in a particular case a prescribed alternative manner under section 75(5) is applied, the Authority may in prescribed circumstances issue a direction—

(i) that any resulting multi-employer debt is to be unenforceable for such a period as the Authority may specify, and

(ii) that the amount of the debt is to be re-calculated applying a different prescribed manner under section 75(5) if prescribed requirements are met within that period.

(6) The prescribed requirements mentioned in subsection (5) may include a requirement that a prescribed arrangement, the details of which are approved in a notice issued by the Authority, is in place.

(7) The regulations may provide that the Authority may not approve the details of such an arrangement unless prescribed conditions are met.

(8) Those prescribed conditions may include a requirement that—

(a) the arrangement identifies one or more persons to whom the Authority may issue a contribution notice under the regulations, and

(b) the Authority are satisfied of prescribed matters in respect of each of those persons.

(9) For the purposes of subsection (8) a "contribution notice" is a notice stating that the person to whom it is issued is under a liability to pay the sum specified in the notice to—

(a) the trustees of the multi-employer scheme in question, or

(b) where the Board of the Pension Protection Fund has assumed responsibility for the scheme under Chapter 3 of Part 2 of the Pensions Act 2004 (pension protection), to the Board.

(10) The regulations may provide for the Authority to have power to issue a contribution notice to a person identified in an arrangement as mentioned in subsection (8) if—

(a) the arrangement ceases to be in place or the Authority consider that the arrangement is no longer appropriate, and

(b) the Authority are of the opinion that it is reasonable to impose liability on the person to pay the sum specified in the notice.

(11) Where a contribution notice is issued to a person under the regulations as mentioned in subsection (8), the sum specified in the notice is to be treated as a debt due from that person to the person to whom it is to be paid as specified in the notice.

(12) Where the regulations provide for the issuing of a contribution notice by the Authority as mentioned in subsection (8)—

(a) the regulations must—

(i) provide for how the sum specified by the Authority in a contribution notice is to be determined,

(ii) provide for the circumstances (if any) in which a person to whom a contribution notice is issued is jointly and severally liable for the debt,

(iii) provide for the matters which the notice must contain, and

(iv) provide for who may exercise the powers to recover the debt due by virtue of the contribution notice, and

(b) the regulations may apply with or without modifications some or all of the provisions of sections 42 to 46 of the Pensions Act 2004 (contribution notices where non-compliance with financial support direction) in relation to contribution notices issued under the regulations.

(13) In this section "multi-employer scheme" means a trust scheme which applies to earners in employments under different employers.

(14) This section is without prejudice to the powers conferred by—section 75(5) (power to prescribe the manner of determining, calculating and verifying assets and liabilities etc), section 75(10) (power to modify section 75 as it applies in prescribed circumstances), section 118(1)(a) (power to modify any provisions of this Part in their application to multi-employer trust schemes), and section 125(3) (power to extend for the purposes of this Part the meaning of "employer" to include former employers).".'.— [Mr. Heppell.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

Clause 2

MEMBERSHIP OF THE REGULATOR

Mr. George Osborne: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 11, leave out from 'the' to end of line 12 and insert

'Chairman and approved by the Secretary of State.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

Amendment No. 2, in page 2, line 12, at end insert—

'(7) At least one of the non-executive members of the Regulator shall be a representative of an occupational pension scheme subject to the pension protection levies under this Act.'.

Amendment No. 5, in clause 5, page 3, line 10, at end insert—

'(e) to promote occupational pension provision by minimising regulatory burdens applying to well run schemes and their sponsoring employers.'.

Amendment No. 6, in clause 5, page 3, line 10, at end insert—

'(f) in conjunction with the Pension Protection Fund Board to take all reasonable steps to maintain the cost of the levy on occupational pension schemes to the minimum compatible with the Regulator's other duties under this Act.'.

Government amendments Nos. 62 to 73.

Amendment No. 8, in clause 50, page 35, line 20, at end insert

'save that the register will be open to members of the public during normal working hours, but with the home addresses of individual scheme trustees deleted.'.

Amendment No. 9, in clause 57, page 39, line 40, at end insert

'but only to the extent that the collection of such information appears to the Regulator proportionate to the benefits to be obtained from collecting that information.'.

Government amendments Nos. 78 and 79.

Amendment No. 10, in clause 62, page 44, line 9, at end insert—

'(8) Where such an inspection is carried out under this Act, and no further action is taken by the Regulator following such inspection, the owners or occupiers of the relevant premises are entitled to claim from the Regulator the reasonable costs of such inspection.'.

Government amendments Nos. 80 to 82.

Amendment No. 11, in clause 63, page 45, line 9, at end insert—

'(7) Where such an inspection is carried out under this Act, and no further action is taken by the Regulator following such inspection, the owners or occupiers of the relevant premises are entitled to claim from the Regulator the reasonable costs of such inspection.'.

Government amendments Nos. 83 to 86.

Amendment No. 12, in clause 79, page 55, line 21, at end insert—

'(3A) Any code of practice issued by the Regulator must include an analysis of the costs and benefits of the code'.

Government amendment No. 87.

Amendment No. 13, in clause 80, page 56, line 3, at end insert

'which includes a draft analysis of the costs and benefits of the code'.

Government amendments Nos. 89 to 96.

Amendment No. 3, in schedule 1, page 204, line 2, leave out

'with the approval of the Secretary of State'.

Government amendments Nos. 134 and 135.

Mr. Osborne: Now that my shadow Secretary of State has done his star turn, it is back to the understudy.

Malcolm Wicks: A rising star.

Mr. Osborne: That is the kiss of death, as the Pensions Minister knows. I shall make sure that it does not appear on the record.

The amendments are designed to increase the independence of the new pensions regulator, and to reduce the regulatory impact on pension schemes and those employers who still provide them. Central to the background to this legislation and to our discussions in Committee has been the collapse in confidence in savings and pensions, in regard not only to the halving of the savings ratio but to the closure of final salary schemes. Indeed, in the last week or two, some further developments have taken place to set the amendments in context.

The chairman of Aviva—the owner of Norwich Union and the biggest life assurer in the country—warned in the Financial Times on Monday:

"We will have a generation of elderly people coming soon who will have a hard time to live above the poverty line. No one should be proud or pleased with that scenario."

Indeed, Aviva says that it is seeing faster rates of savings growth in many continental European markets than in the UK, because of people's reluctance to save. A report from JP Morgan Fleming last week found that the number of defined benefit schemes that had closed or been restricted to new staff had doubled in two years, and that 61 per cent. of the top 350 pension funds had closed or restricted availability to defined benefit schemes. Indeed, they are shifting to defined contribution schemes.

The reason that I have made those points is that a central criticism of the Bill is that it will increase the burden on occupational schemes. It will do so partly for good, honourable reasons such as the creation of the PPF and the levy that that will impose, but that will nevertheless create an impact in regard to some of the measures in the Bill. It is therefore incumbent on us to reduce the burden on schemes as far as possible in other areas of the Bill, so that employers are still encouraged to create final salary schemes for their employees. At the moment it is not the industry's view that the burden will be reduced. The Association of Consulting Actuaries produced a report for this debate and surveyed employers. It found that a majority of firms felt that the measures would decrease occupational pension scheme coverage. Fewer than one in 10 felt that the measures would improve coverage. Close to nine out of 10 firms said that the Bill's measures would either add to costs or make no difference. That is against the background of the Government's claim that there would be savings of £130 million from the Bill. Clearly the industry does not accept that.

Amendments Nos. 5 and 6 are an attempt to recognise a danger that most of the industry believes to be real and present. The amendments would give the pensions regulator additional and specific statutory objectives, alongside the four set out in clause 5. The objectives in the Bill deal with matters such as protecting the benefits of members and reducing the risk that they might have to fall back on the PPF. Those are good objectives and it is good that the Government have taken up the recommendation of the National Audit Office and put statutory objectives in the Bill.

We propose to add a couple of objectives, one of which—on the regulator—would be to promote occupational pension provision by minimising regulatory burdens applying to well-run schemes and their sponsoring employers. It is a broad remit for the regulator; to look not just at itself, but at the world of occupational pension provision, how to encourage it and how to stop the Government—perhaps unwittingly, perhaps not—discouraging it.

In Committee in March, the Minister said that the proposals were worthy aims but were unnecessary because the new regulator would adopt a risk-based approach. Perhaps that is what he will say today. We think that that is a little complacent and we do not see why the regulator should not have a statutory obligation to promote occupational pension provision and to minimise the regulatory burdens on well-run schemes.

Amendment No. 6 makes it an objective for the regulator, in conjunction with the PPF, to take all reasonable steps to maintain the costs of the levy on occupational pension schemes to the minimum compatible with the regulator's other duties under the Bill. We hope that the regulator will do that anyway, but we think that it would be useful to have that written into the Bill. In Committee, the Minister said that there were measures in the Bill to check the costs of the levy but, again, we felt that to be too complacent. We want to keep the regulator from running away from itself and creating a mini-empire.

[Mr. Osborne]

In the regulatory impact assessment, the Government came up with the extraordinary figure that the Bill would lead to savings of £130 million, a figure with which almost the entire industry disagrees. Given that overwhelming view, the purpose of the amendments is to give the regulator the job of monitoring costs and to see whether the Government or the industry is right. We think that it would be sensible and useful to include that in the Bill.

5.15 pm

Our other amendments are designed to ensure that the regulator's powers are kept to the minimum required for it to do the job that we all want to see it do. As currently drafted, the Bill gives the regulator extensive powers to seize documents, enter premises and interview people. I have vague recollections of an afternoon in Committee when we went through some of those powers and I made the point that Parliament should always be cautious about expanding the state's power to enter premises, interview people and seize documents. Our amendments would introduce some checks on that power.

Amendment No. 9 would deal with the broad power given to the regulator in clause 57 to "collect any information which appears to it to be relevant to the exercise of the functions" of the PPF. We would qualify that by saying that that should happen

"only to the extent that the collection of such information appears to the Regulator proportionate to the benefits to be obtained from collecting that information."

That judgment would be made only by the regulator, not by anyone else. It is difficult to see how the Minister could disagree with that sensible provision, although no doubt we will shortly hear how and why.

Under amendments Nos. 10 and 11, when the regulator carried out an inspection and no further action was taken, owners and occupiers would be entitled to claim reasonable costs from the regulator. An inspection might be very expensive and disruptive to business, and it is fair that there should be some redress and some check on the regulator's zealotry. Amendments Nos. 12 and 13 merely require that where the regulator produces a code of practice—a new power that it is being given—that "must include an analysis of the costs and benefits of the code".

Again, that would force the regulator to consider the consequences of its actions in the real world.

Other amendments would ensure that the regulator was genuinely independent and open, and gained the confidence of the public and of pension schemes. Through amendment No. 1 we are saying that as the chairman of the regulator is already appointed by the Secretary of State, it is surely permissible to allow the chairman to appoint the board of the regulator, rather than all members being appointed by the Secretary of State. The chairman should be able to choose his or her own board, although the amendment includes the perfectly reasonable proviso that the Secretary of State should approve those appointments. We must get the balance right and let the regulator have some freedom over how it wants to set up and run its operations.

Amendment No. 3 would give the regulator the power to employ staff on his or her own terms, by amending schedule 1. Amendment No. 2 would require at least one non-executive member of the regulator to be a representative of an occupational pension scheme. We think that too often, Governments—this is true of Conservative as well as Labour Governments—operate in a vacuum, particularly when they have been in power for a while and are out of touch with what is going on in the real world. This proposal would force the regulator to include someone with real first-hand experience of the impact of the regulator's action on occupational schemes.

In amendment No. 8, in a spirit of openness, we propose that the register of occupational pension schemes compiled by the regulator should be open to public scrutiny. It should not give the home addresses of the trustees, but should be an open public register, rather like the open public register of companies at Companies House. That would help with pension tracing, but as I said, it would also be useful in terms of freedom of information. The Minister said in Committee that this was a perfectly reasonable amendment. Although he was concerned about human rights, the right to privacy and so on—he sounded a bit like Donald Rumsfeld when he fell back on the human rights defence—he undertook to reflect on the strong points that I had made. That is presumably why Mr. Speaker, in his wisdom, allowed me to re-table the amendment. It will be interesting to hear what the Minister has to say.

Malcolm Wicks: A rather whimsical reference was made to the absurd notion that the Bill as a whole is a work in progress, but my speech on this group of amendments—there are many of them, including Government amendments—is indeed a work in progress. It began as an extraordinarily long speech, but in view of the time and of the other debates that Members want to have, I am in something of a quandary as to how much detail to provide. I hope that the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) in particular will bear with me if I confine myself to some key points, given that we have to get through a certain amount of business by 7 o'clock. I thank him for his reasonableness.

Amendment No. 1 seeks to move primary responsibility for appointing members of the regulator from the Secretary of State to the chairman of the regulator; moreover, it would not allow members to be staff of the regulator as well. This raises some difficult accountability issues. In order to strike the right membership balance, it is important that the Secretary of State should have this role, but he must consult the chairman of the regulator in selecting its members. We rehearsed these arguments in Committee, and I hope that the hon. Member for Tatton accepts that that remains our position.

Amendment No. 2 provides that the regulator must have a member who is a "representative of an occupational pension scheme subject to the pension protection levies".

That would impose an undesirable limitation on the flexibility provided in the Bill—a limitation designed to ensure that, instead of moving towards a more representative membership, appointments to the regulator are based purely on the skills and knowledge required, and on the relative merits of each candidate.

The new regulator will have a number of statutory objectives, which are contained in clause 5. Amendments Nos. 5 and 6 seek to add to those objectives. We have nothing against the idea of those extra objectives, but in developing the new regulator's objectives we have been mindful of the criteria set out by the Better Regulation Task Force, which suggest that regulators should be proportionate, targeted, accountable, consistent and transparent in their approach. Providing further objectives does not add very much to what we are about. The Bill gives the regulator the flexibility required to operate a risk-focused approach to regulation; that will itself minimise the regulatory burden on the well-run schemes to which the Opposition amendments refer. I therefore consider amendment No. 5 unnecessary, and I ask the hon. Member for Tatton to withdraw it.

Amendment No. 6 would oblige the regulator to work with the board of the pension protection fund to minimise the levy payable by occupational pension schemes. We want to minimise the levy, which has to be appropriate and in large part risk-based, so we are very mindful of the issues that have been raised.

Amendment No. 9 seeks to ensure that the information collected under the clause is proportionate to the benefits obtained from it. The clause already provides that information so collected must appear to the regulator to be relevant to the exercise of the functions of the PPF board, so I do not believe that the amendment is necessary.

As to the open access to information by members of the public, I should like to write to the hon. Member for Tatton. I said in Committee that it seemed a reasonable question, but on further exploration, we believe that opening up to the wider public could also open up certain risks that we are worried about—perhaps certain unscrupulous people looking at the health or ill health of certain schemes. We have concerns about that, but given the time restrictions, I would prefer to write to the hon. Gentleman. I hope that he will consider withdrawing the amendment, and I support the Government amendments.

Mr. Webb: I had not planned to intervene in this short debate and I would not have done so were it not for the fact that there are 32 Government amendments in the group. As far as I am aware—I was listening carefully—the Minister has not explained any of them.

David Cairns (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab): They are technical.

Mr. Webb: It may be, as the Parliamentary Private Secretary suggests, that they are all technical, but who knows? Clearly, the briefing material on other Government new clauses has also referred to technical amendments, but I presume that they were mainly grouped with those Government new clauses. I feel that asking the House to nod through 32 Government amendments is too much. I would be happy to give way if the Minister wanted to reassure me that, whether consequential or inconsequential, they are all completely technical amendments. It is wholly unsatisfactory to have 32 Government new clauses nodded through without the slightest explanation for the benefit of the House. I am still hoping that the Minister will put me right. [Interruption.] I can say no more. It is deeply regrettable that we have reached this position and I want to put that on the record.

Mr. Osborne: I agree entirely with what the hon. Gentleman has just said. I was expecting the Minister, after dealing with my amendments, to turn to his own, but he obviously has nothing to say on the matter. Since he has not explained what they are for, we cannot really vote for or against them.

I have listened to what the Minister had to say about my amendments and we had similar debates in Committee. As I explained, it was our intention primarily to reduce the regulatory burden on pension schemes, and we believe that the Bill will add to, rather than diminish, that burden. We felt that it would be useful as a statutory objective to have a requirement to reduce the regulatory burdens on the industry or keep them to a minimum. However, we have been round the course before. I look forward to receiving the Donald Rumsfeld-like letter about the human rights of scheme members and I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

REGULATOR'S FUNCTIONS

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): I beg to move amendment No. 181, in page 2, line 25, leave out from 'Act' to 'and' in line 26.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

Amendment No. 182, in clause 9, page 4, line 36, leave out

'or in any corresponding provision in force in Northern Ireland'.

Amendment No. 183, in clause 48, page 33, line 41, leave out sub-paragraph (iii).

Amendment No. 184, in clause 48, page 34, line 12, leave out from '(c. 49)' to end of line 17.

Amendment No. 185, in clause 67, page 47, line 13, leave out

'or any corresponding provision in force in Northern Ireland'.

Amendment No. 186, in clause 67, page 47, line 43, leave out

'or any corresponding provision in force in Northern Ireland'.

Amendment No. 187, in clause 91, page 64, line 38, leave out

'or any provisions in force in Northern Ireland corresponding to this Act'.

Government amendments Nos. 97, 98, 119 and 121.

Amendment No. 189, in clause 177, page 119, line 35, leave out

'or any corresponding provision in force in Northern Ireland'.

Amendment No. 190, in clause 177, page 120, line 6, leave out

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

'or any corresponding provision in force in Northern Ireland'.

Amendment No. 191, in clause 267, page 193, line 42, leave out paragraph (e).

Amendment No. 192, in clause 280, page 200, line 10, leave out lines 10 to 40.

Amendment No. 193, in clause 280, page 200, line 8, after 'England', insert 'Northern Ireland'.

Amendment No. 194, in clause 281, page 200, line 41, leave out Clause 281.

'and any corresponding provisions in force in Northern Ireland'.

Amendment No. 196, in schedule 1, page 206, line 32, leave out from 'function' to 'or' in line 34.

Amendment No. 197, in schedule 1, page 207, line 13, leave out

'or any corresponding provision in force in Northern Ireland'.

Amendment No. 198, in schedule 1, page 207, line 16, leave out

'or any corresponding provision in force in Northern Ireland'.

Amendment No. 199, in schedule 1, page 211, line 35, leave out from 'Act' to end of line 36.

Amendment No. 200, in schedule 1, page 211, line 44, leave out

'or any corresponding provision in force in Northern Ireland'.

Amendment No. 201, in schedule 1, page 212, line 2, leave out

'or any corresponding provision in force in Northern Ireland'.

Amendment No. 202, in schedule 4, page 220, line 12, leave out

'or any provisions in force in Northern Ireland corresponding to this Act'.

Amendment No. 203, in schedule 5, page 230, line 14, leave out

'or any provisions in force in Northern Ireland corresponding to this Act'.

New clause 32—Application to Northern Ireland—

'(1) This Act extends to Northern Ireland.

(2) The Secretary of State may by order make such modifications to this Act or other legislation as are necessary in the application of this Act to Northern Ireland.'.

Government amendment No. 165.

Mr. Barnes: The key amendment is No. 193, which would make the whole Bill apply to Northern Ireland. At the moment, only parts of the Bill apply there. To ensure that the whole Bill applies to Northern Ireland, it must be amended so that all the partial references are deleted. Amendment No. 193 would then come fully into play.

5.30 pm

Consequential amendments in another place would be required if my amendments were accepted. Provisions applicable to Northern Ireland need to be added to the Bill to take account of the region's distinctive legislative position, but that should present no great difficulty, as the Bill promises that a statutory instrument will be put before the House for that purpose.

It would be distinctly advantageous if that instrument could be introduced now and adjusted to the primary legislation. One result would be that Northern Ireland matters could be debated as they arose in connection with the rest of the Bill. Moreover, amendments appropriate to the circumstances in Northern Ireland could be proposed.

Using the Order-in-Council procedure could mean that we end up in a Committee for one and a half hours or three hours, dealing with everything in one go on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. We would then have to take it on trust, to some extent, that the secondary legislation fitted in with the Bill and applied to the circumstances in Northern Ireland.

The Northern Ireland section of the Irish Confederation of Trade Unions has a distinct interest in this Bill and wants certain matters to be pursued. Other groups of amendments contain proposals to do with information and advice for annuity purchasers, TUPE, consultation by employers and stakeholder pensions. Those are exactly the sort of matters that attract the interest of Northern Ireland trade unions, as I am sure is the case with the trade unions on the mainland that have made representations on them.

The Northern Ireland interest in the Bill was evident in the Adjournment debate at the end of the Northern Ireland Grand Committee of 29 April. It was introduced by the hon. Member for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds), who referred to a number of firms in the region. He mentioned Irish Fertiliser Industries in his constituency, TK-ECC in the constituency of the hon. Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson), and Fii Shoes in the constituency of the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble). The debate also covered cross-border provisions in respect of company pension schemes, as IFI was formed in 1987 as a joint venture between ICI and the Irish state.

I wanted these amendments to be considered in the Standing Committee that dealt with this Bill and my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan) was kind enough to move them. The Minister argued that, because social security and pensions are transferred matters under the Northern Ireland Act 1998, Northern Ireland has its own social security and pensions law. He said that such matters are normally dealt with by means of an Order in Council. I do not think that it is or ever has been inevitable that all matters to do with Northern Ireland must be dealt with by means of the Order-in-Council procedure.

When the Disability Discrimination Bill was in front of the House, I was promoting a version of the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill for which I had sponsors from four political parties in Northern Ireland. On announcement of the Second Reading of the Government's Bill, the then Minister said that Northern Ireland would be included, and it was. All the technical problems that usually meant that we had to shunt legislation off somewhere were miraculously dealt with on that occasion.

It is therefore important that we have this measure applied to Northern Ireland properly and fully. The Government should get round to applying all legislation of this type to Northern Ireland. The argument that something might happen in the meantime and we might get the Executive and the Assembly up and running so the legislation might need to be shunted off to them is inappropriate: Either the measure will be dealt with before we reach that stage and the law will apply to Northern Ireland or, if something miraculous happens, we can change the measure and transfer to the Assembly the bits that are relevant.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) (UUP): I rise primarily to speak to new clause 32 and amendment No. 194 in my name and that of my hon. Friends, but I also support the amendments tabled by the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes). If the Minister is minded to accept his amendments, I shall be happy to concur.

The issue of pensions and company pension schemes applies to Northern Ireland just as much as to the rest of the United Kingdom. There is no significant difference and nor should there be. It would be foolish if there were significant differences in commercial law in the United Kingdom. I am glad to see the Minister nodding his head. That deals with the point to which the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire referred and the point that was made in Committee. There is no good reason and no intention for the law to be different. It would be a bad thing if it were different.

The Minister should not use the excuse that because these matters are notionally devolved to a Northern Ireland Assembly that does not exist, the legislation should not extend to Northern Ireland. It is not a good argument. It would be much better if the Government looked at why these issues are devolved when there is no good reason for their devolution and it carries with it a serious risk. The risk is that the Bill makes provision for a subsequent Order in Council. There is no guarantee that that Order in Council will appear when it should, whereas if new clause 32 or the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire were accepted, the legislation would extend to Northern Ireland at the same time as it comes into operation for the rest of the United Kingdom.

In the past, Orders in Council have limped along a significant time after the legislation here. It is simply not right that the people of Northern Ireland should be deprived of the protection available to their counterparts on this side of the Irish sea. The problem should not arise. There is a serious danger that the Order in Council will not arrive in time due to the length and complexity of the legislation and the fact that the small team of legislative draftsmen in Belfast will have to make last-minute adjustments as further new clauses and amendments are introduced.

If the Minister does not accept the new clause or amendments, I want a clear assurance that steps will be taken by him and the Northern Ireland Office to ensure that the Order in Council is brought into effect at exactly the same time as the Bill and that no gaps will occur in the coverage of the legislation or the ambit of new clause 34, which we will discuss tomorrow, when we can take up the issues that the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire mentioned with regard to companies that have failed in Northern Ireland leaving workers who believed that they had a pension entitlement with little or no pension. That is an issue that we can come back to tomorrow. The issue today is to ensure that the protections that are being introduced for the benefit of people in England, Scotland and Wales apply in Northern Ireland at the same time, and that is the point on which I hope the Minister will reply. Can he give us an assurance that the provisions will apply at the same time and, if he cannot, can we extend the legislation?

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): I support the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) and concur with much of what the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) said. It is imperative that the people of Northern Ireland, especially those affected by the Bill—including the matters that will be discussed tomorrow—should have the protection it affords at the same time as the rest of the country. I shall not rehearse all the arguments that have already been made, but we have seen examples where legislation was passed for other parts of the UK, to be followed by Orders in Council in Northern Ireland where a significant time lag has occurred. For example, there is widespread support in Northern Ireland for the introduction of the legislation on antisocial behaviour orders, but some six years after their introduction in the rest of the country, the process is only just reaching a conclusion for us.

It is imperative that the Bill should apply to Northern Ireland from the start, and provision to achieve that should appear on the face of the Bill. I cannot see any real argument against that. As the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire said, the matter of workers left with pension shortfalls was considered in the Northern Ireland Grand Committee in some detail, and the provisions applying in such cases should also apply to Northern Ireland from the outset.

Mr. Pond: I share the Front Bench at the moment with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Work, who used to be a Minister in the Northern Ireland Office, and I know that she will have listened as carefully as I have to the arguments that have been made. I shall not spell out again the constitutional arrangements because I know that the right hon. and hon. Members who have spoken do not accept that because social security and pensions are transferred matters under the Northern Ireland Act 1998, that is an automatic reason to reject the amendments. Although the right hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) asked me to consider whether that is appropriate, under the current arrangements the House has no authority—

Mr. Trimble: If the Minister was going to say that the House has no authority to enact legislation, I can tell him that he is wrong. There is no exclusive jurisdiction in the Northern Ireland Assembly, which does not even exist at the moment.

Mr. Pond: I accept that point and, given the suspension of the Assembly, such matters have to be dealt with by Order in Council—[Interruption.] If I may develop the arguments, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman's patience will be rewarded, although perhaps not to the extent that he would like.

Northern Ireland issues are dealt with in different ways in various parts of the Bill and there are good reasons for that. Clause 281 sets out the detail of how the

[Mr. Pond]

Order in Council will be introduced and, of course, in the event of a return to devolved government, provisions for Northern Ireland would be a matter for the Assembly.

5.45 pm

In line with established practice in the pensions field, some of the provisions of the Bill extend directly to Northern Ireland, including, for example, those relating to the establishment of the pensions regulator, which is to operate throughout the United Kingdom. The same is true of the pension protection fund. It is also currently true of both the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority—OPRA—and the Pensions Compensation Board. Those bodies were established on a UK-wide basis, but their functions are bestowed by Westminster for Great Britain and separately by Northern Ireland legislation.

My right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office has written to Northern Ireland Members and peers and to the Speaker of the Assembly to advise that the provisions of the Bill that do not extend will be replicated in the Order in Council. That means that when Northern Ireland Members and peers consider the Bill they will do so in the knowledge that corresponding provision is to be made for Northern Ireland by Order in Council.

I accept the arguments that Members have made and their concern that there may be some delay. I shall come to those points in a moment.

With respect to the amendments before us, Government amendments Nos. 97, 98, 119 and 121 are further technical drafting amendments to ensure that the PPF and the fraud compensation fund can operate as two UK-wide funds, rather than having separate funds for Northern Ireland and Great Britain. To do otherwise would result in the board having to manage four separate funds and produce separate accounts and reports, which is neither sensible nor cost-effective. The amendments will ensure that administrative costs are kept to a minimum, thus securing value for money for the levy payer and also ensuring that protection is extended to all citizens of the United Kingdom.

Government amendment No. 165 is linked to a new clause about the pensions ombudsman and the deputy pensions ombudsman, which we debated in Committee on 22 April. It ensures that the reimbursement of expenses incurred by the deputy pensions ombudsman is dealt with in the same way as those incurred by the pensions ombudsman and ensures consistency between the provisions of UK and Northern Ireland legislation.

With respect to the other amendments tabled by hon. Members on both sides of the House, I hope that Members will accept the constitutional situation. I realise that the right hon. Member for Upper Bann does not accept it, but I can assure him that our intention is to ensure that the provisions in the Bill apply to people in Northern Ireland in the same way as they apply throughout the rest of the UK. We want to ensure that that protection is made available to people in Northern Ireland, just as it is throughout the rest of the UK.

Mr. Trimble: At the same time?

Mr. Pond: The right hon. Gentleman asks from a sedentary position for my reassurance that the intention is that the provision should happen at the same time. I can tell him that my hon. Friends in the Northern Ireland Office have confirmed that all the Bill's provisions will be enacted in parallel and to the same time scale in Northern Ireland. I think that that is the reassurance for which he and other Members are rightly asking. On the basis of the discussions with my hon. Friends in the NIO, I think that I can give that reassurance, so I hope that hon. Members will feel able to withdraw their amendments.

Mr. Barnes: I am on a hiding to nothing—not just because of what the Whips might do, but because of what might happen in a Division. Furthermore, we have only just over an hour to deal with some important amendments on TUPE, consultation by employers and stakeholder pensions. For those reasons, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

ACTUARIAL VALUATIONS AND REPORTS

Mr. George Osborne: I beg to move amendment No. 205, in page 137, line 28, after 'on', insert 'material'.

This is a relatively small amendment—in fact, it would insert one word—but it relates to an important part of the Bill. Part 3 will get rid of the minimum funding requirement and replace it with a statutory funding objective. We had a debate earlier about the funding of pensions and so on. The key requirements in part 3 are that schemes must produce a statement of funding principles and that trustees must provide an actuarial valuation of the scheme assets and the technical provisions—to use a phrase from the EU pensions directive. Trustees must provide an actuarial valuation only every three years if they provide an actuarial report in the intervening years. Indeed, such reports, as defined in the Bill, would cover developments affecting the scheme's technical provisions since the last actuarial valuation was prepared.

Amendment No. 205 would merely insert the word "material". In other words, there would be a requirement to report on material developments that affect the scheme's technical provisions. My hon. Friends and I propose that change because we want to reduce any unnecessary bureaucracy and the burdens on schemes. There is a requirement to produce an annual report as well as the three-yearly valuation only because that is a requirement of the European directive.

I understand that the Government were originally perfectly content just to require a three-yearly valuation, rather than also requiring an annual report. If they are dissatisfied with that, I understand their requirement to implement the European directive, but we should do so with as light a touch as possible and keep the requirement as least onerous as possible—to use a clumsy phrase. That is why we wish to insert the word "material". Actuarial reports would then not need to go into every dot and comma of the changes during the previous year. Of course, the reports would also therefore be cheaper to produce.

The regulatory impact assessment suggests that the annual administrative cost of maintaining scheme-specific funding—compiling annual reports and three-yearly valuations—will outweigh the cost of producing MFR valuations by £16.75 million: a considerable sum. The Government assume that that sum will be more than offset by the savings that come from schemes switching 5 per cent. of their investments from gilts to equities and that that will yield an additional rate of return of 2 per cent., or about £100 million extra for schemes. That is very dodgy accounting. What we know for certain is that a significant extra regulatory burden will be imposed on schemes as a result of that arrangement, and the industry is concerned about that as well.

I wish to mention in passing that the industry has a broader concern that when the Bill becomes law, in effect, the PPF's risk-adjusted premiums will become the de facto benchmark for schemes, replacing the MFR and outweighing the scheme-specific funding in the minds of trustees and others, but that is for another debate.

Mr. Pond: I wonder whether we are witnessing a small element of parliamentary or legislative history: hon. Members will have noticed the coincidence that we are debating amendment No. 205 to clause 205. That must be worth mentioning.

I do not think that the hon. Gentleman and I will detain the House long, as we agree in principle on the issue, but I will ask him in a few moments to withdraw the amendment—that comes as no surprise to him—because it is not necessary and would not necessarily secure the objectives that we both want to achieve.

Clause 205 requires the trustees or managers of a scheme to obtain regular valuations from the scheme actuary that compare the scheme's assets with its technical provisions. I should explain that the term "technical provisions" is used in the European pensions directive. It broadly means the amount of assets a scheme needs to hold now, on the basis of the actuarial methods and assumptions used, in order to pay its accrued pensions commitments as they fall due in the future.

Valuations are necessary to check the funding position of a scheme and to provide a basis for determining an appropriate level of contributions for the future. However, they are time consuming and expensive. The clause seeks to strike a balance between ensuring sufficiently frequent funding checks and adjustments, and minimising unnecessary administrative costs. The hon. Gentleman and I take the same position on that.

Full actuarial valuations will be required either annually, or every three years when the trustees obtain interim actuarial reports for the intervening years. The provision in clause 205 for interim reports on developments affecting the scheme's technical provisions since the last full valuation reflects a requirement of the European pensions directive. Amendment No. 205 would mean that the actuary would be required to report only on "material" developments since the last valuation—"material" being the single word that the hon. Gentleman's amendment would insert. We are with him in principle, but think that the amendment is unnecessary. Clause 205 sets out the broad framework for obtaining actuarial valuations and reports, but using the power set out in subsection (6), we intend to specify in regulations the detail of what they must contain.

We intend to consult interested parties as we develop those detailed requirements. That will allow us to work closely with the pensions industry and other interested parties to ensure that we get the details right and that the regulations are workable and effective. It will also enable us to ensure that we implement the requirements of the directive in a proportionate way that does not impose undue burdens on business.

For those reasons, and with the proviso that we shall consult on the way in which we meet the objectives that we and the hon. Gentleman share, I ask him to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Osborne: I thought that the Minister imbued the moment with more historical significance than it probably merited. The fact that it is amendment No. 205 to clause 205 is not really up there alongside the arrest of five Members by Charles I, Cromwell trying to remove the Mace or Churchill's rousing speeches. However, I suppose it is a small piece of parliamentary history.

As often happened in Committee, the Minister says that he agrees with me in principle, but he is not prepared to support me in practice. Sadly, I have become all too familiar with that, but I held out hope because he said the same about the proposed measure that he is to introduce as new clause 23. There is always the possibility that my amendment will resurface.

It is good to have on the record assurances from the Minister that the Government will attempt to keep the burden on schemes as light as possible while compliant with EU law. On the basis of those assurances, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 219

Information and advice to employees

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I beg to move amendment No. 46, in page 144, line 40, after 'employers', insert 'and annuity providers'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 47, in page 144, line 41, after 'employees' insert 'and annuity purchasers'.

No. 44, in page 145, line 12 , at end insert—

'(f) make provision about the information and advice given to employees and their spouses.'.

No. 48, in page 145, line 12 , at end insert—

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

'(f) provide that they apply to annuity providers of a prescribed description and annuity purchasers of a prescribed description.

(g) make provision as to the action to be taken by annuity providers to ensure that annuity purchasers and their spouses have signed to confirm that they have received and understood information relating to the annuity purchase.'.

No. 45, in page 145, line 19, at end insert—

'(d) the person who would be affected directly or indirectly by the provision of the information.'.

No. 49, in page 145, line 23, at end insert—

'(7) In this section "annuity provider" means any company selling annuities whether or not resident or incorporated in any part of the United Kingdom.'.

Vera Baird: The amendments seek out a positive approach from the Government to a difficult problem.

Clause 219 is concerned with the supply of clear, good-quality information so that people are fully informed when they make decisions about their retirement income. The amendments are consistent with that aim and would mean that the employers and companies selling annuities would have to ensure that those buying the annuities and their spouses had signed to indicate that they had received and understood information relating to the purchase.

The amendments drive at the difference between a single life annuity and its impact and a joint life annuity. I am well aware that everyone in the Chamber knows the difference, but I should explain that a single life annuity is paid to the individual taking it out. When that person dies, the annuity income dies too. There is no benefit to the surviving spouse. The joint life annuity, on the other hand, continues to pay as long as one member of the pensioner couple is alive. For that reason, income from joint life annuities is considerably less than single life annuities. The purpose of the amendments is to ensure that on purchase of an annuity by a married person they and their spouse are fully aware of the consequences of their decision to purchase a single rather than a joint life annuity. They are also designed to ensure that on the death of their spouse nobody faces an unexpectedly huge drop in pensioner income.

According to the Association of British Insurers, only 19 per cent. of married people have joint annuities, although it is unclear on what information their decision was based. The amendments require that when a married person purchases a single life annuity their spouse signs a form saying that they have read and understood a leaflet explaining the options. The spouse should also give their consent for their partner to purchase a single life annuity and understand the implications of that decision for their pension income should their partner die before them. If the annuity purchaser decides to buy a single life annuity and not a joint life annuity, the written consent of their spouse to buy such an annuity should be required. If they cannot obtain that consent, the default position should be that they buy a joint annuity.

I emphasise that the amendments are not meant to compel all married people to purchase a joint life liability—the decision would still be theirs. The rationale for people having a right to their spouse's savings when they do not have rights to their earnings is based on the fact that it is women who are primarily disadvantaged by the present position. Women's historical and current difficulties in building up a decent pension mean that they are disproportionately reliant on their husband's pension income. If their husband dies before them, they are reliant on any survivor benefit in their husband's pension, so it is critical that they should be aware of what is happening.

Survivor benefits are particularly important because women have less pensioner income in their own right—on average, it is 57 per cent. of men's pensioner income, and the gap has widened since the 1980s. Less than 12 per cent. of women get a full basic state pension in their own right. Men have high membership rates of pension schemes, and they purchase the majority of annuities. In addition, women are likely to outlive their husbands. Almost half the women over the age of 65 are widows, and a 65-year-old woman can expect to live three years longer than a 65-year-old man. The issue is therefore a pressing one.

I accept that for some couples a single life annuity will be the best option—for example, when both spouses have access to sufficient pension income in their own right or when the survivor is on a low income and receipt of survivor benefits will reduce the amount of means-tested benefits that they receive. That decision, however, ought to be taken jointly, so that at the outset both spouses are aware of the consequences.

As a footnote, I should add that annuities provide non-married or single-sex couples with a good opportunity to make provision for survivor benefits. One of the obvious benefits of a joint life annuity is that an individual can decide to provide survivor benefits for their dependant regardless of the relationship. Occupational schemes often exclude non-married or same-sex partners. Without legal recognition of those partnerships, as is currently the case, it would be inappropriate to enforce a signed waiver of rights, but it would be prudent none the less to ensure that the annuity buyer understands the implications of their decision.

This is an extremely important issue, and there is a good deal of consensus on it among the Fawcett Society, Age Concern and other pressure groups that have sought repeatedly to draw the problem to the Government's attention. I have no intention of pressing the amendments to a vote, but I hope for a positive response from my hon. Friend the Minister.

Mr. Webb: I should put on record, for the benefit of the whole House, the Committee's appreciation of the hon. and learned Lady's contribution in Committee, where she secured that a report be made next year on women's pensions issues. This group of amendments represents one of those issues, although obviously it relates to men as well. As she said, this set of amendments refers particularly to women, because if a person buying an annuity—typically, a man—fails to provide for his surviving spouse, it is women, typically, who lose out. In a number of forums—in the House, Westminster Hall and elsewhere—the hon. and learned

Lady has stood up for women pensioners in particular and she deserves a great deal of praise for that. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]

I support some of the amendments in the group. Amendment No. 44, which would allow regulations to be made to make provision about information and advice to employees and their spouses, seems entirely appropriate. We need more information and advice. However, I have always felt uncomfortable about the written permission referred to in amendment No. 48. I am trying to work out what it is that makes me feel uncomfortable.

Although the process that the hon. and learned Lady describes is technically gender-neutral, let us take the most common case, in which a man gets to the point where he has to buy or wants to buy an annuity. If the amendment were agreed to, he would be prohibited from buying a single life annuity without the written consent of his wife. That just does not feel right. That is not a very good argument, but it does not feel right that an individual who has saved for their own pension should be prohibited from buying with that pension the particular investment vehicle that they think is right. My worry is the power of veto. I do not have a problem with the amendments that provide for both partners to be given information. One would hope that in a normal relationship they will talk to each other, weigh things up and make a decision. The power of veto would presumably apply where relationships are not working quite as well as that.

Whether the answer is to give one partner a legal block on the other partner's ability to buy a single life annuity worries me. Let me give an example. Suppose—this may be a less typical case—that the man who wants to buy an annuity has a pension pot. That is his entire pension provision for old age, whereas his wife has a fantastic occupational pension—say, she had been a Member of Parliament or something like that. Even though all the annuity will come out of his savings and it is all he has to depend on, he still needs her written permission not to make provision for her. The hon. and learned Lady might well say, "Yes, but being a reasonable woman, she will give it", and she may do so.

Often in legislation we have the concept of what may reasonably be done. If everyone were behaving reasonably, we would not need the provision at all, because they would all talk to each other, they would have been sent the leaflets and they would make a joint decision. We need the power of veto presumably for couples whose relationship is not terribly good. Is it right in all cases to prohibit one partner who may need the money from buying the annuity that serves his—in this case, his—purposes best? Although his wife may subsequently get her very good pension, if the relationship is not terribly good, she may not share it. Obviously, the converse of all those things is true if one transposes the gender, but we are dealing with a typical case.

I think that the hon. and learned Lady would accept that there is a raft of issues to do with women's pensions that need addressing, of which this is one. There is a raft of issues even on the subject of survivors' benefits, of which this is a subset. It would be unfair to criticise the proposals as piecemeal, because we all do things piecemeal—that is all we can do when faced with legislation. We try to make the world a slightly better place where we can.

That is meant not as a criticism, but as an observation that we need a strategy for widows and other survivors that encompasses not only annuities and, hence, money purchase pensions, but occupational pensions, where in many cases there are no survivors' rights, as well as public sector pensions. Until the happy day comes when men and women have accrued enough pension in their own right and we can do away with the concept of survivors' benefits, which must be the goal of pensions policy, we must tackle this huge generational transition. I fully accept the need for a provision such as amendment No. 44, which lays down requirements on information and ensures that both partners know what is going on, but the power of veto seems one step too far.

Vera Baird: Divorce law establishes that pensions are joint assets on divorce and therefore during marriage. Pensions are analogous with other joint assets such as houses, which cannot be mortgaged without the consent of both parties. Why does the same argument not follow for pensions?

Mr. Webb: The point is fair, but one of my worries is that the position is not necessarily reciprocal, because amendment No. 44 relates only to a specific category of pension provision. In my example, the man has a defined contribution pension that must be converted into an annuity, but if the woman has a final salary pension with no survivor's rights, asymmetry would be created.

The hon. and learned Lady argues that the pot of money to buy an annuity is the couple's joint property, but on that basis their joint property should also include the woman's occupational pension. The woman would have the power of veto over the man's pension, and asymmetry would occur because the provision does not include her occupational pension; it is not holistic—the example holds for both men and women if we were to reverse the genders.

The idea is right, but the power of veto is not what we want to introduce when dealing with pensions. We want to make substantial general provision for survivors, who are predominantly women. The hon. and learned Lady was right to table amendment No. 44, and I support some other amendments in the group. I hope that the Minister reassures us that the Government have a broad strategy on survivors' benefits, and if he can do so, the hon. and learned Lady will have done us all a great service.

Mr. Pond: My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) asked for a positive response, which I can certainly give her. I add to the tribute paid to her by the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) for her vociferous arguments on the issue.

Clause 219 aims to ensure that where employers contribute little or nothing towards their employees' pensions and where levels of scheme membership are low, employees get access to the information and advice that they need to help them make an informed choice about savings for retirement. As part of that requirement, employees will receive information or advice about annuities, where it is appropriate.

[Mr. Pond]

The amendments promoted by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar work with the grain of both our agenda of informed choice and our determination to ensure justice for women in pensions matters. The amendments would considerably extend the requirements in clause 219, and would, via the Secretary of State's power to make regulations, require employers and providers of annuities to give employees, purchasers of annuities and their spouses access to information and advice about retirement planning and, in particular, annuities.

That fits with the informed choice agenda, but I ask my hon. and learned Friend to consider the practical difficulties, which we must examine in deciding whether we can take the amendment forward. The Government believe that employers have a responsibility to help their employees provide for their retirement, but to extend that responsibility to cover the spouses of employees presents considerable practical difficulties. For example, arranging presentations or one-to-one advice sessions in the workplace for employees' spouses would not be an easy task. Such a requirement would lead to additional complexity and costs that many employers, especially the smallest employers, would find difficult to bear.

In addition, providing information and advice to spouses about annuities and other pensions matters might well raise data protection issues, as well as conflict of interest issues, for providers and employers. We recognise that consumers who are considering retirement and who must purchase an annuity face an important and complex decision. That is why the Financial Services Authority has already introduced changes designed to help people choose the annuity that is best for them.

FSA rules now require providers of personal pensions to give annuity purchasers information about open market options. For example, many issue the FSA leaflet, "Your pension—it's time to choose", which explains in simple language what an annuity is, as well as the options that are available to people and how they can shop around to get a better deal. In January this year, the FSA published further guidance in its "Guide to annuities and income withdrawal", and since the spring of 2003 it has included annuities in its comparative tables to make it easier for purchasers to shop around for the best value annuity available.

Additionally, new rules introduced in this year's Finance Bill will mean that occupational money purchase schemes are required to offer members the opportunity to choose between a scheme pension and a lifetime annuity. If they choose the annuity, members will again be informed about their open market options.

The issue of annuities has been the subject of considerable consultation over the past few years, and the outcome of that consultation has fed into our pensions simplification work. In answer to the hon. Member for Northavon, we are seeking to put in place provisions that will ensure that surviving spouses have support. We are strongly committed to the concept of informed choice, and we are trying to move forward on that. We are also committed to the concept that pension provision should close the inequality that has traditionally existed between men and women. I understand that that is why the Fawcett Society, the Equal Opportunities Commission and Age Concern have supported such proposals, which, although we find them attractive in principle, involve issues of practicality that we need to resolve.

I can assure my hon. and learned Friend that we will keep the need for further annuity-specific information and advice under review and that we will continue to assess how we can move forward on this agenda. I hope that given that reassurance she will feel able to withdraw her amendment.

Vera Baird: I thank my hon. Friend for that response, which could not be called anything other than positive. Mindful of the care that the Government are taking to ensure informed choice, and cheered by their determination to use pension provision to close the inequality between men and women—a large commitment, but I was pleased to hear it—I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 33

ANNUAL MEETING

'(1) In the case of every occupational pension scheme within the terms of this Act, the trustees of the scheme shall be required to hold a meeting each year which shall be open to all members of such scheme, whether active or deferred.

(2) Regulations may make provision as to the matters to be included in the agenda for such a meeting.'.—[Mr. George Osborne.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. George Osborne: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

To echo the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb), I too congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird), who has pressed this issue hard in Committee and in Westminster Hall debates. In Committee, she was very effective in wringing a concession from the Government on the publication of a report, not least because she managed to persuade some of her fellow Back-Bench Committee members to support her, although I am not sure that they would have had sufficient numbers to win a vote.

New clause 33 is short and straightforward and would help to enhance the transparency and accountability of pension schemes and give their members a chance to find out about any problems before it was too late. It would require an annual meeting to be held at which trustees could answer questions put to them by members. One of the frustrations that Members of Parliament come across on behalf of our constituents is that people are often not kept informed about decisions that can have a profound impact on their pension and retirement. They often find it difficult to get any information out of the scheme when things are going wrong—their telephone calls are unanswered and their letters are not replied to.

The new clause would require trustees of occupational pension schemes to hold an annual meeting that is open to all active or deferred members, although they could include pensioner members if they so wished. That would create a forum that could prove pretty lively if things were going wrong, as sometimes happens in the annual general meetings of big companies when, for example, the remuneration of the chief executive has been placed under scrutiny.

If it is believed that the trustees of a scheme are paying their professional advisers or professional trustees too much, making poor investment decisions, taking risks with the funding and so on, there would at least be an annual occasion when members could turn up and put the trustees on the spot—after all, they are supposed to act on their behalf. We believe that that would help to enhance the transparency and accountability of schemes.

Mr. Pond: New clause 33 would not only require trustees automatically to hold an open meeting with members every year but it contains a power under which matters to be discussed at the meeting could be prescribed by the Government in regulations. Curiously, the new clause refers to "all members . . . whether active or deferred".

What happened to pensioner members? I shall leave that question to the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne).

Let me say straight away that good communication between schemes and members is vital. None of us would argue otherwise. However, it is overkill for the Government not only to demand that schemes have an annual open meeting, regardless of their size or maturity or the geographical location of the members, but to write the agenda for them. Can the hon. Member tell the House what such a Government-sponsored meeting would discuss and in what order?

Members of occupational schemes are free to communicate with and question scheme trustees, managers and administrators and can communicate with the regulator and the pensions ombudsman if they have a complaint. The communication of information is already required under extensive statutory powers, and notification requirements on the trustees and managers already exist.

The Government believe that those requirements are sufficient and balanced. Moreover, the trustees have an overarching duty to look after the best interests of the members, including pensioners. Obligatory meetings between trustees and members would not necessarily be practicable or produce improved communication. Some members would be unable to attend, in which case the information would still need to be communicated. A meeting might not necessarily be the best way of communicating the information that the statute required to be supplied, while some information is personal to the individual or sensitive. A meeting could not be used for members to witness trustee deliberations on, for example, an ill-health early retirement case.

When trustees' decisions are applicable to the membership generally, such as the annual funding statement or the statement of investment principles, they are required to be sent to all members or at least made available to any member who asks to see them.

We have nothing against schemes choosing to hold annual meetings, but whether they should be held and what should be discussed is a matter of choice and judgment for the relevant trustees, not the Government. That is not to say that we cannot give them some encouragement. As hon. Members know, the new pensions regulator will focus more on promoting good practice and raising standards and he will have a range of tools available, including the power to issue codes of practice.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees that there are many better ways to promote what is obviously good practice than introducing such a blunt mandatory legislative requirement to hold annual meetings. I hope that, on that basis, he will feel able to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Osborne: The Under-Secretary warmed to my proposal as his response progressed. He started by being dismissive and ended by saying that it could be included in a code of practice. There is a big difference between being sent a letter and having an opportunity to attend a meeting and put questions to trustees on the basis of received information.

Companies have annual general meetings and most pass quickly, without controversy, but when a business such as Marks and Spencer is in trouble, everyone turns up and the meeting provides a focus that enables people to question the directors. We envisaged a similar procedure, whereby most pension scheme meetings would be over quickly and would not cause a great deal of fuss or be difficult to organise. Indeed, we would not expect all members to turn up. However, when problems exist and some of the matters that the Bill tackles—such as freezing orders or schemes being put into the PPF—arise, the trustees should be required to explain themselves in public to scheme members. We think that that would be a good thing, but this is not quite the kind of issue to press to a vote. We also hope that the regulator will bear in mind these discussions when drawing up the codes of practice, and perhaps include similar provisions in them.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 35

AUDITORS' RIGHTS TO INFORMATION

'After section 41 of the Pensions Act 1995 insert—

"41A Rights to information

(1) An auditor of an occupational or personal pension scheme—

(a) has a right of access at all times to the pension scheme's books, accounts and vouchers (in whatever form they are held), and

(b) may require any of the persons mentioned in subsection (2) to provide him with such information or explanations as he thinks necessary for the performance of his duties as auditor.

(2) Those persons are—

(a) any trustee or manager of the pension scheme;

(b) any person who is otherwise involved in the administration of such a scheme;

(c) any person holding or accountable for any of the pension scheme's books, accounts or vouchers;

(d) the employer in relation to an occupational pension scheme;

[Mr. Osborne]

(e) any officer, employee or auditor of the employer in relation to an occupational pension scheme or any person holding or accountable for any books, accounts or vouchers of the employer;

(f) any professional adviser in relation to an occupational pension scheme;

(g) any person who is otherwise involved in advising the trustees or managers of an occupational or personal pension scheme in relation to the scheme;

(h) any member of the pension scheme;

(i) any person who fell within any of paragraphs (a) to (h) at a time to which the information or explanations required by the auditor relates or relate.

41B Offences relating to the provision of information to auditors

(1) If a person knowingly or recklessly makes to an auditor of an occupational or personal pension scheme a statement (oral or written) that—

(a) conveys or purports to convey any information or explanations which the auditor requires or is entitled to require, under section 41A(1)(b), and

(b) is misleading, false or deceptive in a material particular, the person is guilty of an offence and liable to imprisonment or a fine, or both.

(2) A person who fails to comply with a requirement under section 41A(1)(b) without delay is guilty of an offence and is liable to a fine.

(3) However, it is a defence for a person charged with an offence under subsection (2) to prove that it was not reasonably practicable for him to provide the required information or explanations.

(4) If a person within section 41(A)(2) is a company and fails to comply with section 41A, the company and every officer of it who is in default is guilty of an offence and liable to a fine.

(5) Nothing in this section affects any right of an auditor to apply for an injunction to enforce any of his rights under section 41A;".'.—[Mr. Webb.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss new clause 36—Internal controls—

'Regulations may provide that trustees of an occupational pension scheme must secure that the scheme has appropriate and sufficient systems of internal control.'.

Mr. Webb: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I thought that perhaps, after five and a half hours, I ought to move something. I hope that the House will accept that new clauses 35 and 36 reflect my expert parliamentary drafting, although the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales might also have had a hand in it, somewhere along the line. I was delighted to see that Members on the Conservative Front Bench had added their names to the new clauses.

Mr. George Osborne: The reason that we added our names is that we got the same letter as the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Webb: I was wondering whether the Conservatives had put their names to the new clauses knowing that they had already been tabled, or whether they got a bit of a shock when they realised that they had put their names to Liberal Democrat proposals. We will draw a veil over that, however.

The Institute of Chartered Accountants has asked us to raise a couple of important issues relating to the audit of pension funds. I should like to deal first with new clause 36, which is very brief. It attempts to mirror the provisions in the European pensions directive, as the Minister will know. Article 14 of the directive, with which the House will be familiar, states:

"The competent authorities shall require every institution located in their territories to have sound administrative accounting procedures and adequate internal control mechanisms."

A number of points have been raised today to which the Government have replied that they are keen to ensure that the Bill reflects the pensions directive as closely as possible, to ensure that the United Kingdom is complying with it. What better way to do that could there be than to take the words from article 14 and incorporate them in the Bill after clause 202? It is the purpose of new clause 36 to ensure that the Bill uses the same terminology as the pensions directive. Given that the Government have said several times today that that is precisely what they want to do, I am sure that the Minister will accept our proposal.

New clause 35 has two parts. It attempts to mirror some of the rights of company auditors, and to apply them specifically to those who audit pension schemes. There are two issues involved here. First, the Companies (Audit, Investigations and Community Enterprise) Bill will introduce rights for general auditors to obtain information from companies, and from a wider group of people involved with those companies, than is now the case, and the first part of new clause 35 would make the same provision for those who audit pension schemes. Auditors would then be able to require information from trustees, managers, administrators, advisers and others.

The second part of new clause 35, by analogy, looks at the requirement on company directors to make a statement in their report that they are not aware of any relevant information that has not been disclosed to the company auditors. Criminal penalties exist for those who knowingly or recklessly mislead auditors. Why should not those provisions apply equally to those who audit pension funds? The trustees should be under an obligation to disclose any relevant information. The penalties would apply only if the trustees had recklessly and/or knowingly failed to disclose information to the trustees. The Government would not want trustees recklessly or knowingly to fail to disclose such information, so I am sure that the Minister will want to accept new clause 35 as well.

Mr. Pond: I have to tell the House that I have not added my name to the new clauses, not because I did not get the letter that the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) mentioned but because I have certain reservations about the proposals in new clause 35 to introduce new powers and offences in relation to the rights of auditors to obtain information. As the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) has explained, the proposals mirror clauses in the Companies (Audit, Investigations and Community Enterprise) Bill, which has now finished its Committee stage in the other place.

The purpose of those clauses is to strengthen the rights of company auditors by entitling the auditor to require information and explanations from a wider group of people. It is perhaps understandable that that is being proposed here in relation to pension scheme accounts.

6.30 pm

This is a complex Bill, and I am told to say that my officials are talking to officials in the Department for Trade and Industry about the possible application in relation to pension accounts. I suppose I could say that my people are talking to their people. In particular, we need to think about how the measure would interrelate with the existing requirements that we place on the auditors of pensions schemes and the role of the pensions regulator.

Because of the slightly different nature of the relationships between employers, trustees and professional advisers, there is already a legal requirement on employers to disclose to trustees any information that they reasonably require to perform their duties. The trustees have in turn a statutory duty to disclose to their professional advisers, including auditors, such information as may reasonably be required for the performance of the advisers' duties. The trustees also have a duty to make available to their advisers all requisite books, accounts and records as may reasonably be required for the performance of the advisers' duties.

It might well be that the current statutory requirements on the scheme regarding disclosure of information to the auditor and to other professionals for their professional purposes are sufficient. I am not trying to pour cold water on the amendments, as we take the issues they address very seriously and are looking carefully at whether we need to change pensions law as well as company law.

With regard to new clause 36, article 14(1) of the European directive on the activities and supervision of institutions for occupational retirement provision requires us to ensure that every occupational pension scheme has sound administrative and accounting procedures and adequate internal control mechanisms. The effect of the new clause would be to provide a regulation-making power that we could use to require schemes to have appropriate and sufficient systems of internal control. I note that the power does not extend to prescribing what those controls should be or how the requirement could be enforced, and to that extent I am not sure how useful it would be.

There are a great number of procedures and controls in place as a result of current pensions legislation: chiefly the Pensions Act 1995 and the Pension Schemes Act 1993. For example, there are provisions relating to investment, scheme funding, production of audited accounts and annual reports, sending information to members, the appointment of professional advisers and record keeping. All of these are reinforced by a requirement on scheme professionals to "blow the whistle", a requirement that clause 59 of the Bill will extend to others involved in running the scheme.

Earlier today, we dealt with several Government amendments that arose wholly or partly from our work on the directive. The work is ongoing. We are still looking at how the existing raft of requirements fits into the obligations under article 14(1) and the extent to which further action may be necessary. I suggest that it would be premature to accept the need for additional regulations, particularly of the unspecific nature proposed by the hon. Gentleman. On that basis—and on the understanding that we take the matters seriously, but need to work out how they can be brought together practically and properly—I hope that he will withdraw the motion.

Mr. Webb: I am grateful for the Under-Secretary's constructive response. My only observation is that he said that the existing obligation is on trustees to make available the information for which they are asked; in other words, to be reactive. I am not sure that there are strong obligations on them to be proactive when they are not asked for information, and to say, "But you need to know this." That is the thrust of new clause 35. But as the Minister has indicated that his people are talking to their people and that he takes the issue seriously—and given the lateness of the hour—I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 220

REQUIREMENT FOR MEMBER-NOMINATED TRUSTEES

Mr. George Osborne: I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 145, line 31, after second 'trustees', insert

'and that not less than one third of this number shall be nominated by a recognised pensioners' association and in the case of a closed fund, the majority shall be member nominated trustees'.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 19, in page 145, line 31, leave out 'and' and insert—

'( ) that those arrangements are fair and open, and'.

No. 16, in page 145, line 33, leave out subsection (2) and insert—

'( ) "Member-nominated trustees" are trustees of a pension scheme who—

(a) are nominated as a result of a process in which at least all active and pensioner members of the scheme are eligible to participate, and

(b) are selected by a process including at least all active and pensioner members.'.

No. 17, in page 145, line 37, at end insert—

'(2A) A "recognised pensioners' association" shall be an organisation that represents at least 25 per cent. of pensioners from a particular occupational pension scheme and is duly constituted for the purpose of representing its members.'.

No. 21, in clause 221, page 146, line 39, leave out 'and' and insert—

'( ) that those arrangements are fair and open, and'.

No. 18, in clause 221, page 146, line 41, leave out subsection (2) and insert—

'(2) "Member-nominated directors" are directors of a pension scheme who—

(a) are nominated as a result of a process in which at least all active and pensioner members of the same scheme are eligible to participate and

[Madam Deputy Speaker]

(b) are selected by a process including at least all active and pensioner members.'.

Mr. Osborne: I am conscious of the fact that two Labour Members want to get on to TUPE and consultation by employers, so I will not detain the House for too long with these amendments—[Interruption.] That is provided that they do not heckle me. The amendments—[Interruption.] I am being heckled from all around now, and I have pages of notes here. The amendments are inspired by the Occupational Pensioners Alliance, which represents more than 1 million occupational pensioners, and concern points that were brought to our attention by Mr. Roger Turner of that alliance. They are designed to ensure that member-nominated trustees reflect the interests of pensioner members as well as active members.

The Minister scored a cheap point on my previous new clause because I had left out pensioner members from my proposal to hold an annual meeting, although I hope that the record will show that I said that they could be invited to that meeting. Perhaps, given that my new clause was defeated, I shall go back and look at that. However, I am more optimistic about these amendments.

Amendment No. 15 would require that of the one third of trustees required to be member-nominated, one third of those should be nominated by a recognised pensioner association. Amendment No. 17 seeks to define that as "an organisation that represents at least 25 per cent. of pensioners from a particular occupational pension scheme".

That would provide a threshold so that it was clear that the pensioner association genuinely reflected the interests of a number of pensioner members, rather than being a group that had been put together to speak for only one or two members.

It is worth repeating what the Occupational Pensioners Alliance has said on that:

"We are particularly unhappy about the proposals ... on Member Trustees" because

"the role of pensioners in the running of their schemes would be even more marginalised than it is now."

The practical upshot of the Bill will be that

"pensioners can be ignored in the nomination and election processes. There is only a duty for 'active members' to be consulted. The OPA believes strongly that representation via the Trustees is essential for good and fair scheme management and we call, in the strongest possible terms, for the Government to re-examine its position on this issue."

The amendment therefore attempts to get the Government to re-examine their position and deal with the under-representation of pensioner members.

As the legislation currently stands, a very mature scheme might have one third of its trustees—the third that were member-nominated—elected by a minority who were the active members. Or there could be a scheme whose trustees were able to choose the member-nominated trustees themselves. The inclusion of pensioner members would help to prevent that abuse, and would also, we hope, lead to a more open, transparent process.

Under amendment No. 16, member-nominated trustees would have to be nominated and selected by a process in which took part; at the moment, the requirement is only that active members are involved in the nomination. Amendment No. 18 would extend that to the process for member-nominated directors. Amendment No. 19, on governance, is not only about pensioner members, but is a broader point. It would require the whole process of choosing member-nominated trustees to be fair and open. It would simply insert three words into the Bill, but would give the courts some leverage when dealing with unfair and closed processes. Amendment No. 21 would extend that requirement to member-nominated directors.

"at least all active and pensioner members"

Trustees are ultimately the best defence against the mismanagement of pensions, and we believe that member-nominated trustees are the best defence of the interests of members. We think that those members should include pensioner members who, in many schemes, make up a significant number of the scheme's members, and that the process of choosing the member-nominated trustees should be fair and open. It is vital that pension schemes are accountable to all their members, and that all members are treated fairly.

Malcolm Wicks: As the hon. Gentleman said, there are colleagues who are hoping to introduce their amendments in due course. If the only heckle that I ever received in my career was to be a called a gentleman, I would rest content. I expect that a certain colleague of the hon. Gentleman, if facing the National Pensioners Convention in Blackpool, would not be heckled quite so politely.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if, in view of the time, I do not consider all his amendments; rather, I shall cut to the quick and concentrate on where I can be helpful. Amendments Nos. 16 to 18 are not ideal. It is far from clear that establishing such a demanding minimum as the involvement of all active and pensioner members in these processes is sustainable. However, the amendments may well be a starting point in ensuring basic equality between active and pensioner members. We want to explore whether that can be done, while keeping the essence of the new legislation in its current form. Of course, we had a useful debate on this issue in Committee.

If the hon. Gentleman is prepared to withdraw the amendment, we will certainly think further about the need to involve pensioners, as well as active members, in the processes for member-nominated trustees, with a view to tabling our own amendments on this issue in another place. I hope that those helpful remarks might encourage the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Osborne: [Interruption.] Yes, as I am advised to say by the Government Whip, that is very helpful. I am glad that the Minister is prepared to consider the case for pensioner members. [Interruption.] The Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions says that I should say "Thanks." I shall do so once I have seen the Government amendments in the other place, but I am sure that the Occupational Pensioners Alliance will be extremely grateful. I look forward to the telephone call from the Minister, and with that, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 225

REQUIREMENT FOR KNOWLEDGE AND UNDERSTANDING: CORPORATE TRUSTEES

Malcolm Wicks: I beg to move amendment No. 123, in page 150, line 14, at end insert—

'( ) In this section "company" means a company within the meaning given by section 735(1) of the Companies Act 1985 (c.6) or a company which may be wound up under Part 5 of the Insolvency Act 1986 (c.45) (unregistered companies).'.

This is a technical amendment that deals with trustees' knowledge and understanding, which is known in the Department as "familiarity with issues". The House is indeed familiar with these issues.

Amendment agreed to.

FORM OF PROTECTION

John Robertson: I beg to move amendment No. 53, in page 152, leave out lines 43 to 46 and insert

'is certified by the actuary to be broadly comparable to the occupational pension scheme referred to in section 228(1)(c).'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 54, in page 153, line 13, at end insert—

' "actuary" means the actuary appointed by the trustees of the scheme referred to in section 228(1)(c), pursuant to section 47 of the Pensions Act 1995;'.

No. 55, in page 153, line 24, at end insert

'but in the case of contributions payable by the employer shall not be less than the contributions paid by employers into the scheme referred to in section 228(1)(c) and in the case of contributions payable by members shall not be more than the contributions paid by members into the scheme referred to in section 228(1)(c).'.

John Robertson: I begin by offering some criticism of today's debate. We have spent many an hour discussing Government business, yet only 1 hour 50 minutes on amendments tabled by the Opposition and Labour Back Benchers. I know that you look after Back Benchers, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I should point out that we have not had a fair crack of the whip today.

Clause 229 implements the Government's commitment to extending the protection afforded by the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981. The original regulations were drafted in accordance with what was then understood to be the requirements of the acquired rights directive, and they excluded pensions from the requirement to carry over terms and conditions of employment.

The Government's declared objective is very much to be welcomed, but in the event the specific proposals have failed to provide adequate protection for the great majority of members of occupational pension schemes. The Government appear to have more regard for the need for business flexibility than for genuine and worthwhile protection of employees on the transfer of an undertaking.

Clause 229 specifies the pension provision that the transferee or receiving employers must make for employees in TUPE transfers where the conditions in clause 203 apply. Specifically, the employer must offer either an occupational pension scheme or a stakeholder pension scheme. Occupational pension schemes that are not on a money purchase basis—typically, final pay schemes—must satisfy either the reference scheme test for contracting-out purposes or an alternative standard to be prescribed in regulations.

In the case of the money purchase scheme, occupational scheme or stakeholder scheme, the receiving employer must make relevant contributions, which are to be defined in regulations. The explanatory notes say that that means that the regulations will specify that the receiving employer must match the employee's contributions up to a maximum of 6 per cent.

Clause 229 also allows for variation by agreement between the transferee employer and the employee of a contractual term that imposes the requirements. There are many problems for defined benefit scheme members and for money purchase scheme members. I would like to provide much more detail, but I appreciate that other hon. Members want to raise other matters. TUPE is, however, very important and the amendments propose an alternative approach.

The Government's approach is fundamentally flawed, in my opinion, in trying to set a common standard that all receiving employers have to meet, while also trying to avoid placing a burden on some employers. The two standards have been set at levels that mean, inevitably, that the majority of occupational pension scheme members will lose out. What is needed, instead, is a simple requirement that the receiving employer should provide benefits that are broadly compatible with, or of broadly equal value to, the benefits provided by the original scheme. It may be argued that the like-for-like requirement is impracticable, but the public sector has successfully operated requirements of a broadly compatible sort for a number of years, and there seems no good reason why the same should not be extended to the private sector.

An important aspect of the system operated in the public sector is set out in the Cabinet Office document, "Staff Transfers in the Public Sector—Statement of Practice". For any anoraks, there is a website www.cabinet-office.gov.uk/civilservice/2000/tupe/stafftransfers.pdf and, in case anyone did not get that, it will be in Hansard tomorrow: buy your copy at the local Vote Office. A comparison is made of benefits and member contributions and it is made clear that that is the correct approach. In my opinion, though, it is ignored in the Bill. I ask the Minister to reflect on the amendments and to understand that if something is good enough for the civil service, it is good enough for the private service.

Mr. Tynan: I want to be brief in order to leave the Minister plenty of time to answer on the important issue of TUPE. We moved a probing amendment in Committee, but I want to go back to 1981 when the transfer of undertakings provisions took effect. One of the major concerns then was the fact that pensions were not included. It came to fruition when we had private finance initiative projects, and the contracting-out of cleaning services, particularly for hospitals, meant that the poorest paid people had lost their pension scheme. Considerable pressure was exerted by Unison at the time to try to reach some accord on how to move forward and cure that anomaly. To the Government's credit, they recognised the need to protect the poorest paid people in the NHS. The public sector, which we are talking about now, had the poorest people. Fair enough. As my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson) said, if something is good enough for the public sector, why should it not apply to the private sector? As I said, we recognised that the lowest paid workers were suffering the most. Under those circumstances, why should the same not apply to the private sector?

The poorest people often have major problems with their pension provision, although some problems were resolved when the TUPE regulations applicable to private sector employees were transferred to employees in the public sector in the early 1990s. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions will look at the question of TUPE very closely. He gave some commitments in Standing Committee, but it is important for us to get on the record the Government's position on this matter. I hope that the amendment receives a positive response.

Malcolm Wicks: Clauses 228 and 229 introduce a minimum level of pension protection where a business transfer occurs and the so-called TUPE regulations apply. This new requirement means that, for the first time, transferee employers will have to offer transferred employees a minimum standard of pension provision, where employees had access to an occupational pension scheme with employer contributions pre-transfer.

I understand the argument made by my two hon. Friends the Members for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson) and for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan), but I hope that the considerable progress being made with the Bill will be acknowledged.

Clause 229 sets out the types of pension provision that a transferee employer will be contractually bound to make available to transferred employees when a relevant transfer takes place. These are an occupational salary-related scheme of a requisite standard, an occupational money purchase pension scheme, or a stakeholder pension scheme. Where the transferee employer opts to provide a salary-related occupational pension, it must meet either the reference scheme test or a similar alternative standard that will be prescribed in regulations. Where the new employer opts to provide a money purchase occupational pension scheme or a stakeholder pension, he will be required to match employees' contributions up to 6 per cent, although either party may contribute more at their own discretion.

Amendments Nos. 53 and 54 would require that, rather than meeting those statutory standards, the scheme offered should be broadly comparable to the previous employer's scheme. The comparability would have to be certified by the actuary of the previous scheme, regardless of whether or not that scheme was salary related. Amendment No. 55 stipulates that the contribution to be paid by the new employer should be no less than that paid by the old employer, and that contributions payable by the employee should be no more than were paid into the old scheme.

First, I should like to deal with the question of comparing different types of scheme. Extensive consultation took place on our proposals, and on earlier proposals from the Department of Trade and Industry, for pension provision following a business transfer. Those consultations helped to identify the genuine obstacles in comparing different pension schemes. There are real difficulties for actuaries in attempting comparisons of contribution levels in money purchase and salary-related occupational pension schemes.

In salary-related schemes, the level of employer contributions at any point in time will depend on a number of factors, including the funding position and the age profile of the overall membership. In short, there is no straightforward read-across from what an employer could contribute to a salary-related scheme to what an employer should contribute to a money purchase, occupational or stakeholder scheme.

Our approach—a simple, stand-alone requirement on all employers—means that there is no incentive on the transferor employer to reduce the level of pension contributions to make the business more attractive to potential purchasers.

A requirement to provide a broadly comparable scheme of the same type could prevent a transferee employer from placing transferred employees into the existing pension scheme, and oblige that employer to run two or more schemes in parallel. That is precisely the sort of extra, multiple requirement that encourages employers to pull out of pension provision altogether. We should remember that the new legislation to protect employees involved in business transfers cannot, and is not intended to, prevent the employer from making changes to the pension scheme in the future.

In Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Brennan) asked why we do not provide full protection for the value of the pension scheme after a transfer. The reason is that we want to avoid an approach that could require transferee employers to have to set up and fund an occupational final salary scheme from scratch. That could act to prevent employers from buying businesses, or parts of businesses, where the employees had occupational pension provision.

That would not be in anyone's interest: transfers can often save businesses, where the alternative for employees is redundancy. Nor is it sensible to increase costs so much that employers are encouraged to withdraw pension provision. The approach in the clause sets a simple minimum standard and allows employers to determine whether and how they go beyond the statutory standard, depending on their needs and priorities. For the first time, it will ensure that employees benefit from a statutory level of pension protection after transfer and stop transfers being used as an excuse to scrap pension contributions.

I appreciate the arguments that my colleagues have made. We need to keep the new arrangements under review, and I promise that the Government will do that. This is a social advance and I hope that that will be recognised. Therefore, I ask my hon. Friend to consider withdrawing his amendment.

John Robertson: I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for his answers. While he may not have convinced me completely, he has convinced me enough not to cause him any undue hassle at this time of night. However, I hope that those in the other place are taking note of what has been said here today. There is much more mileage in this argument. TUPE is far more important than the 10 or 15 minutes that we have given it in this Report stage, and I hope that those in the other place have listened to what has been said and will take on board the points that I have made. With that, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

CONSULTATION BY EMPLOYERS: OCCUPATIONAL PENSION SCHEMES

John Robertson: I beg to move amendment No. 51, in page 153, line 44, at end insert—

'(3A) Where an employer has failed to comply with the requirements of this section, a complaint may be presented to an employment tribunal on that ground—

(a) in the case of failure relating to representatives of a trade union, by the trade union,

(b) in any other case, by any of his employees who are affected employees.

(3B) Where the tribunal finds a complaint under subsection (3A) above well-founded it shall make a declaration to that effect and may order the employer to pay appropriate compensation to such descriptions of affected employees as may be specified in the award.

(3C) In this section—

(a) "appropriate compensation" means such sum not exceeding thirteen weeks' pay for the employee in question as the tribunal considers just and equitable having regard to the seriousness of the failure of the employer to comply with his duty.

(b) "affected employee" means an employee who is a member of the scheme or who would have been eligible to become a member if a prescribed decision within the meaning of subsection (1) had not taken effect.

(3D) Chapter 2 of Part 14 of the Employment Rights Act 1996 shall apply for calculating the amount of a week's pay for any employee for the purposes of subsection (3C) above.'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 52, in clause 231, page 154, line 7, at end insert

(c) proposes to reduce the contributions which the employer pays to the personal pension scheme,'.

No. 42, in clause 232, page 154, line 25, after 'ballots', insert

'where it is necessary for the purpose of selecting employee representatives'.

No. 50, in clause 232, page 154, line 44, at end insert—

'(4A) Consultation regulations shall require that—

(a) the employer consults any recognised trade unions with a view to seeking their agreement to the measures to be taken;

(b) in the course of those consultations the employer shall—

(i) consider any representations made by the recognised trade unions; and

(ii) reply to those representations and, if he rejects any of those representations, state his reasons.

(4B) For the purposes of subsection (4A) above a recognised trade union is an independent trade union recognised to any extent for the purpose of collective bargaining in relation to the employees concerned.'.

John Robertson: I will try to make this short. In fact, I will not try; given the time, it will be very short. I thank the trade union Amicus for all the help and support that is has given me and my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) and many other Labour Members. I think that we can safely say that, by the end of this week, we will have left pensions in a much better state—some might say that the situation could not have got worse.

The purpose of amendment No. 51 is to suggest that a clear sanction should be specified and that there should be a ready route through which complaints can be brought. It is important that those who do not consult in a proper manner are brought to book and complaints taken care of properly. In Committee, I discussed for at least 10 minutes what the word "consultation" meant. We should bring people to book for not consulting properly and the amendment would take care of that.

Amendment No. 52 specifies that, where an employer reduces a contribution to a personal pension, the consultation arrangements will apply. Why the arrangements would not apply, I cannot imagine. It seems sensible to me that whoever has a pension should be told if the contributions are to be reduced. To reduce the contributions without telling someone, or at least seeking their opinion, strikes me as bizarre.

Amendment No. 50 is intended to ensure that consultations are meaningful and undertaken with a view to seeking agreement. It would oblige the employer not just to consider but to respond to representations before a decision is taken. That goes along with the previous amendment. It is important not only that people have the opportunity to make representations but that they receive an answer.

Malcolm Wicks: The key principle that we intend to enshrine in regulation is that, where trade unions are recognised by an employer, the only circumstance in which an employer will be able to consult on pension changes using another mechanism will be where employees have specifically agreed an approved alternative approach to information and consultation.

The role of trade unions is crucial. We take the issue seriously and we will consult trade unions and others in developing these ideas and drawing up regulations. It is right that workers and their trade unions are consulted about this vital element of the industrial package. Given the spirit of my remarks, I ask my hon. Friend to withdraw his amendment—

It being 7 o'clock, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to Order [this day], put forthwith the Questions necessary for the disposal of proceedings to be concluded at that hour.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 233

MODIFICATION OF SUBSISTING RIGHTS

Amendment made: No. 124, in page 157, line 17, leave out 'or' and insert—

Bill, as amended in the Standing Committee, to be further considered tomorrow.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Ordered,

That the Architects (Professional Conduct Committee) Amendment Order 2004 (S.I., 2004, No. 655), dated 10th March 2004, be referred to a Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation.—[Margaret Moran.]

John Redman

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Margaret Moran.]

7.1 pm

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): I am grateful for the opportunity to introduce this Adjournment debate, which concerns one individual and an extraordinary injustice in the benefits system. I shall briefly summarise the problem and talk the Minister through it. He knows some of the background because we have had correspondence on the matter.

The problem relates to a young man of 24 who suffers from a variety of complex invalidities. He has had to be cared for at home by his parents for most of his life, but was transferred to a residential care home at the age of 20. Up to that time, his parents had saved the state between £1 million and £2 million in care costs as a result of their sacrifice. In the process of transfer to a care home, various charges were unwittingly incurred, without the knowledge of the parents and without them benefiting in any way. Despite attempts to persuade the Department for Work and Pensions to withdraw the claim for the overpayments, the family, who are in considerable financial hardship, are left with a debt of just over £3,000. The problem illustrates some wider policy issues and legal problems connected with the overpayment of benefits, but I wish to focus primarily on that individual, his family and their problems.

I shall give the House the background to the case and describe John's difficulties. He is now 24 and he has a variety of conditions. He is autistic, he has severe learning difficulties and, in addition, he has Lennox Gestalt syndrome, which means that he has epileptic fits two to three times a day, on average. The fits sometimes occur in the middle of the night and if he were left unattended, he would die. His carers have to be constantly in attendance. In addition, he cannot swallow, so his food has to be liquidised and fed to him by spoon. He has severe toileting problems, so his carers constantly have to change him and deal with his personal hygiene. It is a 24-hour job.

For the first 18 years of John's life, he was cared for by his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Redman, who received very little help from the local council. Although this debate is primarily concerned with the role of the DWP, much fault lies with the local council. The council responded only slowly and belatedly to the family's needs.

After 18 years, the family received limited respite care of about one week a month. In 2000, when John was 20, he was admitted to a residential home, the Roy Kinnear home in my constituency. The cost, which was negotiated between the Department for Work and Pensions and the local providers—the health service and the council—was about £95,000 a year. That gives some indication of the costs to the family and the sacrifice that they made to care for John during his young adult life.

The residential home proved highly unsatisfactory. Complaints were made and are being investigated. The family had to withdraw John from the home because a critical situation arose. The liquidising machine broke down and the home's management refused to replace it, so John could not eat and was in danger. His family withdrew him and he is now back at home. His parents are once again shouldering the full costs of his care, which, as I indicated, were estimated at about £95,000 a year.

During this long and arduous time, John's parents have not only suffered enormous physical exhaustion and emotional pressures, but have made a considerable financial sacrifice. As Mrs. Redman was unable to cope, her husband retired early so they have sacrificed much of their pension entitlement and have only small savings. That is the context in which the family now live.

I turn to the financial problem that is the source of the difficulty with the DWP. For most of his life, John was cared for at home and received help from the Department through disability living allowance. The complications arose when he went to the care home. The move was managed by the local social services department working in partnership with the local health service and negotiated with the DWP. The transaction was complex and the process was managed by the local statutory services. At no stage were John's parents told that the funding arrangements materially affected them and that they had a legal obligation to notify the DWP. They were never told about that, which is why the difficulties arose.

Apart from those difficulties, the relationships in such cases are inherently extremely complex, as the Minister knows, and would defeat even a person of considerable financial sophistication. To put the matter simply, under the arrangements in the care home, the family continued to derive some limited DLA benefits, notably the mobility component—a limited allowance of £17.50 a week. However, to complicate things, in addition to the statutory payments made to the home, the family were required to make, from the payments they received, a further limited contribution. Payments were going in and out of their bank account and it was very difficult for them to keep track.

Any discretionary income that the family received was entirely spent on John's welfare. Conditions in the home were not ideal and the family were often called in two or three times a day to help him. They frequently had to buy new clothing to replace soiled clothes. They had to give John special health supplements. Any additional benefit that the family derived was spent entirely on John.

The difficulty with the Department arose due to a complex mixture of simultaneous overpayment and underpayment of benefit. The family were underpaid residential care allowance. They had never heard of that benefit but they were entitled to it and after a year of misunderstandings found out that there had been substantial underpayment. However, the regulations governing residential care allowance meant that the family was unable to make a claim for back-payment. At the same time, because they had not notified the Department of John's situation, they had been overpaid disability living allowance, which the Department tried to claim back. So they lost one payment because they were unable to claim retrospectively, while another payment that they had received was claimed back by the Department.

The net position after a year was that the family had accumulated a liability of about £6,700, which the Department sought back from them. Fortunately, the local council accepted part liability. In other words, it had been imposing charges on the assumption that the family had been receiving residential care allowance, which they had not, and the council agree to settle that component of the bill. The family were left with a bill of £3,122, which is still at issue. I want to emphasise several key points about why it is utterly and totally unreasonable under any common-sense system that the family should be left with that bill.

The family were completely unaware of the complexities of the arrangement. They draw absolutely no benefit from it. Any income was entirely spent on John's welfare. They suffered a net loss as a result of the move to the residential home because of the underpayment of benefit to them. They were out of pocket; they were not in surplus, as a result of the benefit changes. Of course, they have now taken their son out of the residential care home. Since removing him from the home last November, they have already probably saved the state £9,000 or more—three times the amount that the Department for Work and Pensions feels that it is owed.

In my concluding remarks, I wish to consider what remedies are available. The family have been helped by the citizens advice bureau and by me, to some extent. They were advised that they could pursue the problem through one of two channels. They could make a complaint against the local council. There is still a possibility that a complaint might lead to the local government ombudsman and to some form of compensation, but the family have been advised that the chances of success are not high. The complaint against the council was essentially that it did not provide sufficiently comprehensive advice. That would not normally be regarded as maladministration. None the less, they can consider that course of action.

The family was advised from the outset that by far the most promising and appropriate channel was to pursue the overpayment issue through the Department for Work and Pensions. The matter went to a tribunal, where they lost. I was then requested to write to the Minister. It is important to summarise what the position is with regard to overpayment. I shall quote from a parliamentary answer given back in 1999, by the Minister's colleague, now the Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services, in which he summarised succinctly the precise position:

> "In individual cases of overpayments the Secretary of State can apply his discretion in relation to the recovery of the overpayment. This discretion is exercised only where recovery would cause extreme hardship. Guidance is contained in "Government Accounting", a copy of which is held in the House of Commons Library."—[Official Report, 16 March 1999; Vol. 327, c. 624.]

That document defines and defends the concept of hardship thus:

> "Repayment may be waived if it would cause hardship, but hardship must not be confused with inconvenience. To be required to pay back money to which there was no entitlement does not in itself represent hardship, especially if the overpayment was discovered quickly. The test of hardship should therefore be real. To be acceptable, a plea of hardship should be supported by reasonable evidence that the recovery action proposed by the department would be detrimental to the welfare of the debtor or the debtor's family."

The citizens advice bureau and I have placed sufficient evidence with the Department and it is certainly available from the local council to demonstrate that real hardship is involved in this case. The family have accepted enormous financial as well as other sacrifices. In that spirit, I wrote to one of the Minister's colleagues in January and the Minister replied very quickly. He indicated that he could not accept such a request, but he said:

"Due consideration will be given to Mr and Mrs Redman's financial circumstances before a suitable method and rate of recovery is decided."

I want to ask him whether he will reconsider the question of waiving the payment, given the circumstances, which are extraordinary. I have never previously come across a case in which a carer family have taken on such an enormous burden on behalf of society. At the minimum, we are talking about a saving of £1 million for the taxpayer, but the family are now being pursued for a very small debt to the state—large to them—when, under no circumstances, can they possibly have been said to have benefited. They are in hardship.

As a tailpiece, I want to say that since the family returned to their home with John where they are caring for him with all the difficulties surrounding that and limited respite care, they have had great difficulty in getting their disability living allowance re-established. They believe—certainly the citizens advice bureau believes this—that the Department for Work and Pensions has been deliberately dragging its feet over the benefit because of the difficulties that they were having with the overpayment. That may be unfair and completely untrue, but that was the perception. It is a product of the ill-feeling that the case has generated. I hope that it is not true.

I am concerned with the bigger issue. I recognise that the Minister has a duty with regard to public funds, but I ask him to exercise the limited discretion that he has to waive the overpayment.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): I congratulate the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on securing this debate and on his diligence in pursuing this issue on behalf of his constituents. I am grateful to have the opportunity to explain the basis both of entitlement to disability living allowance for disabled people who move into care homes, and of recovery of benefit when overpayments occur. I assure him that the Department attributes the utmost importance to ensuring that people receive the amount of benefit to which they are entitled. This case provides a stark illustration of why we need to do so.

Towards the end of his remarks, the hon. Gentleman asked me to reconsider waiving recovery of the outstanding balance, and I want to make it clear at the outset that I have done so. We do not intend to make further recovery of that outstanding balance from Mrs. Redman. As he rightly points out, this is due to the exceptional circumstances of the case. I shall say something more about that in a few moments.

I further reassure the hon. Gentleman, the family and the citizens advice bureau that there has been no dragging of feet on this issue. I note that he does not put his name to that suggestion, but I would not wish the family to consider it to be the case.

It is a fundamental principle that those in receipt of benefit or their appointed representatives ensure that they continue to meet the entitlement criteria for that benefit and report any changes in their circumstances to the appropriate benefit-paying body. Any overpayment of benefit that arises owing to those criteria changing and that change not being reported in a timely way will normally be recovered. We have a duty to the taxpayer to ensure that overpaid benefit is recovered.

In pursuing such recovery, the Department seeks to do so as quickly and effectively as possible but, as the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, without causing undue hardship. When representations are made that recovery will cause hardship, regard is had to an individual's circumstances in determining the rate and method of recovery. Again, as he acknowledged, that was the tone in which I wrote to him in January on this issue.

There are certain exceptional circumstances in which recovery of an overpayment may not be pursued. That would normally be when recovery would be seriously detrimental to the health or welfare of the individual or a member of their household. Each case is looked at on its individual merits. In this case, the initial decision not to waive recovery was based on the fact that there was sufficient capital available to enable recovery without apparently causing undue hardship. On reflection, it is accepted—and I accept this—that due regard was not had to the exceptional circumstances of the case.

Those circumstances involve, in particular, the great personal sacrifice that Mr. and Mrs. Redman have made to support their son over many years; the fact that the overpayment arose in good faith; the fact that they have not personally gained financially; and the fact that they appear not to have been correctly advised by those bodies supporting them. If the correct course had been taken and the appropriate benefit claimed, the loss to public funds would have been significantly reduced. I have therefore agreed that the Department will not seek recovery of any of the remaining overpaid benefits. Mrs. Redman has made a part-repayment, in view of which I will arrange for officials to consider a compensation payment. I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees that this is quite an exceptional case and is worthy of such an exceptional decision.

In more general terms, disability living allowance is a tax-free, non-contributory and non-means-tested benefit that is paid as a contribution towards the extra costs faced by severely disabled people as a result of their disabilities. Entitlement to the allowance is linked not to specific disabling conditions but to the level of someone's need for help with personal care or with getting around. It therefore has a care component and a mobility component. In broad terms, entitlement to the care component depends on the effect that physical and/or mental disability has on someone's need for personal care from someone else, while entitlement to the higher rate mobility component depends on whether physical disability means that they are unable, or virtually unable, to walk. Entitlement to the lower rate mobility component depends on whether a physically and/or mentally disabled person needs supervision or guidance from another person when walking outdoors on unfamiliar routes.

When someone goes into a care home, as in John's case, their needs for personal care should be met in the home. The cost of meeting those needs is included in the cost of their place in the home. Local authorities, rather than the Department for Work and Pensions, are responsible for providing help with those costs. That makes sense, because local authority social services departments provide care home accommodation and have the necessary skills to arrange suitable placements in private care homes. When local authorities assess how much help a person needs with their care home costs, they ensure that they are left with a standard amount for their personal expenditure. To pay disability living allowance for someone's personal care needs when account has already been taken of those needs would amount to duplicate provision. Payment of the care component therefore stops after 28 days' residence in a care home.

Different considerations apply to the mobility component of disability living allowance. Care homes are not funded to provide for residents' mobility needs, so payment of that component is not affected by residence in a care home, and local authorities cannot take account of it when assessing someone's need for help with the cost of their placement. Disability living allowance has the advantage of providing flexible help for disabled people, whose needs can vary greatly and change significantly over time. There must therefore be ongoing discussion of who should be entitled to it. The rules have changed over the years to reflect the discussion, but the discussion itself will continue. That dynamic process helps to ensure that disability living allowance can continue to provide relevant help for disabled people who face costs over and above those of their normal daily living needs, for which other benefits are available. At the same time, it will always produce differences of opinion about the qualifying criteria for receipt of the benefit.

In conclusion, I offer my apologies for any distress caused to Mr. and Mrs. Redman and, indeed, John. They will accept that when an overpayment is made, even when it is the result of an honest error by the person receiving payment, we have a responsibility to recover it. In this case, however, there were exceptional circumstances, which I am pleased we can now acknowledge. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on bringing the case to the attention of the House, and I hope that he is satisfied that we have reached a suitable conclusion for the family and especially for John.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-three minutes past Seven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

OFFICE OF THE DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

The Deputy Prime Minister was asked—

Regional Assemblies

1. Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): If he will make a statement on the estimated costs of regional assemblies. [173979]

The Minister for Local and Regional Government (Mr. Nick Raynsford): An elected regional assembly will cost around £30 million to set up, including the costs of referendums and elections, and around £25 million a year to run.

Mr. Bacon: Given that the Welsh Assembly cost £55 million—four times more than planned—and that the Scottish Parliament cost £430 million, which was 10 times more than planned, is it not likely that the proposed regional assemblies will turn out to be simply another way of squandering money that people would prefer to be spent on teachers and nurses?

Mr. Raynsford: No, it is not. The first point on which the hon. Gentleman might reflect is that our proposals for elected regional assemblies are for small, streamlined bodies, which will focus on delivering services and developing strategic approaches to policy that the Government and quangos currently discharge. That will restore democratic control to the regions and add value. Secondly, he knows that, next week, when the boundary committee presents its proposals for local government reorganisation, there will be considerable scope for reducing bureaucracy and making savings through cutting out unnecessary tiers of government.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the figures that he gave represent an excellent deal for democracy? He is a much more patient and tolerant soul than me, but does he not occasionally get irritated at the ridiculous scaremongering from Conservative Members, who have neither the vision nor the enterprise to recognise the important moment for regional devolution that is almost upon us?

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend makes a valid point and some kind remarks. I am a tolerant soul, but I have witnessed the Conservative party opposing devolution in Scotland and subsequently changing its mind; opposing devolution in Wales and then changing its mind; and opposing devolution in London and changing its mind. I look forward to Conservative Members changing their minds and recognising that it is right to bring democracy to the English regions.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): The no campaign in the north-west is a cross-party campaign that includes many Labour Members of Parliament. Will the Minister allow its representatives to speak at Government-sponsored public meetings that he and the Deputy Prime Minister attend so that the public can hear both sides of the argument? Does he not want to share a platform with Labour Members of Parliament?

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Gentleman knows that there is provision for funding the yes and no campaigns at a later stage in the process so that they can present their case to the electorate. That is right and proper. However, the Government are currently exercising their responsibility to ensure that the public are properly informed. Last night, I was speaking in north Lincolnshire at a hearing that was welcomed by people who want information and welcomed the presence of a Minister to answer questions factually and informatively. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman objects to that.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend revert to the theme of cost? Will he calculate or speculate on the money forgone by the northern regions when successive Tory Governments underfunded health, industrial investment and education there to prop up their electoral base in the south of England?

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend makes an important point because our purpose in extending democracy to the regions is to allow each region to maximise its potential strengths and economic development opportunity. It is sad that, in the past 80 or so years, there has been a disparity in the economic development rates of different parts of this country, with the northern regions failing on the whole to share the high growth rates that some southern regions achieved. We are working hard, through the creation of regional development agencies, the Lyons review and other measures, to redress that balance. The Conservative party shows no concern for assisting some of the more deprived parts of our country to improve their economic performance.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden) (Con): I refute that last claim. The Minister may recall that the 1997 Labour manifesto pledged that regional assemblies

"would require . . . confirmation by independent auditors that no additional public expenditure overall would be involved."

Does he stand by that manifesto pledge?

Mr. Raynsford: We have made it absolutely clear—[Interruption.] Yes, the hon. Lady should pay attention to this. We have made it absolutely clear that we will publish the full costs. Those costs will include the potential savings from local government reorganisation, which we are not able to publish until we have the proposals from the boundary committee. The committee will present to us its estimates of the best options for wholly unitary local government in those parts of the three northern regions that currently have two tiers of local government. Until we have those estimates, we cannot produce full costings, but I assure the hon. Lady that, as and when we have them, we will produce those costings. I suspect that she will be surprised when she sees the scope that exists for making savings by cutting out unnecessary tiers of government.

Mrs. Spelman: The fact is that the vast cost of these regional assemblies will end up having to be met by council tax. The Minister has clearly not seen the latest research from Cambridge university showing that abolishing counties or district councils will add £110 to the council tax bill of every resident. Has he not heard the pain expressed up and down the country about the level to which the council tax has risen under this Labour Government?

Mr. Raynsford: I have two points to make to the hon. Lady. The first is that the Government have taken effective action against excessive council tax increases. If Conservative councils had been as successful as Labour councils in keeping their council tax levels down, there would be a lower average rate of council tax this year.

Secondly, on local government reorganisation, the hon. Lady is living in a time warp. She is recalling the figures from the period when her party was in power, and when local government reorganisation led to substantial additional costs because of the bungled way in which the Banham review approached the matter. The hon. Lady should not anticipate the conclusions of the boundary committee. Any sensible, serious analysis will depend on figures that have yet to be produced, so I would say to her and to the academics whom she is quoting that theoretical arguments are all very well, but they should wait to see the actual recommendations. We shall then be able to do proper costings, and we shall do so.

Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): Did my right hon. Friend note the very encouraging poll in Newcastle's The Journal at the beginning of this week, which showed that those intending to vote yes in the referendum greatly outnumbered those intending to vote no? Did he also notice, however, that the support would be even greater if the Government were to strengthen the role of the assemblies in the draft powers Bill? Will he take that message to heart?

Mr. Raynsford: My right hon. Friend has been a doughty campaigner for regional devolution for many years, and she will have been heartened, as all those who care about the issue will be, to see the evidence of growing support in all the northern regions and, obviously, in the north-east. In the course of the hearings that have been held over recent months, we have discussed the powers set out in the White Paper and any possible changes that might be made to them. We shall obviously bear my right hon. Friend's points in mind before final conclusions are reached and we publish a draft Bill, which we intend to do later this summer.

New Deal for Communities

2. Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): If he will make a statement on the new deal for communities. [173980]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Yvette Cooper): The new deal for communities programme supports 39 severely deprived areas with investment of around £2 billion over 10 years. It has very high levels of community involvement, and the NDCs have reported crime falling and employment and education levels improving faster than the national average.

Mr. Williams: The Minister's assessment contradicts the evaluation of her own Department, which found that "community partnerships are stuck in cycles of blame and remain in a continual state of crisis", and that expenditure on administration was in excess of 10 per cent. of total expenditure. When will the Minister get a grip on the scheme and ensure that we get value for money and that the quality of life experienced by people in our most deprived communities is improved?

Yvette Cooper: The hon. Gentleman is talking complete nonsense. The evaluation published by the Department included Professor Lawless's assessment that the NDCs are making progress, and "should be commended"

as they

"are beginning to deliver a wide range of projects to improve people's quality of life."

I am very sorry that the Liberal Democrats want to kick in the teeth the 50,000 people who are involved locally in the new deal for communities and who are making a real difference to their communities and areas.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton) (Lab): When considering the new deal for communities, will my hon. Friend take into consideration those communities that do not match the formula for urban renewal, but which could qualify for urban regeneration? There are urban areas in need of consideration for the new deal, and I would ask her to consider those areas that wish to be included in urban regeneration schemes and which would benefit from the Government's programme to help such communities. Will she consider those areas favourably?

Yvette Cooper: My hon. Friend is right that regeneration needs to extend more widely than the new deal for communities. Certainly, the neighbourhood renewal fund is supporting 88 districts across the country, which are making real progress and closing the gap on the national average in terms of employment and education. He is also right that there are other broader areas in which investment and regeneration is needed. That is why the work of the regional development agencies is so important.

Local Government Finance

3. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): If he will obtain data to allow a market forces factor in the local government funding formula to be examined for the City of York separately from North Yorkshire. [173981]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): The area cost adjustment is the element of the local government funding formula that takes account of higher wage and rate costs in each area. The new area cost adjustment is a huge improvement on the old system, which gave a top-up only to authorities in the south-east. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister uses wage data from the whole North Yorkshire area to calculate the area cost adjustment for the City of York and for North Yorkshire county council. That is to ensure that the area cost adjustment is stable and reliable from year to year.

Hugh Bayley: Wages and house prices are higher in York than in North Yorkshire, which of course is an entirely separate local authority area, but York, unlike Leeds, does not receive the area cost adjustment. Will my hon. Friend consider changing the formula so that York's costs can be calculated separately from those of North Yorkshire and we can be considered for the area cost adjustment in relation to our costs, which are different from those in North Yorkshire? Does he recognise that it is important for York to get this help after this year, in which it has faced from its Liberal Democrat council one of the highest council tax rises in the country?

Phil Hope: Currently, the funding formula is set for at least the next year, but I understand my hon. Friend's concerns and we may explore the potential for calculating the area cost adjustment at a finer geographical level. I am anxious, however, to ensure that we have enough wage data to produce stable and reliable area cost factors each year. My hon. Friend is a great champion for his constituency, and he will be pleased to hear that his council in York got an increase of 6.2 per cent. in grant from the Labour Government, and an extra £10.5 million in specific grant. I therefore share his concerns that Liberal Democrats in York raised their council tax by 8.5 per cent. The fact is that Liberal Democrat councils cost more.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I hope that the market forces provision will recognise not only that, as the hon. Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) said, wages are lower in North Yorkshire than in the City of York, but that residents living in villages such as Nun Monkton in North Yorkshire will be given preference over travelling showmen trying to set up winter quarters in that area?

Phil Hope: I am not absolutely certain about the connection between the area cost adjustment and the village of Nun Monkton, but central Government funding for local government means that rural areas, like urban areas, have received substantially more grant from this Government than they ever did from the Tories.

Mental Health Inquiry

4. Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): What proportion of respondents to the social exclusion unit's inquiry into mental health was made up of people who had experienced mental health problems. [173982]

7. Dr. Doug Naysmith (Bristol, North-West) (Lab/Co-op): How many individuals with mental health problems contributed via the internet to the social exclusion unit inquiry into mental health. [173985]

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Keith Hill): Of 950 written responses to the social exclusion unit consultation, 28 per cent. were from people with experience of mental health problems. There were 33 e-mailed responses, and 11 from groups. The SEU recognises the importance of engaging directly with adults with mental health problems. That is why it arranged a series of consultation events that involved some 500 people.

Dr. Iddon: In response to that inquiry, this week, Mind published a report entitled "Not alone?", which shows that 84 per cent. of people who suffer a mental health problem feel isolated, compared with 29 per cent. of the general population. Since ready use of a telephone was cited as helpful in overcoming that isolation, does my right hon. Friend agree that local authorities should be encouraged to provide helplines, such as Bolton metropolitan borough council's careline, to help vulnerable people, and that the delivery of all public services can play a role in removing the stigma of mental health problems and the discrimination that they bring?

Keith Hill: Like my hon. Friend, I welcome the Mind report, which calls attention to a number of important issues consistent with the findings of the SEU mental health project. I congratulate my hon. Friend on introducing the careline initiative in Bolton. The forthcoming SEU report will identify actions needed to improve access to advice and support for adults with mental health problems through, for example, primary care and a lessening of the financial insecurity that can reduce use of the telephone, which is so often a lifeline and a means of escape from isolation.

Dr. Naysmith: I too congratulate the Minister and the SEU on inquiring into links between mental health problems. What the Minister said about the contribution of the internet was fascinating, and raises further interesting questions. Mind's report "Not alone?", mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon), found 72 per cent. of respondents to its survey believed online access was or could be beneficial; but 20 per cent. of those, who were either using or wishing to use the internet, did not have regular access to it. Have the Government any plans to enable people with mental health problems in particular to gain access to what is nowadays a basic communication tool?

Keith Hill: My hon. Friend is right. All the evidence suggests that those on the lowest incomes have least access to the internet. We realise that that is a particular difficulty for people with mental health problems, and we think it very important for them to have direct access to those making decisions on such issues. We expect the SEU report, which is about to be published, to make a major contribution to improving that access.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): If I were writing about mental health, I would be inclined to write to the Secretary of State for Health. It is currently rather difficult to know what is happening in mainstream Whitehall Departments, what policy is being drawn up in Cabinet Office units, and what policy is being drawn up in units in the Minister's Department. Could the Minister help us by reminding us in writing what units exist in the ODPM and what policies they are working on? That is a genuinely helpful question. It is particularly important for us to know when the SEU is to deal with new policies, so that we know when to make representations on them.

Keith Hill: I agree that joined-up government, as they say, is important in all aspects of government, and especially important in this context. The SEU report will go some way towards achieving a more seamless approach to mental health problems across Government, but I undertake to write to the hon. Gentleman explaining what routes are appropriate.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): I was pleased to learn this morning that the SEU is employing people with direct experience of being at the receiving end of mental health services. Does my right hon. Friend agree that one good way of combating the stigma and social exclusion suffered by people with mental health problems is to set a good example in terms of staff recruitment and retention? What are my right hon. Friend and the SEU doing to disseminate best practice in enlightened parts of the public service, and in private sector organisations such as BT?

Keith Hill: The purpose of the SEU report will be to improve dissemination of best practice. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for acknowledging the unit's determination to involve people with mental health problems. As she said, a member of the SEU's mental health team has experience of enduring mental health problems.

Regional Assemblies

5. Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab): What effects a directly elected assembly for the north-west will have on business. [173983]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): Improving the economic performance of the region will be at the heart of the objectives of an elected regional assembly in the north-west. If the three northern regions improve their productivity to the current southern region average, they will be nearly £35 billion a year better off—and most of that increase will be in the north-west, which is the largest region of the three. A directly elected assembly for the north-west will put responsibilities for releasing that potential in the hands of the people of the region, not the civil servants in Whitehall.

Mrs. Ellman: Does my right hon. Friend agree that good transport links are essential for successful businesses? Although there are significant transport powers in the proposed assemblies, can he offer any strengthened powers so that good transport can be developed for successful business in the north-west and elsewhere?

The Deputy Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes a major point on the importance of transport and economic development. Certainly the regions will play a major part in decisions on transport infrastructure, but she will also realise that in the north-west alone there are two passenger transport executives, which have a considerable influence on transport investment in the regions. The Secretary of State for Transport has already made it clear to the House that he thinks that more of those decisions should be taken in the regions. That will no doubt be reflected in the Bill that we will introduce.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): We do not have any oyster bars in the north-west of England, but we have a number of other businesses. I spoke this morning to the chairman of the CBI in the north-west, Damien Waters, who is very concerned that the costs of the regional assembly will be borne by his members. They have seen what has happened in Scotland, with the fiasco of the palace that is being built costing 10 times more than was estimated, and the same has happened in Wales, with the building costing much more than was estimated in the White Paper. Why should those business people trust what this Government are saying about the costs of the new regional assemblies?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I think that the hon. Gentleman looks more like a kipper than an oyster. I note what he says about the costs of the assemblies, but does that mean that his party is now committed to abolishing the Scottish Parliament? Does it mean that it is committed to abolishing the Welsh Assembly? It promised to do that, but has now changed its mind. If the hon. Gentleman is concerned about the cost, is he also concerned that his Front-Bench team are committed to abolishing the regional development agencies that will make a real difference to economic development?

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): No one believes the right hon. Gentleman's bluster. He is talking a load of cod. He is talking about investment in transport, but an extra layer of politicians and bureaucrats with no new money and no new powers, as Jeff Rooker has said in the House of Lords, will mean that there will not be the resources to improve transport. How does the right hon. Gentleman explain the fact that business is overwhelmingly opposed to elected regional assemblies? The Lancashire chamber of commerce has voted against them, as has the Manchester chamber of commerce. The Hull chamber of commerce, in the right hon. Gentleman's own constituency, has voted against elected regional assemblies. How does he explain that?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that at the hearings that we have been holding, the chambers of commerce and the CBI have been expressing views that have changed from those that the hon. Gentleman suggests they held early on in the debate—[Interruption.] Well, reference has already been made to Newcastle's The Journal, which has said that business is quite clearly moving towards a more favourable position. At the end of the day, however, the people will make the decision—we are giving them that right. The hon. Gentleman spends so much time complaining about the hearings, but we are there explaining to people what we are intending to do. All the polls show that those hearings are having an effect in raising awareness, although we must wait to see what the vote is. The hon. Gentleman should not spend all his time asking stupid questions here on the cost of the hearings—questions with a total cost of £7,000, which is the same as the cost of one hearing with 200 people. We prefer to consult the people, and at the end of the day, they will make the decision.

Council Tax

6. Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby) (Lab): What plans he has to make council tax liability more closely related to income. [173984]

The Minister for Local and Regional Government (Mr. Nick Raynsford): The balance of funding review is looking at possible reforms to council tax. We intend it to report this summer.

Lawrie Quinn: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Can he confirm that the evidence given by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy to the balance of funding review suggests that the proposed pay-as-you-earn scheme for local income tax would be impractical and far from fair? Is it not time that the parties in this House recognised that the public know when they are being sold a pup, and is it not time that we achieved transparency and fairness in terms of local government income?

Mr. Raynsford: The balance of funding review has received very good evidence from a variety of sources, including from CIPFA, whose report has certainly poured a great deal of cold water on the Liberal Democrats' over-optimistic assumptions about a local income tax. Such assumptions were well exposed during Monday evening's debate in this House.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): Will the Minister confirm that he failed to read out on Monday all the very positive things that CIPFA said about local income tax? Has he decided totally to reject the idea of a local income tax, even though it is used in America, Japan, Sweden, Denmark and Swinland—[Interruption.] Sorry, Mr. Speaker, I meant to say Switzerland. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I can hear some hon. Members, but not the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Davey: Sorry, Mr. Speaker, that was very Prescottian of me. Was the Minister pre-empting the conclusion of the balance of funding review and ruling out local income tax at any time, in any form?

Mr. Raynsford: Well, I say to the hon. Gentleman what I said to his colleagues on Monday evening. They invited me to read out the four recommendations that supported a local income tax, and I said to them that, in all fairness, if I did so I would have to read out the six recommendations that were against the idea. In the interest of economy and of proceeding smoothly, I thought that I would spare the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues that pain. We know that the Liberal Democrats love to live in never-never land; now we realise that they want to live in swindleland.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [173964] Peter Bradley (The Wrekin) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 19 May.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Peter Bradley: Having read the papers all week, I am relieved to see that the Prime Minister is still here—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] We may all have been victims of another media hoax. The Government have rightly dedicated both attention and resources to the experience of young people in the home, at school and in further and higher education, but they have perhaps dedicated less attention and fewer resources to the quality of their spare time. Does the Prime Minister agree that the principal reason why young people congregate on street corners is that they have literally nowhere else to go? Will he take the opportunity provided by the forthcoming spending review to dedicate a real increase in resources to the youth service and to facilities for young people?

The Prime Minister: About £500 million is now provided every year for youth services and for community services specifically dedicated to young people. That will increase by almost £30 million in this financial year, but in addition, we are pioneering the concept of extended schools—just such a school has been announced today in my hon. Friend's constituency—in which we also provide facilities for youngsters after school hours. Such schools are used as a basis for the local community to bring together some of the youth services, so that young people are kept out of trouble and off the streets, and given something proper and sensible to do. Together with the measures that we are taking in respect of antisocial behaviour, that will make a real difference in many of our communities.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): May I begin by thanking the Prime Minister for responding so promptly to my call last week for compensation for people who have lost their pension entitlement? May I also welcome this week's announcement that there may be variable penalty points for speeding, as we suggested last month, just as we welcomed his change of mind—however belated—about a referendum on the EU constitution? So we seem to be working rather well together in the interests of the country: we put forward the policies, and he adopts them. Following those very happy precedents, may I ask him to respond to another of our proposals. Will he ask the Chancellor to drop the petrol tax rise due in September?

The Prime Minister: Of course we understand the concern about oil prices, but it is not due to Government action. The high price is due to a number of factors, the most important of which is extremely high demand in China and America. Other factors include low stocks in the United States, so we do not see these as the same circumstances as obtained last year.

When the right hon. and learned Gentleman says that we are following his record in all respects, I have to point out that I shall certainly not follow his record in these following respects: we shall not go back to boom-and-bust economics; we shall not go back to 3 million unemployed; we shall not go back to under-investment in the health service; and we shall certainly not reintroduce the poll tax.

Mr. Howard: I am afraid that none of that will wash. People are interested—[Interruption.] People are interested in what is happening now and what will happen in the future. Does the Prime Minister not appreciate the hardship that a further increase in petrol tax will cause? Last year, the Chancellor told us that he was going to defer the annual increase in petrol tax because of high and volatile oil prices. Petrol then cost 77p a litre and now costs 82p a litre. This week, oil prices reached a new high. So will the Prime Minister now have a word with his Chancellor—he does not have to go to Loch Fyne to do it—and drop the proposed increase?

The Prime Minister: Well,

"I certainly don't think that anybody ought to get in any kind of blind panic about this but nor incidentally do I think that there's anything very material that the UK Government can do and obviously one shouldn't blame the Government for oil prices rising."

[Interruption.] That is a quote from the shadow Chancellor. [Interruption.] I do not think that it is me who needs to have a word with my colleague; it is him who needs to have a word with his—and he need not go to Loch Fyne for that either.

Mr. Howard: Does the Prime Minister not understand the simple difference between the oil price—of course the Government cannot control that—and the tax on petrol, which the Chancellor can directly control? That is the question I put to the Prime Minister; that is the question that he has refused to answer twice. Why will he not tell the Chancellor to drop the proposed increase in the tax on petrol?

The Prime Minister: When we are talking about the tax on petrol, let me remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman of his record when he was in government. We have done a little research and found the figures. In the last seven years of the Conservative Government, the fuel duty went up by 17p a litre. It has gone up by only 10p a litre under this Government. Of course we know it is a problem, for reasons that he has accepted are beyond the Government's control, but it is important to realise that we have to run the economy in an effective way. He talks about not going back to the past, but the strong economy with record employment and record low unemployment is happening now.

Hon. Members: More.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend join me in welcoming today the Palestinian parliamentary delegation, which is watching our proceedings, and which, as you know Mr. Speaker, is led by your counterpart in the Palestinian legislative council? He comes from Gaza, where 100 homes have been demolished in the last few days and 3,000 over three years—in contravention of the fourth Geneva convention. Will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning that destruction of homes? As a high contracting party to that convention, what will Britain do to ensure that it is enforced?

The Prime Minister: I join my hon. Friend in welcoming the delegation from the Palestinian Parliament. I assure them that the exchanges that have just taken place do not represent the total sum of what happens in parliamentary proceedings. My hon. Friend makes a very serious point. We entirely understand Israel's concerns about acts of terrorism, but what happened yesterday was unacceptable and wrong.

It is very clear now that we need to do several things. We need to press on with the proposals for disengagement from the whole of the Gaza and parts of the west bank. We then need to allow the international community to help moderate Palestinians re-establish control and authority in those areas over which they will have control and authority. Above all else, we need to begin a process that allows us to restart proper negotiations that lead to a final status settlement.

Obviously, that would happen far more easily if the terrorism stopped, and therefore we all have a responsibility to do two things. First, we must do what we can to stop the terrorism while acting in accordance with international law. Secondly, we must make sure, above all else, that we get to the point where Palestinians and Israelis can once again sit down in proper negotiation and reach a settlement. I am sure that that is what the majority of Israelis and Palestinians want.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): Can the Prime Minister confirm that the 30 June handover of power in Iraq will involve the transfer of full sovereignty, and the authority that goes with it, to the new Iraqi Government? Will that Government be able, for example, to retain control of both their oil revenues and their prisons?

The Prime Minister: The answer to that is yes. The new Iraqi Government must have full sovereignty after 30 June. That will give them the rights that all sovereign Governments have.

Mr. Kennedy: I thank the Prime Minister for that very clear reply. I am sure that the whole House will welcome it.

On the related question of the possible further deployment of British troops, if the US requests that further British troops be deployed—and that may happen outside the present British sector and involve an extension of the troops' role into Najaf—will the Prime Minister confirm that the House of Commons will be able to vote before any such deployment takes place? Will he also guarantee that any such decision and announcement will not be slipped out during a parliamentary recess?

The Prime Minister: The House will be informed, and there will be consultation in the normal way. However, I do not believe it right to set a precedent that there must be a vote before any further troop deployment is undertaken. No decision has yet been taken on whether to deploy further troops, or about where that might happen. Discussions are continuing at the moment, but the important thing is that this country continues to play its full part in trying to create a democratic and stable state in Iraq. There are obviously huge difficulties, as was made clear by the assassination of the president of the governing council earlier this week. Responsibility for that assassination is now being claimed by one of the leaders of al-Qaeda, which shows us exactly what we are up against. However, the one thing about which I have absolutely no doubt is that it is our job to stay and get the job done. We must make sure that Iraq becomes that democratic and stable state, because that is in the interests of the Iraqis, the region and the world.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab): My question follows my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Richard Burden). Taking into account the fact that my right hon. Friend is uniquely responsible for the process that led to the creation of the middle eastern road map, and that the Gaza strip has become a blood-bespattered charnel house, will he condemn the murder of an Israeli women and her four daughters, and the deaths of those Israeli soldiers who gave their lives futilely in pursuit of a futile policy? At the same time, will he also condemn, in the most categorical terms, the Israeli Government's policy of indiscriminate slaughter in the Gaza strip, which yesterday led to the deaths of 20 people, including two children? Will he condemn too that Government's policy of destroying large numbers of homes, and take the earliest possible opportunity to use his unique influence to get the road map back on track?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary—and I echo the words that he used yesterday—has already made it clear why we regard what happened yesterday to be unacceptable and wrong, as I said earlier. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) is quite right to list the pain and grief on the other side, and in particular the brutal and appalling murder of a pregnant Israeli women and her young children. He makes clear the importance of beginning again a process that means that we must do everything that we can to stop the terrorism that gets in the way of achieving a political settlement, and which gets us back into proper negotiations. The road map remains the only way we can get back into those final status negotiation discussions. I will do everything that I can over the coming weeks to see that we are able to be in that position, because it is the only possibility for the future in both Palestine and Israel.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister knows that I agree with what he has just said, and in his efforts to get the road map back on track he has my full support.

In the Deputy Prime Minister's interview with The Times on Saturday, he said:

"I think it's true that when plates appear to be moving, everyone positions themselves for it."

What does the Prime Minister think that the Deputy Prime Minister meant?

The Prime Minister: I have no intention of engaging in a textual analysis of what my right hon. Friend said. I will leave that to others better qualified than myself. In the end, the issue will be very simple: it will be between the record of the right hon. and learned Gentleman in government and the record of this Government. Perhaps we should now debate that.

Mr. Howard: Let me see if I can help the Prime Minister a bit, because that was not the only thing that the Deputy Prime Minister said. He was asked whether the Cabinet was discussing life after the Prime Minister, and he said:

"Yes, people do talk about it and you get that discussion."

He added, helpfully:

"Every British Prime Minister goes eventually."

We know what the Deputy Prime Minister had in mind. Let me say this to the Prime Minister: I intend, if elected, to serve a full term of office—does he?

The Prime Minister: I have to say to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that since I have been Prime Minister, it is not Prime Ministers who have gone but Leaders of the Opposition.

Mr. Howard: I can assure the Prime Minister that no one is plotting against my leadership. But everyone will notice that he did not answer the question. What everyone will want to know is whether if they vote Blair, they will get Brown. This week the Leader of the House said that the Prime Minister has hit a "really big sticky patch", the worst of his premiership; the Secretary of State for Health gave members of the Cabinet a dressing-down; the Chancellor issued a one-paragraph statement of support; and the Chancellor and the Deputy Prime Minister have been discussing a "smooth transition" at an oyster bar in Argyll. Is it not the case that the most senior members of the Prime Minister's Cabinet—the two people he is sitting between now—have stitched him up like a kipper?

The Prime Minister: It is interesting how the right hon. and learned Gentleman never wants to discuss the issues. I wonder why—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House is suspended.

Speaker's Statement

1.30 pm

Mr. Speaker: Following this morning's suspension in the Chamber, I wish to make a brief statement.

As Members will know, a security screen has been erected in front of the main part of the Strangers Gallery. Members sponsoring guests or visitors for admission to the unscreened Galleries are required to certify that their guests are known to them. They are also required to vouch for their good behaviour. Members whose guests disrupt the Chamber will be required to apologise to the House; it will be for the House to decide what further action to take.

In this case, I understand that a member of the House of Lords signed the visitor who disrupted our proceedings into the Gallery.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Abolish them!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must hear me out.

I expect the relevant member of the House of Lords to provide me with a full explanation before this day is out. I am directing the Serjeant at Arms that the right of members of the House of Lords to sponsor visitors for admission to this Chamber is suspended with immediate effect.

I am pleased to inform the House that, after detailed examination, the substance has been found not to be harmful. I and the authorities in the House will review the way in which this incident has been dealt with to ensure that all appropriate procedures are followed, if necessary, in the future.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): On that point, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am obliged to take points of order, but I must say to the hon. Gentleman that the House has been disrupted, Prime Minister's Question Time has been stopped and the best thing we can do is to get back to business as usual.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Telecommunications Masts (Need and Safety Tests)

1.32 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish need and safety tests before telecommunications masts can be erected; to amend the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 and the General Permitted Development Order 1995; and for connected purposes.

I am delighted that we are not allowing our proceedings to be disrupted by the shenanigans earlier today. I for one will never be silenced on my concerns about the erection of mobile phone masts.

When mobile phones were invented, I had no idea of their ramifications for all our lives. They seem to dominate our very existence. Every MP I talk to has anxieties about mobile phones and mobile phone masts, so why did Parliament not seize the opportunity offered by the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) to legislate on the matter? I hope that it is not because Parliament is afraid of the power of the five large mobile phone operators.

Everywhere I go, people have mobile phones fixed to their ears, engaged in all sorts of conversations. We cannot help hearing what the conversations are about. Most of them are trivial nonsense—for instance, "I'll be home, dear, in 10 minutes", or "Would you like tomato ketchup with your meal this evening?" Who wants to know what those people are doing? I do not know, but everyone now seems to be talking on mobile phones.

As far as I am concerned, this new technology comes at a cost. The health risks from mobile phones—people cannot have mobile phones without mobile phone masts—are absolutely clear from what Sir William Stewart said. When it suits those who want to defend mobile phone masts, they quote Sir William Stewart, but what they do not say is that he amplified his personal concerns about phones to the British Association for the Advancement of Science in September 2001. He called for the cost of handsets to be increased to restrict their use by children. Sir William—the great expert in this field—said that he would not allow his grandchildren to use a mobile phone. That says it all.

I am concerned not only about the potential health risks of brain tumours caused by mobile phones, but about the mental health risks. Anyone with children must see how our children have been polluted by the way in which they use mobile phones and send texts and video pictures to one another. That is very serious. Given that many Members of Parliament are endlessly presenting petitions and saying how concerned their constituents are about the situation, the House should have no difficulty in giving full approval to my ten-minute Bill, without any need for a debate. I expect my Bill to be nodded through its various stages.

Mobile telecommunications masts are being erected all over the United Kingdom, and they are certainly being put up in large numbers in Southend, West. Mobile telephone users expect to have a reception at all times, but with that comes a price to local residents. My goodness, the people who put up those masts are clever in beating the rules and regulations. The masts might look like trees or flagpoles. They make them look beautiful, but those masts emit levels of radiation that can damage the thin skulls of our children—and perhaps some adults who have thin skulls as well—so the House should take seriously people's genuine concerns about the health risks.

The Bill that I am seeking to persuade the House to accept would amend the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. Furthermore, the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004 amends the 1990 Act, but does not replace it. My Bill seeks to redress that anomaly. The 1990 Act does not deal with separate categories of planning permission according to the type of development involved. Mobile telecommunications masts are therefore included with all other types of development, despite the fact that mobile telecommunications masts are a different type of development.

Section 70 of the 1990 Act deals with the determination of planning applications. It says:

"(1) Where an application is made to a local planning authority for planning permission—

(a) subject to sections 91 and 92, they may grant planning permission, either unconditionally or subject to such conditions as they think fit; or

(b) they may refuse planning permission.

(2) In dealing with such an application the authority shall have regard to the provisions of the development plan, so far as material to the application, and to any other material considerations.

(3) Subsection (1) has effect subject to sections 65, 66 and 67 and to the following provisions of this Act, to sections 66, 67, 72 and 73 of the Planning (Listed Buildings and Conservation Areas) Act 1990 and to section 15 of the Health Services Act 1976."

I hope that the House is impressed by the considerable work done by the House of Commons Library on my behalf.

Those measures are outdated. Furthermore, the 2004 Act does not attempt to address the problem. The siting of a mobile telecommunications mast that is under 15 m is a very different type of development. My Bill would update that legislation and bring it into the 21st century. Rather than allow the telecommunications companies to get around the regulations and laws that the House passes, my Bill would put the onus on operators to prove to the local authority planning committee that the masts are necessary. They would also have to prove to the planning committee that the masts posed no health risks whatsoever.

Last week, as a prelude to my Bill, I called a public meeting through the Mobile Operators Association. The nonsense involved in trying to arrange such a meeting at which the operators could meet the general public went on for two years. To cut a long story short, in spite of complying with the advice from the Mobile Operators Association, I was told eventually that "it is not an area that we wish to engage in."

No wonder, because they do not want to face the general public; they want Members of Parliament to take the flak instead. Of the five operators, the only two that turned up were O_2 and Orange, and the general public's comments gave them considerable food for thought.

Members of the public constantly tell all Members of Parliament that a mast is too near a school or that it is in the middle of a built-up area. The problem is serious and safety should be of paramount importance. That is why I was very glad that the noble Lady Miller of Chilthorne Domer asked for further clarification on the matter in the other place from the noble Lord Warner, who is, I believe, about to report shortly.

The Bill is well overdue. As all hon. Members agree with it, we do not need any extra time because I hope that it will go through on the nod. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Amess, Mr. Simon Burns, Mr. Howard Flight, Mr. David Atkinson, Mr. Michael Clapham, Mr. Andrew Rosindell, Andrew Selous, Mr. Richard Spring, Tom Cox, Janet Anderson and Dr. Ian Gibson.

Telecommunications Masts (Need and Safety Tests)

Mr. David Amess accordingly presented a Bill to establish need and safety tests before telecommunications masts can be erected; to amend the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 and the General Permitted Development Order 1995; and for connected purpose: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 18 June, and to be printed [Bill 112].

Orders of the Day

Pensions Bill

[2ND ALLOTTED DAY]

As amended in the Standing Committee, further considered.

New Clause 34

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE SCHEME FOR MEMBERS OF CERTAIN PENSION SCHEMES

'(1) The Secretary of State must make provision, by regulations, for a scheme for making payments to, or in respect of, qualifying members of qualifying pension schemes ("the financial assistance scheme").

(2) For the purposes of this section—

"qualifying member", in relation to a qualifying pension scheme, means a person—

(a) who, at such time as may be prescribed, is a member of the scheme in respect of whom the scheme's pension liabilities are unlikely to be satisfied in full because the scheme has insufficient assets, or

(b) who, at such time as may be prescribed, had ceased to be a member of the scheme and in respect of whom the scheme's pension liabilities were not satisfied in full, before he ceased to be such a member, because the scheme had insufficient assets, and in respect of whom prescribed conditions are satisfied at such time as may be prescribed;

"qualifying pension scheme" means an occupational pension scheme (including such a scheme which has been fully wound up)—

(a) which, at such time as may be prescribed, is not—

(i) a money purchase scheme, or

(ii) a scheme of a prescribed description,

(b) the winding up of which began during such period as may be prescribed, and

(c) the employer in relation to which satisfies such conditions as may be prescribed at such time as may be prescribed;

"scheme's pension liabilities", in respect of a member of a qualifying pension scheme, means the liabilities of the scheme to, or in respect of, the member in respect of pensions or other benefits (including increases in pensions), and a qualifying pension scheme has or had, insufficient assets if the assets of the scheme are, or were, insufficient to satisfy in full the liabilities of the scheme calculated in the prescribed manner.

(3) Regulations under subsection (1) may, in particular, make provision—

(a) for the financial assistance scheme to be managed by the Secretary of State, a body established by or for the purposes of the regulations or such other person as may be prescribed;

(b) for the person who manages the financial assistance scheme ("the scheme manager") to hold (whether on trust or otherwise), manage and apply a fund in accordance with the regulations or, where the fund is held on trust, the deed of trust;

(c) for the property, rights and liabilities of qualifying pension schemes to be transferred to the scheme manager in prescribed circumstances and for the trustees or managers of a qualifying pension scheme in respect of which such a transfer has occurred to be discharged from prescribed liabilities;

(d) prescribing the circumstances in which payments are to be made by the scheme manager to, or in respect of, qualifying members of qualifying pension schemes and the manner in which the amount of any payment is to be determined, and, where the fund is held by the fund manager on trust, the circumstances and manner may be prescribed by reference to the deed of trust;

(e) authorising the Secretary of State—

(i) where he is not the scheme manager, to pay grants to the scheme manager;

(ii) where he is the scheme manager, to pay amounts into the fund held by him in accordance with the regulations;

(iii) to pay grants to other prescribed persons in connection with the financial assistance scheme;

(f) prescribing the circumstances in which amounts are to be paid into or out of the fund held by the scheme manager;

(g) conferring functions in relation to the financial assistance scheme on the Pensions Regulator or the Board of the Pension Protection Fund;

(h) providing for a person to exercise a discretion in dealing with any matter in relation to the financial assistance scheme;

(i) applying any provision of Part 1 or 2 with such modifications as may be prescribed; and such regulations may make different provision for different cases or descriptions of case and include such incidental, supplementary, consequential or transitional provision as appears to the Secretary of State to be expedient.

(4) Any amount which, by virtue of subsection (3)(e), the Secretary of State pays under regulations under subsection (1) is to be paid out of money provided by Parliament.

(5) A time or period prescribed under subsection (2) may fall (or, in the case of a period, wholly or partly fall) at a time before the passing of this Act.

(6) Nothing in this section prejudices the operation of section 272 (subordinate legislation (general provisions)).'.

Brought up, and read the First time.

1.44 pm

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to take the following:

Amendment (d) to the proposed new clause, line 7, after 'prescribed', insert

'(irrespective of the time at which the winding up of the scheme took place)'.

Amendment (e) to the proposed new clause, line 10, after 'prescribed', insert

'(irrespective of the time at which the winding up of the scheme took place)'.

Amendment (a) to the proposed new clause, line 73, at end add—

'( ) The first payments from the financial assistance scheme shall be made within six months of the coming into force of this Act;'.

Amendment (b) to the proposed new clause, line 73, at end add—

'( ) Schemes where the qualifying pension scheme was closed whilst the sponsoring employer was solvent shall be qualifying pension schemes for the purpose of this section;'.

Amendment ((a)) to amendment (b); in line 1, after 'closed', insert

'up until 14th May 2004'.

Amendment (c) to the proposed new clause, line 73, at end add—

'( ) Assistance from the financial assistance scheme shall be at least sufficient to provide total benefits to qualifying members as they would have received had their scheme fallen within the scope of the Pension Protection Fund.'.

Amendment No. 212, in page 76, line 27 Clause 113, leave out subsection (2).

Malcolm Wicks: Nothing will prevent the Pensions Bill from passing into law.

The pension protection fund is a major social policy advance that will bring protection and security to more than 10 million pension scheme members and their families. We hope that it will start in April next year, subject to the will of Parliament. I believe that one day it will be viewed as a substantial achievement of the Labour Government, but it is overshadowed by a cloud—the plight of the tens of thousands of workers who have already lost their pension rights or a large percentage of them, which is debilitating for those affected and undermines confidence in the idea of saving for a pension.

The Secretary of State, other Ministers and I have been considering for some time whether something could be done to alleviate the situation. We have been assisted by the representations of many hon. Members, including my hon. Friends the Members for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan), for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt), for St. Helens, North (Mr. Watts), for Ayr (Sandra Osborne), for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) and many others. All have expressed deep concern, which we share, about the position of their constituents. I should add that my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) has been a stern social security saint, judging our stewardship of this vital issue. [Interruption.] It is those in front of me from whom I have nothing to fear. The Secretary of State, other Ministers and I have met a number of members of affected schemes. I cannot mention all the schemes, but Allied Steel and Wire, Ravenhead Glass and Dexion come to mind. Most of those people expect to receive a much reduced pension. I have been deeply moved, as we all have, by the distress and bewilderment of many people who, after long years of paying into a pension scheme, have been told that, after all, the pension they are relying on, and which they have paid for, will not be there.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House how, as we are establishing a precedent in the new clause, we can guard against having to pay compensation in absence of fault? That troubles one very much, because one does not wish to establish such a precedent.

Malcolm Wicks: Although one might use a variety of terms in English usage, this is not compensation, and there is no legal liability. We are proposing an assistance scheme.

Alan Howarth (Newport, East) (Lab): My hon. Friend said that the Government do not have a legal obligation. When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions spoke on the radio at the weekend about the plight of workers who have lost much of their pensions in defined benefit schemes, he said, "My goodness they've got a human case." On the basis of humanity, why should the Minister not respond with equal generosity to people who, through no fault of their own, have lost out in defined contribution schemes, which they were required to join as a condition of employment? In fairness, why would he not then extend help to pension policyholders in Equitable Life, where the Government's duty of care was certainly no less?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. That is a rather lengthy intervention.

Malcolm Wicks: There is general acceptance of the argument that there is a genuine difference between the situation described by my right hon. Friend and that facing this group of workers, some of whom had to join their pension schemes and are now in difficulty. As I describe our proposals, some of those issues may become clearer.

Several hon. Members rose—

Malcolm Wicks: I should like to describe the progress we have made, because hon. Members may wish to question me about some of the details. First, however, I shall give way to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend for his comments. I urge him to ignore the beliefs of some of my hon. Friends, as we very much welcome the decision, which, we understand, was difficult and involved the Treasury, the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions. Firewalls have had to be built in, but we welcome and support the proposals.

Malcolm Wicks: I thank my hon. Friend for those remarks.

Several hon. Members rose—

Malcolm Wicks: I think it would help the House if I made some progress; there will be plenty of time for dialogue and debate later.

Many people—ordinary, hard-working people—are being left with their legitimate expectations of a comfortable retirement in tatters. That cannot be right. One of the many people whom I have met was distraught that her plan to retire this year on an expected two thirds of her final salary has been wrecked as a result of her employer's insolvency. Coming up to her 60s, after 18 years of service in the company and 18 years of contribution, she has had to decide to continue working. It would be a hard heart that was not moved by the plight of such shattered individuals.

In the meetings that I have had—I know my ministerial colleagues would echo this—I was touched by the remarkable restraint and quiet dignity of many of those people as they modestly explained their plight. I asked what it meant for them, and their stories are in my mind, such as that of the man who, in his early 60s, had to return to rather backbreaking work at an airport, lifting luggage. People told me—reluctantly—about the effect on their family, their marriage, their health and their mental state. When I met these people, the phrase "proper people" always came to my mind. They are proper people, hard working, who have taken on their responsibilities, not least for their own pensions futures.

The Government have been clear all along that if we could do something to help such people, that would be the right thing to do. That is why I am so pleased—indeed, honoured—to be at the Dispatch Box to move new clause 34. It will assist people who have lost out severely as a result of the winding-up of their pension scheme as a consequence of the employer's insolvency.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): Will the measure close the loophole in the case of companies that do not declare insolvency, but decide to uproot and move to other parts of the world, leaving a deficit in the pension scheme? Will people be protected in such cases?

Malcolm Wicks: I may be able to cover some of those issues in a moment. The scheme is very much for the insolvent employer. It cannot be about any disappointments in a range of pension schemes. Where an employer is solvent, the responsibility rests with that employer.

Over the past few months we have been clear with the House that a potential action for the group I was describing raises a number of complex issues. In particular, we have been clear, and I am sure the House will understand, that we cannot accept liability for private pension losses in general. Indeed, it would be quite wrong to do so, and would mean the taxpayer writing a blank cheque. No Government can undertake to nationalise financial risk. While we do not accept any Government legal liability, we do accept that the situation is very serious. It is right that the Government take action to provide some assistance.

The new clause requires the Secretary of State to establish a financial assistance scheme for people who are in underfunded occupational pension schemes that have begun winding up before the pension protection fund is set up. The Government have put forward £400 million over 20 years to help address the serious losses that some now face. It is open to industry to offer further support. We hope that that support will be forthcoming. This money will not cover everyone who feels aggrieved, nor will it give those it does help everything they might want, but it represents significant help to those who have lost the most.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD) rose—

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab) rose—

Malcolm Wicks: I shall give way, then I shall try to keep to my word and make some progress.

Mr. Webb: We know that the Government are proposing a 20-year scheme. Can the Minister explain their reasoning? Some of the workers affected are already past pension age and therefore need money now, but some have not yet reached pension age and will still be alive in, say, 30 years. What will happen in the final 10 years or so?

Malcolm Wicks: It is our judgment that £400 million over a 20-year period, fed into whatever scheme we set up—the mechanics have still to be decided—will be sufficient. There will be a three-yearly review of the administration and of how the scheme is working.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: I welcome the Government's initiative in establishing the scheme, but will it extend into the past to cover people such as Matrix Churchill and Massey Ferguson workers in Coventry?

Malcolm Wicks: I shall make progress, because I can cover those issues.

Some important choices remain on how we should proceed. Hon. Members will appreciate that the matter is complex, and we must work quickly with all those involved to explore how we can balance the funds available. The coverage must ensure that those suffering losses are helped according to the principles of openness, fairness and, very importantly, operational practicability. The role of the industry, employers, actuaries, trustees and trade unions in resolving those issues is as great as that of the Government.

Alan Howarth: Will the Minister give way?

Malcolm Wicks: No, I shall make some progress. I hope that my right hon. Friend will not think me discourteous, but he has already intervened once.

I would like briefly to take the House through how we intend to turn our commitment into reality. It involves four phases of work: first, we shall engage with our partners and industry experts, including the trade unions; secondly, we shall design the detail of the policy and the operational framework; thirdly, we shall prepare to implement the scheme; and fourthly, we shall go live and make payments.

The House will want to know about the key milestones in that process. By the end of May, we will have established our working relationships with key partners at all levels. This week, the Secretary of State will write to stakeholders to open a discussion, so that we can address the choices that we must make in partnership. As part of that engagement, the Secretary of State and I plan to meet key stakeholders as soon as possible.

By the end of June, as already promised, we shall lay a report on the results of our investigations to establish the extent of the problem and the numbers affected. Over the summer, we shall work closely with industry experts in a design phase and in exploring the options for operational delivery, on which a number of alternatives are available. Some alternatives involve running on schemes and topping them up, while others involve winding up schemes and providing assistance. Options for delivery might include that undertaken by the DWP, an industry-led body or a stand-alone trust.

By the end of November, we can begin to consult on the details of the regulations. As we expect to use affirmative regulations, hon. Members will have the opportunity to consider our proposals in depth in Committee, and debate will also occur in the other place. By the spring of 2005, we intend to have the scheme in existence with a view to being able to make the first payments as quickly as possible. The programme is demanding, and successful delivery will be possible only through a close working partnership, the establishment of which is our immediate priority.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend clarify two points on how he intends to operate the scheme? First, when he examines the parameters for who might qualify, will he ensure that he does not open the floodgates and increase payments above the sum that he announced? Secondly, will he ensure that as much as possible is spent on the people who need help, rather than on administrating the scheme?

Malcolm Wicks: Those matters are crucial, and I hope that I have reassured my hon. Friend on her first point. We cannot nationalise risk and think that a particular case deserves assistance. Given the level of need, the question of how the money will be distributed is uppermost in our minds.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister for his courtesy in giving way. My entry in the Register of Members' Interests includes my being a trustee of a pension fund, but I am not speaking on its behalf. The Minister says that the figure is £200 million over 20 years, but he also says that he does not know how many people will be affected. If he discovers that many more people are affected, will he increase the sum, and if far fewer people are affected, will he decrease it?

Malcolm Wicks: We are about to publish a report examining the evidence base on that question, and the collection of that data is obviously at an advanced stage. The pensions industry also has an opportunity to contribute more money. As the Government have no legal liability, the word "compensation" is not appropriate—it is an assistance programme—but we feel that there is an ethical duty to act, as well as a need to restore confidence in pensions. I would hope that the pensions industry, too, recognises that responsibility.

Mr. Watts: Does my hon. Friend remember that in a previous debate the Conservatives supported a campaign to pay some form of compensation to this group of workers? Will he seek an assurance that they will join him in trying to get the insurance industry to pay a contribution into the fund?

Malcolm Wicks: Even from a narrow economic and financial viewpoint, it would be a very useful investment, given the need to restore confidence and get the word "security" back into social security as regards pensions.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): The Minister said that one of his stepping stones was to do more work on determining how many people might be entitled to help from such a scheme. How did he determine the sum of £400 million? Is it entirely arbitrary? He says that the Government believe that it is enough, but enough for what?

Malcolm Wicks: It is a very significant and substantial amount, and it relates to our arithmetic about the size of the scheme. It represents a very significant draw on Exchequer resources, and it will be larger if industry will make a contribution. I set out the four areas of work—stepping stones—and the six milestones. I think that Conservative Members were grappling with those two figures—[Interruption.] Well, milestones are a step forward in many respects. Given their difficulties, it is just as well that they are not in charge of collecting the evidence base. Once we have done that, we shall be able to consider these questions in more detail.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): The Minister is right. I admit that I was confused as to how four steps could cover six stepping stones, but he explained that authoritatively.

The Minister said that the £400 million relates to the arithmetic of the number of people affected—that is, 60,000. Can he explain how?

Malcolm Wicks: In determining how much money we wish to seek from the Exchequer, we obviously bear in mind what the evidence is telling us. It is a very substantial amount in relation to those matters.

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North) (Lab): As my hon. Friend knows, Richards of Aberdeen Ltd., a company in my constituency, has a failed pension scheme. Can he assure us that the new clause and the timetable that he described give sufficient flexibility for hon. Members with affected constituents to be fully consulted before detailed regulations are brought in?

Malcolm Wicks: It is not possible to comment on a particular scheme, and my hon. Friend would not expect me to do so, as there are many hundreds in the same position. However, I am of course happy to talk to him and to other Members affected if that would prove helpful.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): On 4 October 2000, 572 deferred pensioners and 371 existing pensioners at British United Shoe Machinery—BUSM—were hit by that company's closure. My hon. Friend talks of industry contributing to the cost of the scheme. What incentives does he plan to put in place to encourage them so to do? That would clearly improve the deal that the Government have rightly hammered out over the past weeks and months, which is most welcome to those who worked for the former BUSM—not the present company, which is an entirely separate management buy-out situated at Enderby.

Malcolm Wicks: I would hope that £400 million of public money is a considerable incentive. As I said, I think that other partners would want to engage with us in restoring confidence in the pension system.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Will my hon. Friend discuss the administration process with the Department of Trade and Industry? Many pension funds get into difficulties because of what happens to the parent company, and I am pleased that my hon. Friend will meet the workers of Lister-Petter next week. Problems arise because the pension fund is an unsecured creditor, way down the list of priorities, which means that it has little purchase over what happens to the future of the company. A pension fund can therefore be driven into insolvency when there may be other ways in which the parent company could be made to help. My hon. Friend is right to say that industry should help, including by examining the way in which other creditors bear some responsibility for what happens to the pension fund. Does he agree with that?

Malcolm Wicks: I understand my hon. Friend's point. We are always in close contact with the Department of Trade and Industry on such matters. In Committee and on Report yesterday, we tabled amendments to protect against what some euphemistically describe as "moral hazard"—one hon. Member called it "fraud"—whereby a parent company can, through restructuring, allegedly dump pensions on a subsidiary company. We need to stop such action.

Several hon. Members rose—

Malcolm Wicks: I shall give way twice more at this stage, but I must then deal with the amendments that various colleagues have tabled.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): The Minister has been courteous in allowing so many interventions on an important matter. The issue affects several of my constituents, so I welcome in principle the Government's decision to do something about it. As with anything to do with pensions, the devil is in the detail. It is evident from the Minister's remarks that some detail remains to be worked out on exactly how the provision will operate. Will he give an undertaking to all hon. Members that, when the decisions have been made, we will all be provided with detailed briefing material, not simply so that we can understand it but so that we can ensure that it is passed on to our constituents who are affected?

Malcolm Wicks: That is a helpful and constructive suggestion. We are always happy to meet Members of Parliament to discuss such matters. I hope that the process that I have described shows that there will be opportunities for consultation. Later, consultation will take place on regulations.

Alan Howarth: I applaud the generosity of my hon. Friend's impulse. I am well aware of the predicament of Allied Steel and Wire workers in south Wales. None the less, I do not understand how he defines "a deserving case" or a "proper" person. Will he explain the Government's ethical case for helping some pensioners in misfortune but not others?

Malcolm Wicks: Recently—and perhaps throughout history—people have lost money when financial circumstances have moved in the wrong direction, and financial arrangements, such as pensions schemes and life insurance policies, have saddened the customer. I do not say that lightly—some circumstances have been serious, as we know. However, in the circumstances that we are considering, many workers were required to join the company pension scheme as part of their employment contract. We argue that that is a special case. It would be dangerous if we were to get on a slippery slope of believing that the Government could stand behind all such financial risk.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister, who is being generous. Before he moves on to the detailed amendments, will he tell us whether it has been decided in the discussions that have been taking place behind closed doors in the past few days that the trade union-inspired litigation in the European Court will be abandoned or settled?

Malcolm Wicks: I have heard no word about that one way or the other. I hope that, like other parties, the unions will consider what we say today and make a judgment about their legal action.

Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP) rose—

Malcolm Wicks: I shall give way to the hon. Lady and then I really will get on.

Annabelle Ewing: The Minister has, indeed, been generous this afternoon in taking interventions. He mentioned the figure of £400 million, which has come from somewhere. Is he genuinely telling hon. Members that no estimates of the average percentage payout have been conducted?

Malcolm Wicks: We are not in a position to do that. However, I have set out the critical milestones for the approaching period. I hope that that will reassure hon. Members that we have a process for dealing with the detail. Our intention is that people will receive a significant proportion of their pension rights. Something that is often forgotten in these discussions is that many of these schemes, although bust in a colloquial sense, still have considerable scheme assets. We are not just talking about the arithmetic of the £400 million; we are often talking about scheme assets as well and, of course, we hope for a contribution from the industry.

Coming as it does at the start of this process, the Government new clause simply requires the establishment of a financial assistance scheme and confers wide enabling powers so that the specifics can be expressed in regulations. When the issue of assisting those who had lost most of their expected pension was first raised, there was a lack of reliable information on the scale and nature of the problem. We have since begun to gather this important data, which will soon placed in the Library. As this information builds up, we shall be in a much better position to develop a structure for an assistance scheme. The new clause reflects our commitment to helping pension scheme members by requiring the setting up of an assistance scheme, and gives us the power necessary to enable us to devise an appropriate structure for that help. I therefore commend the Government new clause to the House as the right route for achieving the outcome that we all desire.

I now turn to the two amendments tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who is not in his normal place, which is very confusing. [HON. MEMBERS: "He's behind you!"] Is he? I know that he is in the House, but he is not in his usual place.

The two amendments amend the definition of a qualifying member to allow access to the financial assistance scheme, regardless of when the scheme began to wind up. We have yet to consult on the detail, but I believe that we will probably need a cut-off point, both to make an assistance scheme administratively feasible and to have some certainty about the funding arrangements. Indefinite backdating is simply not practical. Our current thinking is that the financial assistance scheme should cover schemes that began winding up after April 1997. That date is significant because it was the implementation date of key provisions of the then Government's 1995 Pensions Act. Any starting point must bear a relationship to that important Act of Parliament.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Malcolm Wicks: I was about to ask my right hon. Friend to withdraw his amendments. I shall now give him the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Field: From what we have heard so far, I shall certainly not. The Minister's case just does not stand up. When he argued, in response to my right hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Alan Howarth), that we should not cover every risk, including Equitable Life, he put forward only one reason, which was that we are dealing largely with people who had to join a scheme as a condition of employment. People such as me, who joined Equitable Life, had no such condition imposed on them. The nearer to date that he takes a cut-off point, the greater the chances will be—given the changes that the Conservatives made—that members had a choice as to whether to join a scheme. The further back we go, the more likely it is that they will have had to join. So, on the Minister's own evidence today, he should be arguing the very opposite case. We should be less concerned with those who more recently lost out, and more concerned with the others, because the further we go back, the more we find that joining a scheme was a cast-iron condition of employment: people had to be in a pension scheme if they wanted a job.

Malcolm Wicks: We shall have the opportunity to look at these issues and consult on them, and I shall obviously be happy to talk to my right hon. Friend about them. There are practical difficulties relating to the question of how far we go back. Obviously, the money will stretch less far if we keep going back for decades. There is some significance to the change of regime following the 1995 Act, which is why we think that any starting point should bear some relationship to that.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): If my hon. Friend is relying on a key date that was triggered by an Act that he now recognises as flawed, is not that an illogical date to choose? If there has to be a date—I do not think that there should be—would it not be better to choose the date on which the 1995 Act received Royal Assent?

Malcolm Wicks: Clearly, there must be some date. The point at which the key provisions of the 1995 Act come into force is important. May I emphasise to my hon. Friend that I have said that I feel that a starting point must bear some relation to the 1995 Act? We have an open mind, not an empty mind, on that. If he reads our amendment carefully, he will see that it is deliberately drafted in broad terms as an enabling measure. I hope that he will take some comfort from that.

2.15 pm

The amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) would require the financial assistance scheme to begin making payments within six months of this Bill coming into force. I have already explained the milestones that we are setting to make sure that we have a body in place by this time next year and to make payments as quickly as possible thereafter. Including a deadline for payments in legislation at this stage of design, however, could lead to wasted effort and a poorly administered scheme. We would be doing nobody any favours by rushing these proposals through, least of all the very people whom we are trying to help.

The second amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Northavon would allow schemes that are closed while the sponsoring employer is solvent to qualify for the financial assistance scheme. The term "closed scheme" is generally applied to schemes that are still operating, albeit closed to new members. I assume that he was referring to schemes in wind-up. If so, the amendment would allow schemes that wind up underfunded, but with a solvent employer, to qualify for assistance under the proposed assistance scheme.

At this point, it might be helpful if I were also to deal with the amendment tabled by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead to that amendment, which would limit the qualification to solvent schemes that wound up prior to 14 May 2004. One of our key concerns has been to ensure that solvent companies remain responsible for their pension provision. A pension promise made should be a pension promise honoured. We have introduced regulations that can be used by trustees of schemes that started winding up after 11 June 2003. Those regulations place a debt on solvent employers to pay the full costs of members' benefits if their pension scheme is wound up. Solvent companies must be held responsible for the pension provision that they have arranged.

The third amendment put forward by the hon. Member for Northavon would set the level of assistance at no less than the amount that would be provided by the pension protection fund. All of us want to ensure that the people who will be helped by the financial assistance scheme receive meaningful levels of benefit. The final level of assistance that can be provided will depend on several factors, such as the number of claims that are submitted, the final size of the fund and the method of delivering assistance. At this stage, however, it seems unrealistic to expect that assistance will be set as high as future pension protection fund levels, as in future members will benefit from cover paid for by a premium to the pension protection fund.

In the light of what I said, I would hope that my right hon. Friend and the hon. Gentleman might consider withdrawing their amendments. Those are all the amendments to the Government proposal to set up a financial assistance scheme.

The amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) relates to the pension protection fund. It would, in effect, make the pension protection fund retrospective. It provides an apparently simple answer to a complex problem—[Interruption.] He says from a sedentary position that that is not necessarily a bad thing. He normally reverses that by providing complex answers to simple problems. However, the pension protection fund will be financed through a levy on occupational defined benefit and hybrid occupational pension schemes. Retrospective cover would mean that this levy would be required to meet unknown and potentially very large liabilities. It is possible that those additional costs could threaten the viability of the fund itself. In addition, it would be unfair to place such a disproportionate burden on levy payers who are running schemes. We have always maintained that the new fund is similar to an insurance scheme in some respects: it should not cover people against events that have already happened. In view of what I have said in setting out the Government proposal, I therefore ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw his amendment.

Finally, I should like to deal with some small amendments to clauses 265 and 273 that are consequential on proposed new clause 34. The amendments to clause 265 simply add the financial assistance scheme provision to the list of provisions that may be modified by regulation—if necessary—when being applied to either a hybrid or a multi-employer scheme. The amendment to clause 273 will add the financial assistance scheme provision to the list of provisions that require use of the affirmative procedure for any statutory instrument made under them, for the reasons I have just given.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): I apologise for not being here at the beginning of the Minister's speech. I had duties elsewhere.

I understand the Minister's wish to be careful about open-ended commitments that would expose the Treasury to huge amounts of liability. Let me remind him, however, that the Lord Chancellor's Department—the Department for Constitutional Affairs—has encouraged access to the courts through what is called "after-the-event insurance", which underpins something called "conditional fee arrangements". It seems to me that the principle that the Department has opened up applies directly to the recovery of lost pensions. The Government are now setting up an after-the-event insurance scheme. The problem for my constituents, many of whom have worked for British United Shoe Machinery, is that the system will not—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman will soon be bringing his intervention to a close.

Mr. Garnier: I shall do so immediately, Madam Deputy Speaker. The problem is that the system set up by the Minister is nowhere near adequate to protect my constituents, including those who have worked for BUSM, who have seen their pensions disappear.

Malcolm Wicks: Naturally, I anticipated that question. I could give a very lucid answer, but given the lateness of the hour and the disruptions we have experienced, I wonder whether the hon. and learned Gentleman would allow me to write to him—after I have taken advice from my learned friends, of course.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is not just a matter of sympathy in cases such as this? We are talking about defined benefit schemes, not defined contribution schemes. The benefit was supposed to be a promise. As late as 2002, the Financial Services Authority's "guide to the risks of opting out of your employer's pension scheme" stated:

> "Some types of employers' schemes (the ones called 'final salary' or 'defined benefit' schemes) give you a guaranteed pension. The amount of pension you get from a personal pension is unpredictable".

That makes it pretty clear why the state has some responsibility to act, regardless of whether it is set down in legal terms.

Malcolm Wicks: I agree, and it is important to remember that many people had to join a pension scheme as a condition of employment.

A significant number of Members on both sides of the House have represented constituents in dire straits very ably, but I think my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West deserves a special mention as a parliamentary champion of this group of workers, and indeed as a parliamentary hero—[Interruption.] One among many, I am sure.

Opposition Members made fun of my confusing stepping stones with milestones. Let me say that one step for our Department is a giant step for our Department.

I can assure the House not just that we have the outlines of a plan, but that we have drawn up a clear route march towards implementation. By the end of May we shall have established our relationship with key partners, including trade unions, as all levels. Over the summer we will be doing critical work on the design of the scheme so that by the end of November we will be able to consult on regulations. By the spring of next year—just one year away—we will have a scheme in existence, with a view to being able to make the first payments as soon as possible.

We have a clear plan for the future with the pension protection fund, but there is a current and grave pensions injustice. Our proposals will bring support to decent, hard-working people—those whom I describe as proper people—and I commend them with enthusiasm to the House.

Mr. Willetts: The fact that we are debating these proposals today is a tribute to pressure from Members on both sides to help the 60,000 people who have been affected by the winding up of their pension schemes. I am pleased that, even at this late stage in the process, we now have something from the Government. We have an obligation to help the people affected.

I see the three most powerful arguments for giving help as follows: first, the human distress that many people are suffering as a result of their pension being so much less than they had hoped for; secondly, the effect on everyone's confidence in saving for their pension if they see the horrific experience of those 60,000 people endlessly repeated; and thirdly, as the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan) quite rightly mentioned, the public statements that have been made by a variety of public institutions that saving in a company final salary pension scheme is in some sense secure, safe or guaranteed. Those expressions were thrown around. Looking back, they were thrown around rather too lightly, but people took them seriously. That is why they are particularly angry.

David Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman take this opportunity to confess to the House whether during Prime Minister's questions earlier today, when his party leader claimed credit for the change that the Government are now introducing, he felt just a scintilla of embarrassment at the fact that his party had opposed Second Reading?

Mr. Willetts: If the hon. Gentleman looks at the reasoned amendment we tabled when the Bill came to the House on Second Reading, he will see that one of the specific reasons that we gave was that it did nothing to help the 60,000 people who had lost out as a result of their pensions winding up. That was specifically set out in our reasoned amendment because it was one of the big omissions from the Bill. We are pleased, even at this late stage, that that matter has been tackled.

Mr. Watts: May I remind the hon. Gentleman that many Labour Members have been campaigning for more than two and a half years on that issue? It seems to me that the only time when the Opposition joined the campaign was when they thought that the Government were going to concede and provide compensation to that group of workers. Does he agree?

Mr. Willetts: If I may say so, we have had several debates on this specific subject, which Opposition Members have raised over a long period. It might well be the case that it was the intervention from my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition that finally clinched the matter. There were then panic meetings among the Chancellor, the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State. The—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The House must come to order.

Mr. Willetts: The Prime Minister ran from this Chamber last Wednesday and asked why it was that nothing had yet been done.

John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland) (Lab): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I would ask you to rule on the remark that the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) has just made. The Prime Minister was ushered out by the Secretary of State for Health after something was thrown down into the Chamber. The fact of the matter is that it was the Leader of the Opposition who would not come back and take the drubbing that he was getting from the Prime Minister at Question Time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order for me. This is an important debate and many Members in the Chamber want to contribute to it. We should proceed as quickly as possible. I call Mr. David Willetts.

Mr. Willetts: Perhaps I could just explain that I was referring to events last Wednesday. That was when my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition raised this point, and it was after that, later on in the day, that there was a meeting of Ministers.

2.30 pm

Mr. Hogg: May I press my hon. Friend—I should point out that he supports the provision—on the principle on which the Government are operating? In the past, assistance—to use a consensual word—has always been given when Government agencies were at fault, an example being the Barlow Clowes affair. It is far from clear to me that ring-fencing is possible. The question has been raised of Equitable Life members. Where lies the distinction in principle between them and the people is question?

Mr. Willetts: It appears that people were led to believe by various public bodies that their defined benefit schemes were in some sense guaranteed or safe. It has been asked whether the legal case, in which this point will doubtless prove important, will be pursued. This could indeed still be a matter for the courts.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Willetts: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Cardiff, West first.

Kevin Brennan: In the case of Equitable Life, members chose to put their money into that scheme because they thought that it was offering the best rate in the market. No Government agency promised them that their pension was secure or guaranteed.

Mr. Willetts: It would be a great pity if one group of Members in this House argued that we should help the victims of pension wind-ups and do nothing to help the victims of Equitable Life, and another group argued the opposite. Both sets of victims have a case—although they are different cases—and both give rise to the question of whether public bodies have, on occasion, misled people or failed to discharge their obligations.

Mr. Savidge: Does the hon. Gentleman remember that Labour Members asked questions about this issue a fortnight and three weeks before the Leader of the Opposition raised it, and that the Prime Minister made clear his intentions? The phrase "jumping on bandwagons" comes to mind.

Mr. Willetts: The trouble was that although the Prime Minister said that he was going to do something, nothing happened. We have pursued this issue for a long time and we have raised it regularly; indeed, we debated it last year and in February of this year. It was the Prime Minister's failure to pursue the rather confused assurances that he gave during the two preceding Prime Minister's questions that caused the Leader of the Opposition to raise this issue, which finally led to action being taken.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Willetts: I want to question the Minister about his proposal, so once I have given way to the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), I shall try to make some progress.

David Taylor: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way yet again; he is being most generous. He is trying to establish the logic that, because the Leader of the Opposition raised this issue last week and the announcement was made subsequently, those two incidents are somehow connected. Given the brain that the hon. Gentleman is reputed to have, he will doubtless be familiar with the post hoc, ergo propter hoc logical fallacy. Does he acknowledge that, in fact, pure coincidence and undiluted opportunism have led to the Leader of the Opposition's attempt to claim credit?

Mr. Willetts: The Secretary of State is welcome to intervene if he wishes to correct this account, but according to one newspaper, when the Prime Minister left Prime Minister's questions last week—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The tenor of this debate is becoming very repetitious indeed. We are discussing Government new clause 34 and I advise Members to address their remarks to it.

Mr. Willetts: After I have finished this point, Madam Deputy Speaker, I will indeed try to make some progress. There were specific accounts of the Prime Minister leaving Prime Minister's questions last week, phoning the Chancellor to ask why nothing had yet been done, and calling a meeting—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have already ruled on this. May we please discuss the new clause that is before the House?

Mr. Willetts: I was responding to a challenge, but I shall of course follow your strictures, Madam Deputy Speaker, and try to make some progress. This issue is in fact very relevant to the new clause. Labour Members are saying that this campaign has gone on for a very long time and that they have pressed for action for ages. But whenever people have pressed for action—as we have done—the Secretary of State has always come up with the same sort of answer. In March, he said:

"We are exploring with industry representatives the basis on which we can establish . . . the extent of the problem, the number affected".—[Official Report, 2 March 2004; Vol. 418, c. 764.]

Earlier, in an Opposition debate in February, he said that it was "important to have a clear idea about how and where boundaries could be placed around those who would be eligible."—[Official Report, 24 February 2004; Vol. 418, c. 212.]

We have already heard those answers, implying that the Secretary of State was doing lots of work behind the scenes to try to tackle the problem. If he has been doing all that hard work behind the scenes, why has he ended up with the new clause before us today? It does not answer any of the technical problems that he claimed he was busy addressing and studying. He could have tabled the amending provisions before us today a year or even two years ago. This evinces no progress whatever in tackling the problems or establishing the evidence, which he claimed was the only reason why amending provisions could not be tabled sooner.

I understand why sometimes quick and dirty, and sometimes long, slow and carefully considered, amending provisions are necessary. This new clause, however, has been turned out very slowly, but it has not been carefully considered and offers no detail on the scheme—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. There is far too much noise in the Chamber.

Mr. Willetts: The new clause appears to have been cobbled together at the last possible moment, without answering any of the questions that the Secretary of State has told the House for the past 18 months had to be studied before he could take any action. The question before us now is why such a thin new clause has been tabled at such a late stage, and which does not answer any of the relevant questions.

Let me put to the Secretary of State some of the questions that he has told the House for the past 18 months that he has been busy studying. First, we have heard various suggestions that he will restrict his assistance to pension rights accrued pre-1988 and to people who joined pension schemes pre-1988, when it was indeed possible for companies to make membership of a pension scheme compulsory. That was changed in the Social Security Act 1986 and after 1988 no one had to be a member of their company pension scheme. People may not have realised that there had been that change because their contract of employment may have appeared still to require compulsion. Is the Secretary of State contemplating some restriction so that the provisions would apply only to those who were compelled to join schemes or who built up rights pre-1988? That issue has been discussed for a long time, so can we have some indication of the Government's thinking?

Secondly, what about the scale of the losses? Are the Government intending to provide more assistance for the people who lost most or are they thinking of targeting people with substantial losses? Will there be a minimum loss, below which people will not receive any assistance? That seems to me to be an elementary question to ask of any compensation scheme. Again, can Ministers please respond to that question?

Thirdly, what about the use of the pension protection fund itself? I do not believe that the Minister for Pensions fully captured the purpose of our amendment. It is not our intention to make the levy in the PPF the basis for funding the assistance retrospectively. We fully understand that the new insurance scheme has to operate for the future. Our point is different. An institution is being established, which will deal with the assets of insolvent pension funds. I presume that some expertise will be built up to help people whose pension funds have wound up.

The Minister referred to the obvious ways in which new help could be provided and mentioned the possibility of his Department setting up a separate institution. What he missed out from his list of possibilities was the most administratively simple way of proceeding—setting up a separate compartment within the overall structure of the PPF that would receive the Department's funding and take in the assets of the companies that are winding up their pension schemes, enabling them not to have to purchase annuities. We would like to hear more from the Minister about that. Such a body could then administer the assistance programme that he is announcing. I am genuinely baffled as to why Ministers are ruling out using an institution that is being set up by the Bill before us.

I do not know why it is all so difficult. Is it because the Secretary of State, in broadcast media interviews, appeared to rule out the PPF being used in that way and does not want to go back on it? Is there any rational reason for inventing yet another institution when the Bill is setting up one that could easily be used for the purpose? We would be grateful for the Minister's guidance on that question.

I would like more detail on the scale of the assistance. Let me offer the House some admittedly rough and ready or back-of-the-envelope figures. Here we go. The number of people affected is 60,000. That figure was first given officially by the Secretary of State in an Opposition debate on this matter earlier this year. The assistance to be provided amounts to £400 million. Dividing £400 million by 60,000 gives me a figure of slightly under £7,000 for every person affected.

I am sure that hon. Members of all parties have had people at their surgeries who have lost that amount every year from the pension that they expected.

Mr. Watts rose—

Sandra Osborne (Ayr) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Willetts: I shall just finish this point, and then I shall give way to the hon. Lady, as I have given way to the hon. Gentleman already.

Each person will get slightly less than £7,000 in total over 20 years, but we know that many people have lost more than that every year. What sort of annuity would a capital sum of £7,000 buy? With luck, it might buy one worth £350 a year. That is nothing like the scale of financial loss faced by many people.

The advocates of early-day motion 200 were not satisfied with our early-day motion 66, but they campaigned for full compensation for the people who had lost out. Many Labour Members put their names to that demand. Do they consider the package before the House today, given the sort of figures that are being used, to be anything like the full compensation that they requested when they subscribed to early-day motion 200? Perhaps the hon. Member for Ayr (Sandra Osborne) will comment on that.

Sandra Osborne: Some of us will want to press the Minister about the percentage that people can expect. Does the hon. Gentleman recall that in the Opposition debates to which he referred, he was extremely reluctant to commit his party to public expenditure of any kind? Now that he appears to support a rescue package, where would the Opposition find the money for it—in the very unlikely event that they became the Government—given the cuts that they intend to make?

Mr. Willetts: The hon. Lady raises exactly the point to which I want to turn. The House, and those Labour Members who signed early-day motion 200, must accept that the Government are in a position of maximum political exposure. I think that they could have faced defeat in the House this afternoon, but they have come up with a package worth £20 million a year for 20 years, to be financed out of public expenditure. We can take it that that is the maximum amount that the Government are prepared to make available to help the people who have been affected. That falls a long way short of the amount of assistance that the announcement led many people to expect. I saw the photographs of ASW workers celebrating on Friday night. They raised their glasses to this great settlement, but I am afraid that, for many people, euphoria will turn to depression when they discover how modest the help is.

As a result, either we have to call for more public expenditure—and I do not believe that we should—or we must turn to the other proposal that is on the table. It is an option that the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) has raised before, and it involves using the unclaimed assets of banks and building societies to make the amount on offer a useful sum. I am clear that the sum of money proposed at the moment will not match the scale of the financial distress that people face, but I do not believe that there is any reasonable prospect that the Government will put in any more money.

Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South) (Lab) The hon. Gentleman has been doing sums on the back of a fag packet. How much does he believe should be given in compensation or assistance to help the 60,000 people who have lost out? Will he clarify the Opposition's position with regard to retrospection? Does he believe that the Bill should contain a provision for retrospection?

Mr. Willetts: The hon. Gentleman says that I am quoting figures that I have worked out on the back of a fag packet. I freely accept that they are rough and ready, but they are more detailed than anything that the Secretary of State has had to offer. The Department for Work and Pensions has worked on the problem for more than a year, but no practical evidence has yet been offered about the scale of the problem.

[Mr. Willetts]

It is very difficult for the Opposition to estimate the scale of the problem. We have been pressing Ministers about the 60,000 figure, which was offered by the Secretary of State when we asked him for an estimate of the number of people affected. Given that we have hit the limit for public expenditure on this matter, I believe that the only way forward is to increase the financial support for people who have lost out by using the unclaimed assets to which I referred. The Chancellor specifically referred to that in the Red Book this year. It states on page 116:

"Where assets and owners cannot be reunited, it is also right that the assets be reinvested in society, as long as the original owners' entitlements to reclaim are preserved."

The Chancellor has his eyes on that money, and the Irish Government have introduced reforms aimed ultimately at claiming unclaimed assets after 15 years.

The House faces a problem today that is as serious as the problem we faced before. In some ways the problem is worse, because many people think—as a result of the announcement and the amendment—that their problems have been solved. Their problems have not been solved. Therefore, either we need yet further public expenditure or we should use the unclaimed assets, and I favour the latter approach.

2.45 pm

Kevin Brennan: Does the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that his calculations assume that all those involved will retire on the same day? The key to the amendment is the ability to take the assets in the pension funds in question and to use them more effectively than simply by purchasing annuities, in order to build a fund. The hon. Gentleman is being slightly misleading in his calculations. As for early-day motion 200, the word "full" does not appear in it.

Mr. Willetts: The hon. Gentleman has been very active on this issue and I would be interested to know whether he regards the new fund as sufficient to address the problems that he has identified. If he does not, what does he think would be a better way forward? I am trying to help him, and other Members on both sides of the House, to identify that. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question!"] I shall answer his question. I agree that it would be much better to continue a scheme rather than to wind it up and require the purchase of an annuity or deferred annuity. Ministers have still not made it entirely clear that they are committed to that course of action, but I agree that it would be better. Indeed, it is something that the pension protection fund will do in future. It is another argument for supporting our amendment.

We will set up one institution under the Bill that will take over the assets and liabilities of pension schemes in wind-up in future, so why does not the hon. Gentleman support our amendment that would add a separate compartment to the PPF to do that for schemes that already have a problem and are in wind-up? I agree with him, but his point is another argument in favour of using the approach that we set out in our amendment.

I know that many hon. Members wish to speak, and I have taken several interventions, but I wish briefly to touch on the Liberal Democrat amendment. It would tackle perhaps the greatest single omission from the Government's announcement—to which the Minister briefly referred—which was the issue of solvent wind-ups. Many hon. Members will have been approached by constituents who have been victims of solvent wind-ups. For example, I have constituents who were employees of Ballast UK. They lost out, but they will receive no assistance under the Government's announcement because the parent international company is solvent. That also applies to former employees of the Dalgety group and a Japanese bank in the City.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): Will my hon. Friend comment on the fact that it is curious that Ballast Wiltshire continues to be able to trade in the Netherlands, despite having so short-changed its UK employees? Does he agree that there is a case for the European Union to look much more seriously at companies that defraud their pensioners in one member state but continue to trade elsewhere in the Union?

Mr. Willetts: The issue first got on to the front pages with Maersk, although that company changed its mind and decided to support the company pension scheme. Maersk would not be covered by the provisions in the Government's amendment, and my hon. Friend makes an important and interesting point.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Will my hon. Friend add to his list the Bradstock group, where there was a solvent wind-up that affects many of my constituents? They feel that the Government's treatment of them is terribly unfair.

Mr. Willetts: My hon. Friend gives another good example of solvent wind-ups that are not covered by the Government's new clause. The purpose of the Liberal Democrat amendment is to cover such people and I fully accept that there was a serious omission from the announcement.

I put the same question to the Lib Dems and to Members on both sides of the House: on what basis might we help the victims of solvent wind-ups? We should help them, and using unclaimed assets is the only feasible or practical way to do so. If the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) can assure us that that would be possible under his amendment, I will look at it sympathetically. What I am not clear about is whether he envisages that the solution is higher public expenditure and, if so, how spending more public money in this case would be consistent with various statements from Lib Dem economic affairs spokesmen about their tax and spending plans. I have never found a reference in those statements to spending more money on the victims of pension wind-ups.

I have looked through the list of Liberal Democrat spending pledges and the victims of pension wind-ups do not appear, although I should be happy to go through the list with the hon. Gentleman because I hesitate to suggest that he may be proposing something with which his colleagues may not agree. As I cannot see help for the victims of pension wind-ups among the Liberal Democrat expenditure pledges, it would be helpful to know whether he regards his amendment as such a pledge.

Mr. Redwood: Is my hon. Friend advising us to support spending £400 million of public money? Is he advising us to support the outline Government scheme, or is he suggesting that the money is inappropriate, that the scheme will not work and that we should, therefore, be against it? I am not quite clear which advice he is giving us.

Mr. Willetts: I am sorry that my right hon. Friend has not found that my comments over the past 27 minutes answered all the questions he may have had about the Government's proposal. The real problem is that we know very little about their proposal. I welcome the £400 million that has been put into the scheme and I am proposing extra assistance, which would not be public money but would use the unclaimed assets of banks and building societies. That would be a constructive way forward that would involve no increase in public expenditure.

Alan Howarth: The hon. Gentleman has indulged in a variety of expressions of sympathy this afternoon. He has indicated that he would not rule out the possibility that it might be appropriate for assistance to be given to the victims of Equitable Life and to the victims of solvent wind-ups. As I agree that there is not the remotest fiscal scope for providing adequate help to all those deserving cases, how is it to be afforded? He suggests that the unclaimed assets will provide what is necessary, but is he not at risk of spending that nest egg several times over?

Mr. Willetts: The House may not face the decision today, but I am sure that as the penny drops about the very limited scale of the Government's announcement Members on both sides of the House will have to decide whether to explain to their constituents, "This is all there is and there is no more", or whether we should aim to do more. I do not claim that we could give 100 per cent., and we certainly need to see the figures. We are still waiting for Ministers to provide them. The money from unclaimed assets that the Chancellor identified in the Red Book would enable us to do more and we could plug a large loophole in what the Government have announced today—namely, the position for victims of solvent wind-ups. That is the proposition that I am putting to the House.

I have two final points about the lessons that we should learn from this unhappy episode. The first is on compulsion. Although I give less weight to it than Labour Members, one of the arguments that has been used is that people are entitled to compensation because they were obliged to join a pension fund. That raises questions about whether it would ever be conceivable to embark on implementing the proposals made by the Secretary of State 18 months ago for forcing people to save. If compulsion is to be used as a basis for Government liability when things go wrong, it seems to me that Members who are using the compulsion argument on this occasion will make it much more unlikely that a future Government would ever be willing to contemplate compelling people to save in any form. I should be interested to learn whether the Secretary of State or the Minister can envisage that Adair Turner, who has been commissioned to look into compulsion, would really make proposals, which they would accept, for compelling people to save, if when people were compelled to save we faced the arguments about Government financial liability that have been put today. That is the first lesson for the future.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): Is not the hon. Gentleman setting up a straw man? Most of the compulsion that has been discussed has been based on models such as the Australian scheme where there would be compulsion to save in a money purchase scheme. The new clause offers no hope of financial assistance for people in the UK who were forced—as some employees were before 1988—to save in a money purchase works pension scheme.

Mr. Willetts: The hon. Gentleman may not be fully reflecting Adair Turner's commission. Nothing in the original statement said that he should look only at compelling people to save in money purchase arrangements; the remit was much wider than that.

My second point on lessons for the future is directly addressed to the Minister of State. Another reason for the obligation we face, to which the hon. Member for Cardiff, West referred—as have I on several occasions—is that people were led to expect that in some sense the money in their company pension schemes was safe or guaranteed. May I, therefore, quote to the Minister some of the things that he and his Department have been saying about the PPF?

A DWP fact sheet published at the same time as the Pensions Bill states that "members can be reassured they will still receive the core of the benefits to which they are entitled".

In Committee, the Minister said that people's pension rights "will be safeguarded" and that "they will get 90 per cent."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 30 March 2004; c. 483–88.]

That is 90 per cent. of the pension they were entitled to expect. With the PPF, the Minister and the Secretary of State are in danger of repeating exactly the same mistake that was made on company pensions. They talk about the fund as though it safeguards, reassures or guarantees, yet we all know that without the Government standing behind it and without the rate of levy that has been suggested, it can offer no such guarantee.

The Minister chose his words unwisely on several occasions in Committee when he was referring to the PPF. If ever the fund cannot provide the 90 per cent. that has been promised, the Minister has already said sufficient for future Members to come to future debates in this place and say that Ministers told people that they would get their 90 per cent. We should all be careful about the words we use when talking about pensions and I am sorry to say that Ministers have not been careful when talking about the PPF in our debates on the Bill.

Dr. Jenny Tonge (Richmond Park) (LD): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Have you received notice from the Foreign Secretary that he will come to the House to make a statement about the deteriorating situation in Gaza? We now have confirmed reports that in the last hour the Israelis fired missiles from jet fighters into a peaceful demonstration in Rafah. It is reported that about 20 people were killed and more than 40 were seriously injured. The demonstration was peaceful and had been organised to protest against house demolitions. Many, many women and children were involved.

Is it not time for the Foreign Secretary to come to the House and tell us his plans for action against the Israeli Government—not just fine words of disapproval?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received no such request. Clearly, the hon. Lady's remarks are very serious and Members on the Treasury Bench will have heard what was said.

Mr. Frank Field: I rise to speak to amendments (d) and (e), which stand in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt).

Today is a great day; it is a day of celebration. It is a day that many of us thought that we would not see. The heroes of today's events are sitting below me on the Treasury Bench. Of course, we wish to pursue issues about how complete the compensation fund will be, but we also know that the Freedom of Information Act 2000 will allow us to ask for policy papers on issues of public concern from 1 January next year. So when I ask for the papers on 1 April next year, on the whole saga of trying to get justice for those workers who lost their pension funds, I have no doubt whatsoever that riding on white chargers from those papers will be my right hon. and hon. Friends who are now sitting on the Treasury Bench. We will be able to celebrate their success then, as we are celebrating it today. Of course, I am sure that that will not affect how they view these issues as we finally see this matter through to the statute book. I am sure that, as decent comrades, they will ensure that other Ministers know that a lot of us will be pressing for the policy papers and to know who said what and who does what in the final stages of the analysis.

I also want to compliment those on the Treasury Bench on their confidence and on the graceful way they have approached the debate—there has been nothing of trying to be too clever about it; there has been no arrogance about it—for it is now two and a half years since I was trying to put on the statute book a Bill that covered all these issues and more, and those on the Treasury Bench were blocking it. Of course, we now know that they were spending almost every minute of the day trying to find answers to all the questions that we have been posing. What have we experienced? We have not had clever little Dicks jumping up, reciting answers to all the questions that we have been posing during the past two and a half years. They have been nonchalant; they have been laid back; and they have been careful. Indeed, they have not bragged at all that they have done one iota during the past two and a half years. So I want to thank those on the Treasury Bench for the real stature of their characters, which have been on such good display during the debate.

Mr. Garnier: I, too, should like to join in the congratulations that the right hon. Gentleman is showering on his right hon. and hon. Friends. When he gets access to those policy papers next April, will he be sure to bring with him a carbon-dating machine, so that he can check the age of the pieces of paper on which those policies were written?

Mr. Field: Those people with hearing better than mine will already be hearing the machines at work, shredding various papers that will not be part of the record. That was trying to be humorous; those on the Treasury Bench must not be too worried about that.

The reason why I proposed my Bill more than two and a half years ago was that I have constituents who lost out heavily in the closure of their company. Those constituents worked in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller). Not only has he endlessly raised the issue, along with me, but whenever I have made such moves—albeit as a Parliamentary Private Secretary, which usually prevents him from signing such motions, Bills and so on—he has always signed those measures.

I am not anxious therefore for new clause 34 to be passed, unless the reason why I became interested in the issue—the position of those constituents—is met, but another issue is as important as that of those constituents. The first pension scheme that attracted the attention of the House was the closure of the Belling scheme in Burnley. My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) is not here, but all hon. Members know that candidates of all parties are facing the most serious challenge from the National Front in Burnley.

Are we so naive, so idiotic, so proud and so boastful that we will let a measure go through from which, given what the Minister for Pensions has said, those workers will be excluded? Those workers are largely working-class, male and disfranchised. Is that the message that the House thinks it should send to Burnley in the middle of fighting elections against some of the nastiest people in the business? So when we come to deal with amendments (d) and (e), we need a clear statement from the Minister. He is wrong to say today that the worry about the measure is who may come in from earlier years. That is not the worry. We know most, if not all, the people who would qualify if we ensured that there was no starting date for the new compensation scheme.

The worry is that employers will try to dive-bomb the scheme and drop very large liabilities on to it before it commences. So I hope that we will not have to press amendments (d) and (e) and that the Government will say that they take on board the fact that their one defence against other Labour Members and against helping, for example, Equitable Life is that those workers were compelled to join. Workers from H. H. Robertson in Ellesmere Port were made to join. Workers at the Belling factory were made to join. Therefore, if words mean anything, surely what the Minister for Pensions has spoken about today will cover those workers.

The numbers that will be covered are minuscule compared with the 60,000 that the Government have estimated. So I make a genuine plea—it is a plea not to unbalance the scheme, but for natural justice. If we go ahead with the scheme and exclude small handfuls of our colleagues elsewhere in the country, some of them will become so desperate and do the most awful things to themselves and perhaps their families, as a result of the actions that we take today. I beg the Government to tell us clearly before we deal with the relevant amendments that they will be serious in moving an amendment in the other place.

Mr. Redwood: The right hon. Gentleman has fought a valiant and honourable campaign to get this far. Does he think that £6,700 per person, on average, will be a big enough capital sum? My hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) says that it would buy £350 a year. At most, it would buy £500 a year, on current actuarial tables. Does the right hon. Gentleman think that that is enough; or does he wish that those on the Treasury Bench would come up with a better solution?

Mr. Field: No, of course, I do not think that sum enough. If I had been a little quicker when the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions asked me to withdraw my clause—in fact, it was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey—I should have said, "I will do so on condition that you give Government time for the Bill on unclaimed assets that I introduced a couple weeks ago." Of course, £400 million is not enough. If anything, I am critical of the Government coming up with £400 million. Why should our hard-pressed taxpayers, who are earning away, contribute £400 million, when we could use the large sum that has been lying idle, sometimes for 100 years or more?

I make a plea to the Government. It might go down well among Labour Members to say that the industry should make a contribution. If the Government are serious in that, they are in danger of having their sanity tested. We have charged the industry £5 billion a year in extra taxation. If we think that those who have done well by their schemes to ensure that they are not in deficit will now come up with even more funds to keep someone else's scheme going, we are living in cloud cuckoo land. So by all means make that point if we want to make a party point, but please do not be misled by one's own rhetoric into thinking the industry will come up with the money to save us on this one.

Mr. Watts: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Government today have not accepted liability for the problem, but put in some money to try to restore some confidence in the insurance industry? Surely he would agree that it is in the interests of the insurance industry to do the same, to find some resources and to boost the amount of money available to that vulnerable group.

Mr. Field: As we both come from Merseyside, I am always loth to disagree with my hon. Friend, but I am afraid that I do. The Government have not put any of their money into the scheme. Instead, they have put some of our workers' money into it. So they are using taxpayers' money. It is wonderful that they have made a move to start the fund at £400 million, but it is not their money: it is our constituents' money. Our constituents are also contributing to a pension scheme which, thanks to the Bill, will now be protected not only to a large extent, but for the first time. That is great.

I would love to see the Pauline conversion of this country's financial institutions, but although I hope that I have a long life ahead of me, I do not think that I will live long enough to see that. We have to get other sources of funding, before the general election, if we are to avoid the disgust and hatred of many of our constituents. It is a great start, but in no way are the funds sufficient.

I hope that the Minister will tell us that the Government will find Government time for the Balance Charitable Foundation for Unclaimed Assets Bill. The hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) was right to quote the Red Book. The original Bill for winding up pensions stated that we should pay for deficits by using unclaimed assets. The Chancellor moved those unclaimed assets to a new foundation, the Balance Foundation. That Bill has all-party support. The first charge on that new foundation should be to pay these pensions.

Although it is a challenge for the Government, it is also a challenge for the Opposition. They have said that they support using the huge resources in unclaimed assets to ensure that we do not run amok yet again with people's hopes and expectations of a good payout. I put it to the hon. Member for Havant that if the Government do not find time in their programme to ensure that the Bill on unclaimed assets gets to the statute book, will the Opposition attempt to find a way to adapt the procedure of the House? Instead of having a rant from them—whatever the rant of the week might be—perhaps we could use one of their Supply days to have the Second Reading of the Bill to push it on its way.

Mr. Willetts: The right hon. Gentleman asks me a specific question. We have considered that idea, and it is an ingenious suggestion. It is my understanding, however, that such a debate would appear to be a Second Reading, but it would not have any legal force in practice. It would not be a real Second Reading, but a copy. Although it would be an interesting way to ensure that that important matter is debated, sadly it would not help his Bill on its way. However, it would be an opportunity for us to show yet again how much we support his particular idea.

Mr. Field: If the Opposition spoke more to the Clerks, they might find that the motion on the Order Paper would come very close to a Second Reading motion. More importantly, it would flush everyone out because we would have a vote on whether hon. Members give that priority to unclaimed assets. I leave that with him, as I leave it with my hon. Friend the Minister.

I support the Liberal Democrat amendment (c). It is immensely important that at this stage of the debate, when the ink is not yet dry on the Government's new clause, we apply as much wisdom as possible to determining how we can protect as many people as possible. Those people have done what every Government told them to do—to save and be independent in their retirement—and thought that they were doing the right thing. They have found, however, through no fault of their own, that future wickedly grabbed from them. We cannot let them down.

Bob Spink: Does the right hon. and highly respected Gentleman believe that the unclaimed assets could be used to compensate those people who were victims of solvent wind-ups, such as the Bradstock Group plc, which affected people in my constituency?

3.15 pm

Mr. Field: I do. Those people should be included in the scheme.

Although some of my comments were technical, I hope that for the first time I have been slightly humorous. It is difficult to be humorous in this place if people think that you are not. Neil Kinnock only had to stand up and everyone started laughing. I was pushed into the House by the deputy Chief Whip one day and told to speak. I did not know what the debate was on, and only realised when someone intervened on me. When I got to my feet, I said, "Mr. Speaker, I record reading over the weekend in one of the supplementary volumes to a book on Churchill's life that friends of his were approaching the garden house at Chartwell when they heard the great man say, 'Mr. Speaker, I didn't expect to catch your eye today.' I, Mr. Speaker, did not expect to catch your eye." Not one hon. Member laughed. I am pleased if I managed to put smiles on the faces of Front-Bench spokesmen today.

I do not want my remarks to detract in any way from my thanks to the Government for tabling new clause 34 and to the Ministers for the difficult negotiations that they entered into in order to convince their colleagues that it was the right thing to do. Many of our constituents must have given a big cheer for them. I wish to add my cheer to theirs.

Mr. Webb: When the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) began, I thought that he was giving a whole new meaning to the term "wind-up".

The new clause is a breakthrough. It is the first time that the Government have accepted that it is legitimate to use taxpayers' money to help people who have lost their pensions. It is entirely welcome and I hope that every hon. Member will support it. I hope the House will note the lack of a "but" at the end of that sentence, although there will be one later.

The fact that the new clause exists at all is a tribute to a large number of people. I am not going to turn this into the Oscar ceremony, but the workers and trade unions who have been affected by these issues campaigned tirelessly and deserve great credit. Dr. Ros Altmann, who has not been mentioned in this debate but has in many others, made a huge contribution. She applied her expertise, commitment and compassion in equal measure and brought credibility to the campaign in a way that I have seldom seen before. She deserves huge credit for that.

Many hon. Members also deserve credit. In particular, the hon. Members for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan), for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt), for Ayr (Sandra Osborne), the right hon. Member for Birkenhead and others were successful in campaigning on the matter. I have said in other contexts that the hon. Member for Cardiff, West has bored for Wales on the subject. Speaking as someone who was described in the press this morning as a "nerd", I can think of no higher compliment.

The new clause is an important step forward. It is worth reminding ourselves of how far we have come by reflecting on just one quote. The hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey has raised the subject many times, including in an Adjournment debate in mid-October 2002. In that debate, the then Minister for Pensions, the right hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney), said:

> "My hon. Friend has called for an ex gratia payment to be paid into the pension scheme. I would not like to give him false hope. Indeed, I cannot give him any hope. The Government are not able to assist schemes in wind-up that are underfunded."—[Official Report, 16 October 2002; Vol. 390, c. 441.]

That shows the magnitude of what has been achieved, which is to the immense credit of every hon. Member who has pursued the problem doggedly.

We still do not know what we do have, however. The critical point, and we cannot let Ministers off the hook on this, is whether what we have is a hardship fund—a bit of charity because we feel sorry for those people—or a compensation scheme. The distinction matters. If we are to talk about who should be included, how much they should get and when they should get it, the basis on which we are to pay out that money matters. In my judgment, the new clause needs to be about more than a hardship fund.

Why is there a case for more than just a bit of money, in this case £400 million over 20 years? Why is there a case for more than tea and sympathy and £20 million a year? It is because we are talking about people who have paid into their pension for 40 years but got next to nothing. ASW transferred 30 years' worth of miners' pensions into its fund and lost the lot, because a distinction was not made between money transferred in and money that was there all along. That is not right, and it is not just a question of extending sympathy to people in that position, as I shall explain. The system makes provision for a guaranteed minimum pension—a legal term originating in Government statute—but in that case the guaranteed minimum pension was not guaranteed. The Minister for Pensions made an important point when he said that the Government propose that compensation will apply only to schemes that were wound up from 1997 onwards. It was in 1997 that the Pensions Act 1995 came into force. If the financial assistance that is being offered has nothing to do with Government and is just charity, why is it being offered from the date at which an Act of Parliament came into force?

Mr. Watts: The Government have made it quite clear that the scheme does not offer compensation. They have resisted the notion of liability and have proposed a hardship fund. Do the hon. Gentleman's comments not make it more difficult to try to convince the Government to do something similar in future, because everyone will line up trying to find criteria to extend the help given to a particular group?

Mr. Webb: I do not accept that. We need to ensure that justice is done, but we will not do people who have suffered an injustice any favours if we ask them not to make a fuss about their case because that may prevent other people who have suffered an injustice from getting handouts. That is not a basis on which to draw up a scheme. The Government have asserted that the scheme is effectively a hardship fund, but payment should be made on a basis that dictates certain things about the level and structure of payments.

Mr. Miller: I would like to correct the hon. Gentleman, as the Pensions Act did not come into force in April 1997. It came into force in part when Royal Assent was given on 19 July 1995. "Butterworths" has 26 pages on the detailed provisions that came into force then. There are arguments for drawing a line at any one of those 26 pages, but I would urge the hon. Gentleman to agree with my analysis that either there should be no cut-off date, or it should be the date when Royal Assent was given.

Mr. Webb: I understand why the hon. Gentleman has made that point. The Government chose 1997 as the cut-off date because the changes in the order of priorities on the winding-up of schemes came into force then. It was in 1997 that trustees lost the discretion to divide an inadequate pot more fairly, but it was Government who changed the rules. However, I know where the hon. Gentleman is coming from, and I have a lot of sympathy with the amendment tabled by the right hon. Member for Birkenhead specifying an earlier date.

In 1997, statutory instruments removed employers' obligation to warn of insolvency risks. Because the 1995 Act had been introduced and there was a minimum funding requirement, employers' obligation to tell their workers that the pension fund was at risk when the company was in danger of becoming insolvent was removed by Government. A trail of responsibility starts to emerge, so this is about more than having sympathy for those employees—it is about justice, which is a key distinction.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, West mentioned the Financial Services Authority, which was set up by Government. In a guide to pensions headed "Reasons for joining an occupational scheme if you can" it said:

"In a final salary scheme you know broadly how much pension you'll get. This makes it easier to plan for retirement".

The Green Paper that the Government produced in December 2002 said on page 55:

"Accrued rights ... are clearly protected under pensions legislation and this will remain the case".

Some people are getting nothing, when the Government were telling people only 18 months ago that their rights were protected.

"Occupational Pensions: Your Guide", a document produced in 2003 by the Pensions Service for the Department for Work and Pensions, told people who wanted to know how they could be sure that their money was safe that they were "protected by a number of laws" and that the regulator could

"act quickly to protect your interests".

Successive Governments do not have clean hands on this issue. The regulator, set up by the previous Government in the 1995 Act, issued a guide to trustees which has since been withdrawn. However, it said that the Act

"was intended to increase the security of members' benefits".

It talked about the minimum funding requirement and said that it was "the minimum amount ... that should be in the scheme at any one time ... to meet the scheme's liabilities if it were to be discontinued".

However, schemes that met that requirement did not have enough money to meet those liabilities. The regulator was issuing erroneous information to trustees, and the Government, too, are not completely blameless.

The National Association of Pension Funds is not part of Government, but it issued documentation saying that the schemes were safe. It is reasonable to claim that as Government are part of the problem, more than just charity is required.

Mr. Waterson: I am following the hon. Gentleman's arguments closely. Does he share my surprise that in cobbling together a deal the Government have not obtained a firm undertaking that the European Court case will be withdrawn? Does that not mean that in due course they could put this package in place, the detail of which is still sadly lacking, but end up paying much more if they lose that case in the European Court?

Mr. Webb: I do not share the hon. Gentleman's view. Because this is about justice, if the unions' claim is tried in the courts and they are successful they have every right to pursue it, and should not bought off by this package. I am not suggesting that they were asked to give up their claim, but I do not believe that they should do so.

There are the hands of successive Governments all over this issue. Many of us have had to rely for information on the press, who were briefed by the Department, and the workers. Last night, I went across the road to meet the Dexion workers who were holding a vigil by candlelight. They asked me how much they would get, as it is still far from clear what they will receive. We have queried the difference between the £400 million fund offered by the Government and the cost of full cover, which is estimated to be more than £2 billion. In the Financial Times today, a Government spokesman said that "we are not in the business of paying full compensation. What we are talking about is assistance. We are not guaranteeing anything."

That last sentence is critical. Even today, the Government cannot say what sums are available, so people do not know where they stand.

There is a big gap between the figure of £400 million to be paid over 20 years, equivalent to £20 million a year, that the Government have come up with and Dr. Altmann's estimate of £76 million to be paid over 30 years, or £2 billion in total. We do not know the precise figures, but there is clearly a big shortfall, giving rise to problems of timing, cover and level, the subjects of our three amendments. Amendment (a) deals with timing and says that payments should be "made within six months of the coming into force of this Act".

We tabled the amendment last week to try to get the Government to say something on the record and stop the date drifting. We have received some reassurances from the Minister, who said that a scheme would be in place this time next year. If things are ready to roll then, it would be about six months after the measure comes into force, so we shall not seek to press amendment (a) to a vote.

Cover is a problem, though. If the true cost of covering the 60,000 workers is £2 billion-plus, but the Government are offering only £400 million, there must be big exclusions, including people who work for solvent companies. The Government have prevented that problem from arising in future, because they have introduced provisions which, from last June, mean that solvent employers cannot close a scheme unless there is enough money in it. I hope that amendment (b), which the right hon. Member for Birkenhead tabled to our amendment, is not necessary, but there are cases historically in which people have been members of schemes closed by a solvent employer, where the minimum funding requirement was satisfied but there was not enough money in the fund to pay people full pensions. Those workers are as unfortunate as people who work for a company that goes bust, and should have the same rights as them. If people work for a solvent employer and the scheme is closed against their will, they have not suffered less injustice than people whose scheme is closed because the employer goes out of business.

Mr. Frank Field: The hon. Gentleman says that he hopes my amendment will be unnecessary and will not be pressed. Will he put that question to the Government, to ensure that his interpretation is the same as the Government's interpretation of what the law will be, which will make my amendment unnecessary? If the Government cannot give that assurance, he may think my amendment is necessary.

3.30 pm

Mr. Webb: Yes. To sum up on that point, my understanding is that no new solvent employer can now close an underfunded pension scheme because of what the Government legislated back to 11 June, so if we include solvent employers in the financial assistance scheme, there is no danger that new solvent employers will close their schemes, as the Government have separate provisions to prevent that from happening. That is my understanding of the implications of our amendment. It would be helpful if the Minister could confirm that when he responds.

Mr. Drew: The hon. Gentleman will know that I am about to raise the issue of Lister-Petter, whose employees he shares. The decision may not be taken by the employer. Where there is an administrator, it may be the administrator who takes the decision on the pension fund. If there is no suitor willing to come in and take over the company, including taking over the pension fund, an insolvent pension fund will have to be closed. I shall seek clarification from those on my Front Bench, but I should be interested to hear the hon. Gentleman's views on that circumstance. It could be doubly unfair to the work force, who could be losing their jobs, as well as their pensions.

Mr. Webb: That has always been the infamous double whammy that people suffer in such cases. They lose their job and, to add insult to injury, they lose their pension as well. The position of solvent employers, parent companies, sub-companies and so on needs looking at. If the Minister can assure us that the Government do not intend to put the solvent employer cases into the present financial assistance scheme but they have other plans to right that injustice, we will not pursue amendment (b) either. In other words, we believe that people who work for solvent employers have suffered a real injustice and it needs tackling. If the Government think there are good reasons why that cannot be done through this scheme but they have plans to do something about it through some other mechanism, that will offer us the reassurance that we seek.

Amendment (c) is critical and comes to the heart of the issue. It states that the level of compensation that people get should match what people will get next year through the pension protection fund. We must remember that that is not full compensation. There are many, Dr. Ros Altmann among them, who say that we are being too soft and that 90 per cent. is not enough—it is a case of injustice and theft, and the figure should be 100 per cent.

We are not going that far. We are asking, "Why should someone who loses out because their employer became insolvent on 31 March next year get perhaps substantially less than 90 per cent. of their pension, while someone who loses out on 1 April gets 90 per cent?" Why should there be that arbitrary distinction? The Minister seemed to say it was because the employer had paid into the levy—into the fund. Where is the case in justice and morality for that distinction? Those are people who have saved all their lives, who have done what they were told, and who have lost out. It is not acceptable that those workers should get less than the amount they would get under the pension protection fund.

The worry is that the figure may be not just a little less than 90 per cent. If the figure of £400 million, compared with £2 billion or something of that order, is right, we could be talking about only half pensions or one third pensions. That would be unacceptable, so we feel particularly strongly about amendment (c), which specifies the level of benefits. The workers over the road and the ASW workers who were celebrating on the television news thought they would get most of their pensions back. It would be a cruel deception. All the way through, the Government have spoken of not creating false hope. It would indeed be creating false hope if workers thought last Friday that they would get their pension pretty much covered, and if it turned out that they would get only half or thereabouts of their pension covered.

Andrew Selous: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Webb: I will not, as I shall try to conclude.

There is a real urgency to the issue. I am told that there are already ASW widows. Members of the ASW scheme have, sadly, died and the widows still do not know what widows' pension they will get. That needs to be sorted out soon. We need clarity. We need these matters to be resolved urgently.

Because we consider the issue to be a matter of justice, I conclude with some words from Andrew Parr, who has been one of the leading figures in the Pensions Action Group. I tried to get his permission to quote him, but I was not able to speak to him today. I am sure he will forgive me for quoting him. Having seen the Government's new clause 34, he said:

"Our aim is not to discriminate between groups. Every affected person should have full restoration of their pension entitlements regardless of company, regardless of date of joining the scheme, regardless of the reason for the scheme wind-up, regardless of length of service and regardless of age."

He continues:

"Nobody told us of the risk we were taking, not the Government, not the FSA, or OPAS, or OPRA, or the NAPF, or our employers. All led us to believe our pensions were safe, guaranteed and protected by law.

We only want what we were promised. Surely that is fair."

This is not about charity. It is about justice, and that should be the basis for payments from the fund.

Kevin Brennan: The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) said that I had bored for Wales on the issue of occupational pensions. May I return the compliment and say that he has nerded for Northavon throughout our debates?

I begin with a comment about the people whom I have tried to represent in our discussions. My hon. Friend the Member—I call him the learned Member; I know that is technically not in order, but he is a professor—for Aberavon (Dr. Francis) yesterday gave me a badge that his late father, Dai Francis, who was a distinguished trade union leader in Wales, had in a drawer at home. The badge says, "Steel must stay in Cardiff". As the hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Adam Price) will know, it dates back to the 1970s, when there was a campaign by some of the same people whom I have been representing. At that time, they were working in a nationalised industry—the steel industry—and certainly thought their pension was guaranteed. Some of them are now close to retirement age.

Those workers are tempered by the heat of battle, as steel men should be, rather than put off by it. That is why they have been so durable in fighting the battle. It has helped me in trying to take up the campaign, along with many other hon. Members, a large number of whom are in the Chamber this afternoon. They are too numerous to mention, but all have made an important contribution.

New clause 34 represents an astonishing victory for the campaign that those workers and workers from other companies around the country have waged on the issue. It is a testament and a compliment to the dignity, steadfastness and solidarity—if I may use some old-fashioned words—shown by the workers who have been faced with the problem. It is a good example of why it is important that people join trade unions. Many of those people were members of trade unions and their trade unions were able, for example, to collect funds, possibly to take a legal case to court, if necessary. That could not have happened if they were not members of trade unions, and it shows the importance of trade union membership.

I have worked closely with the Iron and Steel Trades Confederation and also with Amicus, but other trade unions have been involved. In addition to showing the importance of trade union membership, the campaign has also shown the importance of having a Labour Government. Instinctively, the Government have understood the issue—a difficult, complex issue that they have had to deal with. They have instinctively understood it from day one and have not shut the door on doing something that some people said was impossible at the beginning of the campaign—to get retrospective assistance for those who have been affected.

I pay tribute to the Secretary of State, to the Minister for Pensions and his predecessors, to the Prime Minister for the interest he has taken in the issue, and to the Chancellor, who has disproved one of Churchill's sayings. My right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) earlier quoted Churchill. Another of Churchill's sayings was that the Treasury was the inverse of the Mr. Micawber principle: instead of waiting for something to turn up, the Treasury was waiting for something to turn down. In this case the Treasury has come through and should be complimented. A compliment is due to the Chancellor for his role in bringing about the new clause before us, which permits the Government to use public funds in order to deal with the matter.

I have said all along that I did not mind where the funds came from. I said that in Committee. Unlike some colleagues, I think it is entirely proper that money from general taxation should be available for such purposes. The scheme is right for three basic reasons.

Mr. Waterson: I confirm that the hon. Gentleman said in Committee that he does not mind where the money comes from. Before he moves on, is he satisfied that his constituents, whom he has valiantly represented in discussions and debates, will be fully compensated? If not, is he satisfied by the compensation that they will receive?

Kevin Brennan: I accept that it is not possible to say that full compensation will be paid, and I have never used those words—as the hon. Gentleman, who listens carefully, knows. I am satisfied that the measure is a major breakthrough that will provide significant sums to pay substantial compensation. If that compensation is cleverly combined with the available assets, a significant level of assistance—I should not use the word, "compensation"—should be available. If someone had offered my constituents significant assistance when we started the campaign two years ago, my constituents would have bitten their arm off. I accept that a lot of detail must be worked out, and people are understandably anxious because they want to know what they will get.

The measure is not about fobbing off people, buying off people or fooling people. Indeed, such an approach would not work because workers, other hon. Members and I would return to the issue, and the trade unions would pursue their legal case under the European insolvency directive—that possibility remains if substantial assistance is not made available. I believe that substantial assistance will be made available, although I accept that a lot of the detail must be worked out. The possible legal obligation on the Government under European Union law to protect pensions is one of the three reasons why the measure is right.

The moral obligation to act has been discussed in great detail, and it is not good enough to argue that the matter concerns hard luck. If someone pays into a defined benefit scheme, the scheme's nature means that a pension promise has been made. It is not good enough to say, "We can all walk away. Hard luck if you have worked for 40 years in a company and your pension is taken away from you at the last minute."

It is in the public interest to make the Bill a success. As the Minister says, a cloud has hung over the Bill, which is, incidentally, among the most progressive pieces of legislation to pass through this House for many years. The Bill is about security. The Labour party was invented to provide social security for working people, and that is its fundamental purpose.

The Bill is in the public interest, because some 60,000 people—we will not know the true figure until people come forward—will not go round saying, "Don't believe that the Government will help to protect your occupational pension. Don't believe that your pension is safe, because look what happened to us." If we assist those people, they will say, "We were worried that we would lose our pension, but, at the end of the day, the Government"—in this case the Labour Government—"would not permit that to happen."

We have discussed in detail the difference between occupational pensions and cases such as Equitable Life. One can sympathise with people whose expectations are disappointed, but that is very different from a pension promise backed up both by the permission of compulsion by the state and by the fact that the state, through its agencies, told people that their pensions were secure and guaranteed. When someone chooses to invest in a company, their expectations might be disappointed, but they have not lost a guaranteed pension that they thought would be based on their final salary.

Some questions of detail must be settled, and I am pleased that the Minister set out a clear timetable to resolve some of those issues. I am sure that hon. Members want to raise questions such as the exact point at which the assistance starts, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead and my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) are particularly concerned about that point. I am happy with the Minister's comments on that issue: he has not said that the point at which assistance starts is written in stone and, importantly, he is prepared to consult.

3.45 pm

The various definitions of insolvency raise some issues, and we should make it clear that no one should be left out because of a technicality. We must ensure that we help the people who need assistance.

Mr. Miller: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his sterling work. In supporting new clause 34, does he agree that our party's history, which he mentioned, is one of protecting people who are disadvantaged by an outside body, in this case, pension funds, which is why schemes such as the HH Robertson scheme should be included?

Kevin Brennan: My hon. Friend makes the point eloquently—he has also made it in private meetings with Ministers—and I am sure that his comments have been heard.

Other issues must be clarified. It is vital that the trade unions are involved in the consultations and the setting up and fashioning of the scheme. We must do everything that we can to maximise the value of the remaining assets in the pension schemes that have been wound up or are winding up. We must ensure that the three-year review, which is a key part of the measure, takes place, and the review must act if it finds that the scheme is inadequate and is not providing substantial help.

I do not want to discuss exact percentages today, and the Government are right not to do so. We all know what 100 per cent. of nothing equals—the phrase is too impolite to say in this House—but that is what some workers faced. We must ensure that those affected, especially those who have contributed for many years and who are close to retirement, receive a substantial pension. We all have a duty to help those affected, and I pay tribute to all hon. Members, particularly to those on the Government Front Bench, for their contributions. Most of all, I pay tribute to the workers who have campaigned on the issue.

The scheme is the right way forward. It was always going to be better for the Government to introduce their own proposals, which they have done. I welcome their proposals, and we should all support new clause 34.

Mr. Redwood: I remind the House of my interests, including the fact that I am a pension trustee, but I am not speaking on behalf of that pension trust in this debate.

Those hon. Members who, like me, were involved in past lives with the pensions industry, will know that final salary pension schemes are a great idea if they combine a generous employer with a well-funded scheme. Such schemes can offer extremely good pensions, but we also know that on too many occasions the employer either is not generous or is unable to be generous because of pressures or strains in the business. Despite the formidable array of regulatory controls, interventions and actuarial advice, on occasions the funds in schemes are woefully inadequate to cover future liabilities.

In recent years in particular, when regulation has been intensified, Governments and their regulators have been wrong to give people the impression that final salary schemes are secure and that they are the best way to fund one's pension in all cases. Final salary schemes entirely depend on the generosity of the employer and how much the employer can afford to pay, and many people have been misled. It is ironic that the pensions crisis has developed severely in recent years while the regulatory effort and cost in the system have massively increased. One can waste an awful lot of money on regulation and not tackle the underlying problem, which is the inadequacy of pension payments and of the funds with which to pay them.

Andrew Selous: Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is an unsatisfactory inconsistency in the fact that whenever a member of the public may be about to buy equities there is a warning that the value of those equities could go up and down, whereas that is not the case with pensions? When the chief operating officer of the Financial Services Authority wrote to me in March, he said that he accepted that the risks of a scheme and employer insolvency are not dealt with in every publication about pensions. Does my right hon. Friend agree that people were misled in thinking that such schemes were guaranteed?

Mr. Redwood: They were grossly misled. That is a great tragedy, as is the fact that many of their decisions were made as a result of that.

David Taylor: The right hon. Gentleman assented to his hon. Friend's comments on advice given to those about to invest in a pension scheme. Does he therefore assent to yet more regulation in a speech that is, one presumes, in favour of pruning it back?

Mr. Redwood: I am not assenting to more regulation, but saying that it can be a waste of money and time if it does not address the underlying questions of whether enough money was going into the funds in the first place, whether that money was well managed in such a way as to combat the very real risks in financial markets, and whether there was the right relationship between the employee, the company and the trustees in each case. Clearly, that was not so—the regulators either did not know or did not care.

It would not be possible to design a faultless system that guaranteed, through regulatory devices alone, that people could live in a world where final salary pension promises could be made and always met. We simply do not live in that sort of world. We have to explain honestly to people that there are limits to what one can offer and guarantee, and that there is a range of difficult choices in this field, as in many others, given that we lead our lives subject to risk. Just as one can buy the wrong house in the wrong area and the price can go down, so one can buy the wrong pension. It is unforgivable that regulators should have intervened in those judgments by giving bogus and wrong advice suggesting that a final salary guarantee is a real guarantee that can be met in all circumstances. Any sensible person would know that that is wrong. We have now lived through a series of circumstances in which many well-intentioned companies could not meet that guarantee, let alone those that may not have been so well intentioned and have also been hit by events in the markets.

The purpose of the Government's new clause is wholly admirable. It is a cross-party wish—Members on both sides of the House have made these points powerfully and often—to see something done for the people who have fallen by the wayside because they had been given final salary promises that could not be met, and are going to be broken in a very material way. I am delighted that the Government are proposing to remedy that. However, as other Members have said, £20 million a year is a very small sum of money in relation to the magnitude of the crisis. My hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) pointed out that it equates to an average of £6,700 per person. It might buy an annuity of £500 a year for a person who does not want to index it, so he would have a progressively smaller pension in terms of purchasing power over the years, or £350 a year with increases in line with prices. That is roughly what current actuarial tables would show.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): I wonder whether I might take my right hon. Friend back to the time when he was a councillor in Witney. He may remember the company Early's of Witney, the last blanket maker in the area, which sadly closed in 2002. Although it closed its occupational pension scheme, and pensioners are not getting paid, the ultimate parent company is still operating. Do not the Government need to clarify whether the parent company, in such situations, will be affected by new clause 34?

Mr. Redwood: I am obviously disturbed to hear of the plight of my former constituents as a county councillor and my hon. Friend's constituents, who are well represented. I agree that when the Government work out the details of their scheme, they will need to give a precise view on such questions. As other hon. Members have asked whether it be fair to leave out certain categories of people because of technicalities relating to the timing of their employment and the nature of their fund compared with those of other people, given that they are all suffering from the same basic problem—a broken pensions promise.

The rather small sum of money that each person would get from the purchase of an annuity under the Government's offer is probably not much above the amount that they would get from means-tested benefits, and may in some cases be below it. It would be interesting and useful if Ministers were to clarify the net cost of the scheme to give the House an idea of how generous it really is. It is possible that quite a lot of the £400 million that the Government are proffering, some of which comes from the taxpayer, will be covered by savings on means-tested benefits that would otherwise go to those poor people who had lost their main pension and were on the basic state retirement pension.

We can all agree that more money will be needed. My hon. Friend the Member for Havant and the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) have produced a good way, free to the taxpayer, of augmenting the amount that is available. I hope that Ministers will think about that. It might be a neat way out of their dilemma, as I am sure that they would join me in wishing to offer more support to the wide range of people who are suffering.

I want to explore one other suggestion that, although it is widely canvassed in the House and thought to be part of the answer, might turn out to be another promise that is broken rather than observed—that is, the idea that the appointment of a scheme manager under the new clause could produce better management of the existing assets in these inadequate pension funds, which would somehow transform the position and pay larger pensions to people who have entitlements under those funds. Having been an investment director before I came into this House, I know how difficult it is to guarantee and deliver above-average performance, and how difficult it is to make wise asset choices that will just meet the requirements of a group of people who do not have enough money kept collectively on their behalf, but would like their money to go further to buy them a better pension.

Under the new clause, the choice of the scheme manager would not be easy. Because the funds coming into the scheme are those of insolvent pension funds or pension funds in wind-up, they are very likely to be held almost entirely in the form of holdings in Government or gilt-edged securities—in other words, bonds that repay at a specific date in the future and pay a fixed rate of interest out of the consolidated fund of the country. They are as near to risk-free as one can get, short of putting one's money into a good bank and being able to withdraw it on any day one chooses at no capital loss. The actuarial advice would be that those funds have to be kept like that, given the circumstances.

If the Secretary of State wants to achieve gains over and above those that can be obtained by the current scheme managers, two things will have to happen. First, he will have to ensure that there are regulations for his scheme manager that allow him to take much greater risks with the money on behalf of these people than any investment manager and actuary combination in the private sector would dare take, because they would feel obliged to opt for very low-risk strategies for this category of investor.

Secondly, the scheme manager will have to be much better than most of the investment managers in the City of London, because he will have to get his strategy right to ensure that when markets go down, as they did in recent years, he is not invested in risky assets, and that when markets go up, if they do, he is fully invested in risky assets to try to recoup some of the money. I think that hon. Members immediately begin to see how difficult the situation is likely to be, and how unlikely. I suspect that the Secretary of State would not want the investment and risk rules that apply to his scheme manager to differ from those that apply to the professional scheme managers and investors who are out there at the moment.

However, if the Secretary of State did overcome that hurdle and say to his hon. Friends on the Back Benches, "Yes, you're right—let's have a go and let our scheme manager take some extra risks", the scheme manager would invest in equities, not bonds, because that is the obvious thing to do. They would sell Government stocks and buy equities. If there were three good years in the equity market, everybody would be happy and start spending money; if there were three bad years—perhaps they would be allowed only one—we would be back in this House debating a compensation scheme for the compensation fund because it would have lost more money out of the limited resources that had come into the scheme manager's funds from the failed private sector pensions.

Although it is welcome that the Government are producing a partial answer, we need to know the exact cost to the taxpayer. Clearly, it will not be as much as £400 million. I should like the Government to acknowledge that that sum is not nearly enough to deal with the problem. They should be generous in their definition so that it is fair to the different categories of people who have failed pensions. The Government should understand that there is no way of creating magic money out of existing assets in the failed pension funds. If there were, someone would already have done it.

It is not easy and there is much moral hazard in taking money from other companies or taxpayers to sort out the problems, difficult though they are for the people who are locked into them. I am glad that the Government have begun to understand that they have some liability because the regulators must bear their fair share of the blame.

Mr. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions and their colleagues. If I am honest, after leading the campaign for 22 months with ASW Sheerness, I was not certain even last Thursday that we would get the provision. I appreciate that Ministers worked late on Wednesday and Thursday evenings.

I have received different sets of e-mails. In one category, more than 100 say, "We didn't believe you'd ever do it", and in another, fewer ask, "Is that all?" It has been difficult for the Secretary of State because he knew the compelling arguments but could not say anything because of the moral hazard and could not give us any encouragement. I stress that we are undeniably thrilled even though more work remains to be done.

I pay special tribute to ASW Sheerness workers who have led the campaign, especially Phil Healey, Keith Plowman and Andrew Parr. Andrew Parr set up a website with the rather inappropriate address of pensionstheft.org. It is probably the first internet campaign in British politics that has succeeded in changing a Government's mind. We have a database of thousands of people throughout the country and we have been able to provide a daily update of every meeting with every Minister, adviser or consultant. The campaign has been conducted live on the net and there have been hundreds and hundreds of comments, as there were last weekend after the statement on Friday. Again, I commend Andrew Parr who has done that on his own. It was a considerable effort and I hope that other campaigns will learn from it. It has been profoundly worth while.

I thank the hon. Members for Havant (Mr. Willetts) and for Northavon (Mr. Webb) for their cross-party support. I hope that the Government and the Opposition understand how distressing it was when the Leader of the Opposition rose last Wednesday to claim some sort of control or authority over the issue when we had sought and got cross-party support. My hon. Friend the Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Adam Price) has also been very good and worked with us. Every hon. Member who had a case—120 Members have such cases—believed that there was a compelling morality about the matter. It is pleasing that the Government have accepted that. As a dear old friend said to me on the phone, "Isn't it great to be back in an old Labour Government?" There was a smile on my face when she said it.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend is all right at the moment—there are no Whips around.

Mr. Wyatt: Well, they say that humour is in.

I should like to tease out one or two issues. First, we are delighted that we have got the compensation. Even those who are upset that it is only £400 million acknowledge that it represents a scene shift. I will not mention Teutonic plates—[HON. MEMBERS: "Teutonic?"] I meant tectonic plates. Such a scene shift is important.

Secondly, hon. Members from all parties have questioned whether £400 million is enough. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan) said that there were also assets. Let us assume that, on 30 June, the Minister will have more knowledge and a better understanding of all the schemes and can publish them and ascertain how many need help. If the £400 million means only £2 a day for 60,000 people—I appreciate that that is a crude calculation—and the addition of the assets means £5 a day, there would be genuine disappointment. We must try to resolve how else we can shift money into the fund.

Mr. Webb: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the calculations that Ros Altmann and others made take account of the assets and that all her estimates of the cost of compensation have been over and above the total figure? We must not get carried away into believing that the assets will ride to the rescue and that the £400 million therefore deals with the problem.

Mr. Wyatt: I have worked with Ros in the past 22 months and some of her figures have come and gone a bit. I am happy to wait for the Government to publish their figures so that we can crawl all over them, but I take the hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. Frank Field: Presumably, the Government will publish the figures soon. One worry is that we are not considering free assets because many of them have been turned into annuities. The annuities are appalling compared with people's expectations. There may not be huge amounts of assets, in the normal sense of the term, for pension funds.

Mr. Wyatt: My right hon. Friend knows far more about occupational pensions than me. Twenty-two months ago, I could hardly spell the words "occupational pensions", let alone understand them.

Mr. Tynan: That was in Teutonic times.

Mr. Wyatt: Touché.

It is serendipity, but I had Question 6 at Prime Minister's questions today. I would have congratulated the Prime Minister but asked him whether he would grant parliamentary time for a Bill on unclaimed assets if the £400 million was not enough. We will come back to that dilemma. I ask the Minister what we are going to do if the £400 million is not enough. A reasonable solution has not yet been found.

Thirdly, when will the provision come into effect? The answer is important. When I visited a widow, Mrs. Wade, who lives in Murston near Sittingbourne, she burst into tears. It was terribly distressing. I visited a man, whose name I will not mention, in Halfway in Sheerness. He has not worked since the day he was made redundant and is now clinically depressed. After the statements on Friday, people are nervous about what they really mean.

I hope that the Minister will take my remarks in the right way, but we do not have a fantastic track record on acting after saying that we will deliver something. The Child Support Agency is an example of that. When the Minister says that we will be accepting forms by 5 April 2005, I hope that the machinery will start and that he can reassure us that we have enough support staff to deal with 60,000 cases, which are complicated and require a lot of paperwork.

David Taylor: Does my hon. Friend share my reservations about such activities being put out to the private sector, which includes companies such as Capita? Does he share my hope that the arrangements, which are so necessary and will be so welcome, are kept in-house and not given to the Capitas of the world?

Mr. Wyatt: Capita is a dirty word in my constituency where it runs housing benefit, which is approximately nine months behind. I simply stress that it is important to provide a robust system that will pay the money quickly. Again, I congratulate Front-Bench Members on their actions.

Adam Price (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr) (PC): There has been much talk in the Chamber this afternoon of saints and heroes. The hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt) is a worthy candidate for canonisation for his sterling work on behalf of his constituents. Notwithstanding the earlier dramatic events, it is a good day for Parliament and politics. Politics works when Governments listen, however late in the day; there are legitimate criticisms on the record about that, but it is a good day for the reputation of politics. The Government have responded to what is widely acknowledged to be an important case of injustice, which has caused so much distress to so many people.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I praise the hon. Gentleman's role in this campaign. Do not these events demonstrate exactly what is necessary in our democracy—namely that people should come and see their Members of Parliament? All of us who have supported this measure have reacted because people have come to us with their personal stories, which have had an impact on us. Back Benchers across the House have acted on that and worked with the Government. This is a great demonstration of how we can work together to improve the lives of our constituents.

Adam Price: I agree. I do not want to turn this debate into a mutual admiration society, but the hon. Gentleman makes an important point. Back Benchers, especially on the Government side, have played their role admirably. I think that we would all accept, however, that the real heroes are the workers at ASW and all the other companies involved, who have run one of the most effective lobbying campaigns in the past 20 years. They have changed Government policy not once but twice.

[Adam Price]

The first change was on the principle of a pension protection fund, which the Government had considered three or four times in the last five years and rejected. That has been an important change of mind, and we welcome it. The second change has been on the specific issue of compensation for ASW and other companies. This has been a fantastic campaign, with its imaginative use of technology and its sheer determination. Who would not lose heart if they lost their job and their pension as well? Those workers have not lost heart, however. They have led this fight from the front, and they are heartily to be congratulated on what they have achieved.

I also welcome the further announcements that have been made today. To be fair, the Government have set out a very clear timetable for how they are going to move this issue on. They have confirmed that there will be another opportunity for a vote in Parliament on these measures, on an affirmative resolution. Obviously, we have some doubts about the proposals, and this vote will give us a further opportunity to overturn the Government's majority if they do not come up with the goods, as is right and proper. They have also confirmed that there will be not only an initial review after three years but triennial reviews on an ongoing basis. That is valuable new information. I particularly warmly welcome the fact that the trade unions will be involved in devising the details of the scheme. That gives Members on both sides of the House a degree of comfort as we await the publication of the details.

I believe that the Government had a responsibility in this matter. Reference has been made to the socialisation or nationalisation of risk, but I do not think that that is what has happened here. The Government were responsible because of the European directive that has been mentioned. I met officials of the Iron and Steel Trades Confederation in January last year, to point out to them that legal action had been attempted under that directive at the time of the Maxwell pensions scandal. The directive remained in force, but there had been no action by any Government on this matter—neither the previous Conservative Government nor this one. The directive was ratified in 1980 and member states had three years to transpose it into their own legislation. That never happened. The relevant article in the directive, which I urge Members to read, is very clear and concise in stating that the necessary measures should be put in place to safeguard supplementary company pensions. It could not be clearer.

As we know, we are almost unique in the world in not having some kind of safety net for occupational pensions. The Government have now plugged that gap, but it should have been done 20 years ago. In that sense, I believe that the Government had a responsibility. If it turns out that what is on the table is not going to be adequate, the unions should leave open the option to continue their legal action, because the Government clearly had a responsibility in this regard.

4.15 pm

In the argument about whether there should be a cut-off point—a starting point, effectively—the Government have suggested that April 1997 should be the initial floor for applications. I do not think that that is acceptable, given what I have just said about the directive. Most people would accept that it was the case of Allied Steel and Wire that put this issue on the agenda initially, and I have checked the regulations of the ASW pension fund. The Government are arguing that April 1997 should be chosen because that is the date on which the new rules imposing a requirement on trustees to follow the priority order set down in the Pensions Act 1995 and removing discretion came into force. In the case of ASW, however, a priority order was already in place. The kind of priority order set out in the 1995 Act had already been in existence there for many decades. In that case, therefore, the Act was not relevant.

The problem was the lack of a safety net or insurance system for occupational pension schemes. I know of cases going back to the early 1990s of people who have suffered in exactly this way, and the Government are on very shaky ground, morally as well as legally, in not providing the same level of assistance to employees in pension schemes of companies that became insolvent in 1994 or 1995. I know of one case of a botched privatisation under the previous Tory Government. Following the privatisation, the company became insolvent and the workers lost their pension assets. I also know that the Public and Commercial Services Union—a public sector union—is keen for its members to be afforded the same protection as proposed in the new clause. I therefore urge the Government to look closely at the issue of the starting point again. As I have said, their argument is not borne out by what was in the ASW regulations.

Hon. Members have raised concerns about the amount of money in the fund. Indeed, the Leader of the House hinted in The Western Mail this morning at the possibility of a top-up if the money was found to be inadequate. He said:

> "If we find, in the process of addressing claims, that extra changes are needed, either on the resource or administration front, we will look at that."

Will the Minister tell us whether the Leader of the House had been licensed to go outside Government policy, as he often is, or whether he was reflecting that policy? Are the Government prepared to top up the fund, from whatever source, if they find that it is inadequate? That is clearly what the ASW workers are looking for. They and all the other workers involved have had to endure terribly insecurity and distress through not knowing what their future position would be.

The Government have set out the timetable and I urge them to come up with some hard data as soon as possible, so that we can provide the level of security that those workers deserve. I know that the Minister for Pensions referred in an interview on Radio Wales to workers being guaranteed "the greater part" of their lost entitlement. Now, I am not an expert on the English language—it is my second language and I did not have a classical education—but I think that "the greater part" would suggest more than 50 per cent. Bearing in mind the comments of the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan), I think that we would all expect far more than that. Can the Minister confirm that, at the very least, we shall not see anyone get less than 50 per cent., for goodness' sake?

We in Plaid Cymru and the Scottish National party support the Liberal Democrat amendment. As a bare minimum, we should ensure that people get 90 per cent. of the pension that they were promised. There is a moral and legal case that they should get the whole amount that they expected. Certainly, now that the principle has been conceded, there is no reason why we should not provide the same level of compensation for those workers—who have changed Government policy twice—as we will do in future.

Sandra Osborne: I am aware that other Members wish to speak, so I shall keep my contribution short. I am absolutely delighted to support the new clause, which introduces yet another excellent measure by the Labour Government.

There has been quite a lot of humour in today's debate, some of which has been uncharacteristic. In the previous debate, there was quite a lot of emotion. I spoke emotionally, and I make no apology for doing so. I may have laid it on a bit thick, however, as one of my colleagues said to me today, "Don't worry about today's debate, Sandra. All you need do is burst into tears and you'll get anything you want." That remark may have been slightly sexist, but perhaps I did lay it on a bit thick.

Yet again, I want to highlight the case of the United Engineering Forgings workers. Before I do so, I want to pay tribute to their campaign, which they have carried out for almost three years. I first brought their case to the attention of the House in an Adjournment debate in Westminster Hall almost three years ago. Since that time, they have travelled the length and breadth of the country almost weekly, attending debates here, and holding marches, rallies and even an overnight vigil in Parliament square in the middle of winter—I thank Members who spoke to them at that time. They have picketed the headquarters of Prudential, met the chief executive, and taken part in television and radio interviews. Of course, they have had several meetings with Ministers, for which I am very grateful. Willie Riggins may not yet qualify as a national figure, but he is a familiar figure to my right hon. and hon. Friends, as they have seen him in so many places and at so many different times. It has been my pleasure, as well as my duty, to play a small part in that campaign.

After a time, the UEF workers came together with other workers, including those of Allied Steel and Wire, who had lost their pensions. It is a textbook case of how collective action can work. From the rank and file to trade union leaders, to Back-Bench Labour and other MPs and Ministers, everyone could immediately see the injustice of the situation. The question was: what could be done about it? I know that the Government have taken some time to find out what could be done about it—it is a very complicated issue—but I am glad that they have done so. The only problem is that, at the moment, the Government amendment does not fully answer the questions as to exactly what will be done.

UEF went into administration in June 2001, with a shortfall in its pension fund of £12 million. There were six UEF sites throughout the UK, and more than 1,000 workers. Some of the sites were sold off, but the Ayr site was taken over by a Swedish company, with no final salary scheme. The bottom line is that the UEF pension scheme is being wound up, and all will substantially lose their pensions. No matter what the circumstances are—whether a company goes into administration, receivership or insolvency—employees will either lose their pensions or not, and all cases should be dealt with equally on that basis.

The Secretary of State has promised substantial help—those were his words—but we are all now left wondering what he means by "substantial". The pension protection fund will provide 90 per cent. compensation, and that will be clear to current pension fund members as soon as the Bill is passed. But those who have already lost out were led to believe that their pensions were 100 per cent. safe. Although I very much welcome the Government assistance, it is still incredible that that can happen without anyone accepting actual liability. Everyone who has been affected still cannot believe that that can happen and that there is nothing illegal about it.

As has been stated many times, occupational pensions are part of the remuneration package agreed by employers and their employees. The majority shareholder of UEF was PPMV—an investment arm of Prudential. I eventually received an apology from the Prudential's group chief executive, Mr. Jonathan Bloomer, on the way in which the UEF situation was handled, while obviously not accepting liability.

As stated earlier, we met Mr. Bloomer twice. He offered us tea and sympathy but refused to redress the shortfall in the pension fund. That was scant consolation to my constituents who have lost their pensions, especially as we read continually about the big fat bonuses—and packages if they leave their employment—that Mr. Bloomer and others of his ilk receive. Perhaps now, Mr. Bloomer and others will accept their responsibility in this area not only to the workers but to restore confidence in pensions. They have resisted previously, possibly on the grounds of liability, but making a contribution to this fund would not make them liable, and I call on them to do so.

The UEF case is only too familiar to Members of the House, as I have outlined it previously, but I want an assurance from Ministers that the UEF workers will be accepted as part of the equation for the assistance being made available, and that both they and I will have the opportunity of input to the discussions that will take place shortly.

I also want to take the opportunity to speak for those who are not members of trade unions because their company did not have a recognised trade union: for example, workers of the Dexion group. Many of those were at managerial level and worked in companies that have never recognised trade unions. I suspect that they very much regret that now. If there is one lesson from this, it is that every worker should join a trade union.

One of the worries about the Government's amendment, because it is an enabling amendment, is that it tends to raise more questions than it answers. We urgently need those answers. I am happy that the Minister has outlined a set process that the Government will follow to bring forward those answers, with a time scale. I hope that the Secretary of State has not done inadvertently what he always said that he would not do—to raise false hopes among the workers. For those of us who have campaigned on this issue, last Friday's announcement was like manna from heaven. Of course it raised expectations—it was bound to do so—and it is perfectly reasonable that people want to know the scope of the assistance available. We all understand how complicated the situation is, but we cannot leave people in limbo with no indication of how it will work. I hope that the Minister's road map to resolve the situation is much more successful and has a quicker effect than the other road map about which we heard on a point of order earlier.

The Secretary of State has said time and again that a pension promised should be a pension delivered. We have seen a great step forward today in delivering that promise in a situation of great injustice. I very much welcome that, and I congratulate the Secretary of State on it. I said in the previous debate that if anyone could do something about this matter, it was the Secretary of State, and I thank him very much.

Sue Doughty (Guildford) (LD): I want to keep my remarks short. First, I apologise for not having taken part in these debates previously, because I did not have a constituency need. More recently, however, we have had a major problem.

Hon. Members will be familiar with Dennis buses, which we used to see on the roads as a key part of the London transport strategy, and which are now marketed as part of TransBus. That company collapsed, as part of the Mayflower collapse, in April this year. Even now, many of my constituents in the Dennis Group pension and assurance scheme still do not know the extent of the damage done to their pension. Loyal employees who enabled the company to do great things were forced, as part of their conditions of employment, to join a scheme that has now collapsed around them through no action of theirs.

4.30 pm

I received a letter from a woman constituent—as all Members know, women have had a difficult time with pensions over the years—who had to plead to join a scheme for which, as a part-time worker, she had initially been ineligible. Having joined it, she had to find a lump sum with which to buy the years of pension that were missing. Now she has been left high and dry. Another tragic case involves someone with years of service who joined a share save scheme and was also with Equitable Life. It is just not fair.

I am grateful to the Government for listening to Members' concerns and taking them on board, but I am still worried about the size of the fund. I shall not repeat all that has been said today, notably by my hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb), but I am concerned about the Dennis Group pension assurance scheme. There are 130 contributing members, 305 deferred members and 150 pensioners. The trustee has calculated that the buy-out cost for just that number would be £24 million. The same trustee is handling another fund whose buy-out cost would be £80 million. All these sums will add up.

I look forward to the work that the Government are doing to put flesh on the bones of their proposals, and make this a scheme that will bring about justice. Employees such as my constituents who have given a lifetime's service to their company and made it a great business do not deserve to be treated like this.

I wrote to the Minister, who replied just before last week's announcement by the Government. I was initially depressed, because he wrote a very cautious letter about meeting people, and I thought that it was a Government cop-out. At the end, he wrote:

"It would be very cruel to raise expectations for these people who have suffered such a dramatic blow to their security in retirement if the Government cannot then provide assistance."

What I want is for the Government to provide full assistance, and to make this into a full fund so that we can give real help to people who have given a lifetime of service. I think particularly of the women who had to fight so hard for a decent pension scheme, only to see it fall away from them.

Mr. Miller: I want to put my speech in context—the context of the fantastic work being done by a Labour Government.

In 1995, the right hon. Member for Hitchin and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) said:

"We believe that a levy on schemes is more appropriate since the benefits of well-regulated schemes accrue only to members and employers. Many taxpayers are not members of schemes, so why should they pay?"—[Official Report, 24 April 1995; Vol. 258, c. 527.]

The Tories were fundamentally opposed to allowing the public to pick up the liabilities from schemes.

Last week, during Prime Minister's Question Time, the Leader of the Opposition said:

"this Government have introduced legislation—to deal with a problem that has arisen under this Government."—[Official Report, 12 May 2004; Vol. 421, c. 352.]

That is entirely wrong, as we know from today's debate. I am on record as congratulating the hon. Member for Solihull (Mr. Taylor), who started the serious fraud investigation into the HH Robertson case. My right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) mentioned a case in Burnley. Early-day motion 308 in 1992 proves that the Leader of the Opposition was being opportunistic. That is a polite way of putting it; it may have been worse.

I have had a close interest in the HH Robertson case for a long time. There are now more than 1,000 entries for it in Hansard. I thought at one point that my hon. Friend the Minister of State was airbrushing it from history. I hope that he will not do so, for reasons that I shall try to explain. The alleged "white knight" who took over the company and then asset-stripped it left the pension fund £5 million short. After a two-year fraud squad investigation, the Serious Fraud Office could not bring criminal proceedings because—as we all know—intent is so hard to prove in such cases. In the meantime, the occupational pension fund became insolvent.

Soon after the change of Government, successive pensions Ministers—and other Ministers—engaged in constructive dealings on the case, as did the hon. Member for Solihull, but we were all stuck with the law as it stood at the time. In 1998 the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells), then Under-Secretary of State for Competition and Consumer Affairs, wrote to me:

"That organisation"

—the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority—

"has however been unable to deal with the issues at HH Robertson simply because of the timing and I do not see grounds for a further consideration of the law at the moment."

Similarly, the then Minister of State for Social Security, the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), wrote:

"I am aware that this response is not what you would like to hear. I must reiterate, however, that the Government is not the guarantor of private pension funds and does not see its role as one of intervening in the debt arrangements of private companies."

That position was accepted by successive Governments because we, as a House, had failed in our responsibility when passing the Pensions Act 1995. We thought that we were creating an environment in which pension schemes would be safer for our constituents in future. It is on the basis of our failure that we should now look again at the Royal Assent that the Act received.

Mr. Waterson: The hon. Gentleman rightly mentions the 1995 Act, which established a minimum funding requirement. For the sake of completeness, however, he ought to remind the House that this Government have twice diluted the MFR since taking office.

Mr. Miller: If the hon. Gentleman accepts with me that we failed in the 1995 Act, I may accept one or two things from him.

The HH Robertson scheme was wound up in the spring of 1997, before what is perceived as the magic date of 6 April. There were suspicions that it was being brought forward to avoid the consequences of the 6th, and I can produce evidence for that.

I hope that Ministers will note what has been said today, and will not have a fixed date in their minds. The date needs to be flexible so that the results of evidence and research can be taken into account. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will bear it in mind that the breadth and depth of the scheme, how far it goes back, whom it covers, and the level of compensation remain matters for negotiation and discussion with all the stakeholders.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): My concern arises from the plight of my constituents who worked at the IFI factory in north Belfast, formerly Richardson's, and that of workers at TKECC in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson), who has led a doughty battle on their behalf. Those workers were devastated to find that their hard-won pension savings, building up a nest for their retirement, had been snatched away from them through no fault of their own.

I welcome the fact that new clause 34 has been introduced today by the Government. An important step has been taken, and I pay tribute to all who have played a major role in bringing this day about, including the hon. Members for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan) and for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt), and others. I raised the matter in relation to my constituents in the Northern Ireland Grand Committee on 29 April, but I will not follow the example of some others and therefore claim credit for the Government's announcement today.

I welcome the fact that the announcement has been made. The majority of the 200-plus employees at Richardson's IFI in Belfast gave 20 or even 30 years of service, and a significant number gave even more. However, within five years of reaching their retirement, they were told that they had no jobs and, worse still, that their pensions were being put in serious jeopardy. There were similar considerations in the case of the TKECC plant.

The hon. Member for Ayr (Sandra Osborne) mentioned the emotions that were evident on Second Reading. I was present during that debate although, unfortunately, I was not called to speak, and I think that emotional is the right description of it. We are dealing with people, many of whom have worked all their lives, who are genuinely devastated and destroyed, with their families, by the terrible plight that they are in. If emotions were not raw, and Members were not standing to express and display those emotions on their constituents' behalf, we would be failing in our duty to them.

As the hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Adam Price) said, politics has worked. Parliament and the Government have been shown to have responded on this issue. That is absolutely right, although there are questions over the extent of the compensation or assistance. There are serious questions to be asked in that regard. I join other hon. Members in urging the Government to go as far as they possibly can in giving full compensation to this group of workers. It is absolutely wrong to have one set of policies—one set of assistance or compensation criteria—for one set of workers, and a different set for the workers whom we are considering today. The sum that has been talked about, £400 million over 20 years, does not in my view come anywhere near to meeting the need. One of my constituents faxed me today to say that he reckoned that the figure was out by three times in value and two and a half times in length. He, too, has been working on the back of an envelope today.

There is serious work to be done on the detail, but this is a major step in the right direction in terms of the principle that has been adopted. I urge the Government to take on board the amendment tabled by the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) on companies that are solvent and have wound up pension funds. That applies to the company, TKECC, that I mentioned. It is absolutely wrong that workers in those companies, through not fault of their own, should not receive compensation or assistance when others do. I believe that they would not understand in any way why they should be excluded.

I welcome the fact that the legislation, and the figures and amounts, will be reviewed every three years. That is extremely important, and will allow us to consider the matter in due course. Yesterday, when debating another part of the Bill, we discussed the fact that it does not, on the face of it, apply to Northern Ireland immediately. The Minister gave an undertaking that an Order in Council would be brought forward to ensure that the Bill would apply to Northern Ireland at the same time as it applies to the rest of the country. I welcome that. There should be no question of citizens in Northern Ireland receiving any less compensation than others elsewhere in the kingdom, and they should receive it at the same time.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I shall keep my remarks brief. I have suffered the experience, which I know many hon. Members have had, of receiving representations from honest, hard-working constituents who have been part of companies that, for various reasons, have not been able to meet their pensions obligations. Sigmacast, formerly known as Triplex, in my constituency—a long-standing foundry—was subjected to a management buy-out last September. The pensions fund was found to be £18 million short, and the successor company was not prepared to sponsor a successor pension fund. The result is that some 150 workers, who would have enjoyed deferred benefits, have been told that they will get nothing at all.

4.45 pm

The news of the Government new clause, presented last week, was wonderful news for those workers. I share that feeling of joy, but I also feel a certain circumspection and concern. We do not know how much there will be and we do not know whether that particular case will fit with Government guidelines. I do not expect the Minister to make a determination on this particular case at this moment in the debate, but I should like reassurance that the representations of the unions, the employees and the members will be taken into full consideration and that we will have a sympathetic response. I do not need to tell the Minister that the worst possible outcome is to raise people's expectations and then to dash them. We would expect the Government response to be consistent with the declared objectives of the proposal.

I have couple of quick, general points. First, in their consideration of funding, I hope that the Government will take into account the fact that if we do not provide adequate pension compensation—no, I shall not use the word "compensation", but say "assistance" instead—for those 60,000 who have lost their pensions, there will be a double financial whammy. On the one hand, the tax receipts that would have come from those pensions will be lost, and on the other, there will be potential benefit obligations in cases of hardship.

Secondly, I welcome the Government's commitment to working with other stakeholders to add to the fund. Regardless of the implementation of the pension protection fund, there is a potential loss to the pensions and savings industry and to the Exchequer from people who will have seen or heard the publicity about those 60,000 families and therefore decided not to invest in company pensions—irrespective of promises made, or of the implications of the pension protection fund. It is therefore essential that the Government, the pensions and savings industry and companies all work together to ensure that the fund is added to, so that there is an adequate level of assistance for those who have lost their pensions in the past.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I call Mr. Wicks.

Mr. Tynan: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I understand that we are on Report, and that the situation is that if a speaker is on their feet, they are entitled to be called during the debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am afraid that that is incorrect. I am sorry to have to disappoint the hon. Gentleman. Mr. Malcolm Wicks.

Malcolm Wicks: We have had a good debate, and no doubt we can return to some of its themes on Third Reading. Obviously, not everyone has been able to make their contribution and I know that many would have liked to do so. For example, I see my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Richard Burden), who brought a delegation of Kalamazoo workers to see me, which very much informed our speeches. We have just had a useful contribution from my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey). I do not think that I can even refer to every speaker in the time available, and certainly not to every point raised, although the debate has been good on both sides.

The shadow Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, who I know cannot be here now—he sent me a note to that effect—rather reminded me, given some of the debate, of the old adage that failure is an orphan but success has many parents. I should not want to prejudge the PhD thesis that will one day be written about this era of policy development, with or without the official papers, but as long as the PhD student is not being supervised at Bath university by a well-known professor, I shall look forward in my own old age—when I am receiving the £100-plus winter fuel allowance—to reading that thesis. However, the idea that the parent of this provision could possibly be the Leader of the Opposition is an extraordinary one. If anyone dare advance that claim to parentage, I will demand a DNA test immediately.

I should emphasise that right from the start of this process we have adopted the difficult but honest position of saying that we could offer no false hope; indeed, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has been straight with people all along. This is not a U-turn, as some have said. We have had to be cautious from the start. We have had to look at the evidence and to listen to ideas, and I am delighted to be able to introduce this assistance package. Purely for accuracy's sake, I should point out that if anyone can claim credit for this package, above the many other voices that we have heard, it is the Secretary of State. From the start, he has been absolutely determined—albeit cautiously, so that we do not raise false hopes—that we should do something if at all possible, and I pay tribute to him today.

The shadow Secretary of State asked various questions. Some of them concerned the detail, which we cannot provide at this stage. We will have discussions with stakeholders, including the trade unions, and it is important that we do so. We have talked about the scale of assistance constituting a significant or substantial proportion of pension rights, and we cannot go further at this time.

Although the shadow Secretary of State did raise some serious issues, his introduction drew rather more on the tittle-tattle of the Sunday newspapers than this important occasion deserved. He moved somewhat off course when he referred to alleged comments by me on the pension protection fund and pension rights. Those who read our proceedings in Committee will discover that we made it absolutely clear what those rights are. We had to introduce qualifications into the Bill, because in extremis one has to make provisions. There is a serious possibility that the shadow Secretary of State summarised my approach to this issue in a manner that was not very useful.

It was unfortunate that the shadow Secretary of State made somewhat patronising remarks about ASW workers celebrating the announcement of this assistance scheme. I, too, saw those scenes on television, which were touching and moving. At long last, their campaign, alongside that of others, has brought the results that our Department has doggedly worked towards.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): Workers in my constituency who lost out because of the collapse of the Richards pension fund were also pictured celebrating, on the front page of my local evening newspaper. This is a major breakthrough and the Government deserve to be congratulated on it.

Malcolm Wicks: Indeed.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab/Co-op): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Malcolm Wicks: Yes, but it might be the last time.

Mr. Turner: I should like to add the congratulations of workers at GKN Thompson Chassis, in Bilston, which is in the black country. They welcome this measure as we welcome the flowers in May, and they thank the Secretary of State for his intervention and for the initiative he has taken.

Malcolm Wicks: I always welcome good news from Wolverhampton. We need to look at the detail and we shall of course do so, but such workers were celebrating an important advance, excellent parliamentary representation on their behalf, and a Labour Government—be it old or new—who are delivering.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) started off by praising Ministers. I always reach for my flak jacket when he does that, because with all due respect, I see what is coming. However, he asked some important questions, and rightly so, about which people might be covered by the provision, and about the time scale and dates. We have listened very carefully to his comments, which are based on experience, as well as to those of other colleagues. He will note that the new clause is a deliberately broad enabling provision that that omits any mention of particular dates. We will want to draw on clear principles of fairness when looking at the practicalities. I have explained the process through which our proposals are drawn up, and I repeat that we shall consult my right hon. Friend and others about these important details.

Mr. Frank Field: What the Minister has just said could affect all the amendments to the new clause. The labour resource centre received a Government briefing that gave specific dates on which the provision would and would not apply. Was that briefing merely by way of illustration, or did it reflect the Government's view?

Malcolm Wicks: It indicated our thinking on this issue. I said what I just said very deliberately, and as I have also pointed out, the provision will need to bear some relation to the Pensions Act 1995. I hope that that has reassured my right hon. Friend, and that he will consider withdrawing his amendments.

At one stage, the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) almost seemed to suggest that this assistance constitutes charity or sympathy. There is nothing wrong with sympathy, but it butters no scones: it needs to be followed by action, and it is being followed. Alongside considerable existing scheme assets and any money that we can hopefully draw in from industry, this proper assistance scheme will provide a significant proportion of pension rights to individuals in future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West asked a technical but very important question about definitions of insolvency. We expect that insolvency will be defined as it is intended to be defined in the pension protection fund. This definition will include schemes that are sponsored by employers in administration and in receivership, as well as those in liquidation. We need to consider in detail the implications of the definition that we intend to use, but we are not about using technicalities or legalese to define people out of a proper assistance programme.

I was in danger earlier of awarding too many honours in my descriptions of certain hon. Members, but I am serious when I say that my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt) has been a persistent, almost obstinate champion of the workers to whom he is so committed. I pay tribute to him in that regard. One photo opportunity that he helped to organise involved a group of ASW workers stripping off on the beach—mercifully, behind a banner. There is no truth in the rumour that one reason why we hastily found £400 million was to prevent my hon. Friend from taking off his clothes—be it on the beach or elsewhere.

There is a great deal of unity in the House, which has welcomed the assistance package, so I hope that those who have tabled the various amendments will consider withdrawing them. This was an injustice that needed to be righted and an unfairness that we needed to overthrow, and that is the purpose of this assistance package. Yes, we need to work on the detail, and I have explained our strategy and the milestones that we have adopted. A scheme will be in place by the spring of next year, and as soon as is practicable afterwards, it will deliver the pensions that belong to the workers, and which should be given to them.

Mr. Webb: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Would you clarify what would happen if the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) did not pursue his amendment (d)? Could the House still divide on amendments (b) and (c), which have attracted support throughout the House?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am certainly mindful to accept a vote on amendment (c) but not necessarily on amendment (b).

Mr. Frank Field: The Minister can put his flak jacket away for the moment. It is quite clear that the Bill will go to the other place. Hon. Members who have tabled amendments are anxious that they are fully dealt with. I shall therefore not press my amendment.

It being Five o'clock, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded pursuant to Order [18 May] to put forthwith the Questions necessary for the disposal of business to be concluded at that hour.

Clause read a Second time.

Amendment proposed to the proposed new clause: (c), in line 73, at end add–

'( ) Assistance from the financial assistance scheme shall be at least sufficient to provide total benefits to qualifying members as they would have received had their scheme fallen within the scope of the Pension Protection Fund.'.—[Mr. Webb.]

New Clause 20

REVIEWABLE ILL HEALTH PENSIONS

'(1) This section applies where there is an assessment period in relation to an eligible scheme.

(2) The Board may review a reviewable ill health pension in respect of a member under the scheme if—

(a) disregarding section [Effect of a review], the member would be entitled to compensation under paragraph 3 of Schedule 7 in respect of the pension if the Board assumed responsibility for the scheme,

(b) the member did not attain normal pension age in respect of the pension before the assessment date, and

(c) the pension is attributable to the member's pensionable service under the scheme or another scheme.

(3) An ill health pension in respect of a member under the scheme is reviewable for the purposes of subsection (2) if the member is entitled to the pension by reason of an award under the scheme ("the award") which was made—

(a) in the period of three years ending immediately before the assessment date, or

(b) before the end of the prescribed period beginning with the assessment date, in response to an application made before that date.

(4) Where—

(a) before the assessment date, an application was made under the scheme for the award of a pension before normal pension age by virtue of any provision of the scheme rules making special provision as to early payment of pension on grounds of ill health, and

(b) the trustees or managers of the scheme failed to decide the application before the end of the period mentioned in subsection (3)(b), section 10 of the Pensions Act 1995 (c.26) (civil penalties) applies to any trustee or manager who has failed to take all reasonable steps to secure that the application was decided before the end of that period.

(5) Where—

(a) the award was made in response to an application which—

(i) was made on or after the assessment date, or

(ii) was made before that date but not decided by the trustees or managers of the scheme before the end of the period mentioned in subsection (3)(b), and

(b) in the absence of this subsection, the award would take effect before the assessment date, the award is, for the purposes of determining the compensation payable under this Chapter in a case where the Board assumes responsibility for the scheme, to be treated as taking effect after the date on which the decision to make the award was made.

(6) Regulations must prescribe the procedure to be followed in relation to the review of a pension under this section and any subsequent decision under section [Effect of a review].'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

Government new clause 21—Effect of a review.

Government new clause 22—Interpretation of sections [Reviewable ill health pensions] and [Effect of a review].

Government amendments Nos. 99, 104, 105, 111 and 145.

Mr. Pond: Given the spirit of celebration evident in our proceedings this afternoon, I hope that there is considerable agreement about how to move forward and improve the Bill. In Standing Committee, an Opposition amendment was tabled with the aim of giving the pension protection fund board the power to review any early retirements that took place in the three years prior to the assessment date, and to make retrospective adjustments where it appears that the award created an unfair advantage to certain scheme members.

We agreed to consider the essence of that amendment. These amendments introduce new clauses to review the awards of early retirement by scheme trustees or managers on the grounds of ill health.

We have specifically focused on scheme members who have retired early on the grounds of ill health, because that is the only way in which scheme members under NPA can receive the 100 per cent. level of compensation and be exempt from the compensation cap on entry to the PPF. Scheme members who have taken early retirement other than on the grounds of ill health will be subject to the 90 per cent. level of compensation and the compensation cap, so they are unlikely to be able to create an unfair advantage.

The clauses allow for the board to review certain cases of early retirement on the grounds of ill health where the award was made in the three years prior to the assessment date, or in limited circumstances where the application had been made before the assessment date. Other conditions for review must also be satisfied—for example, the member must be under normal pension age immediately before the assessment date.

The board will consider whether the original decision by the trustees or managers regarding the ill health award was based on a mistake or was made in ignorance of a relevant fact. The board will also consider whether the member should have been entitled to an ill-health award at any stage before the assessment date.

The new clause is an important addition to our moral hazard powers. It will work in conjunction with the requirement that some rule changes that were made should be disregarded in certain circumstances. Together, they will be a significant deterrent to individuals looking to take advantage of the PPF.

Amendments Nos. 99, 105 and 111 are technical amendments relating to the new clauses. Amendment No. 104 will amend clause 127, on the board's obligation to obtain valuation of assets and protected liabilities, to require prescribed information to be included in the written valuation. That may include details of some of the basis of the valuation. Amendment No. 145 will insert a new paragraph into schedule 7.

The admissible rules are the scheme rules, excluding certain recent rule changes that were made, or took effect, in the three years prior to the assessment date. If the combined effect of the recent rule changes and recent discretionary increases result in an increase to the cost of the protected liabilities at the assessment date, those changes are to be disregarded. Entitlement to compensation is based on admissible rules rather than scheme rules. That is an integral part of the moral hazard provisions, to ensure that pension schemes do not increase their liabilities in the knowledge that the PPF will be required to meet those liabilities.

If an individual has been receiving a pension and the scheme rules under which the pension was awarded are disregarded for PPF purposes, in some cases we will want to ensure that he or she can still receive payments of compensation from the assessment date. We also want to ensure that any compensation to which the individual becomes entitled will take account of scheme benefits that the individual may have already received. Regulations will set out how such a person's compensation is to be determined. The effect of the amendment will be to prevent scheme members from being inadvertently affected by the PPF admissible rules and from losing their PPF compensation or gaining unintended enhanced compensation.

Mr. Waterson: This is another anti-avoidance measure, and the Minister was kind enough to nod in the direction of the provenance of this new clause, which was one of the amendments we tabled in Committee. Ill health is a way of getting round the 90 per cent. rule and the cap. The issue was originally raised at the behest of the National Association of Pension Funds, which suggested the amendment to allow a review of early retirements.

Our amendment did not specifically mention ill health, but it is likely to be the most obvious course to achieve what is called inappropriate early retirement, unless the Minister can think of any other ways around the requirements in the Bill. The three-year rule is not without some sense. Practical difficulties will arise in the enforcement of such moral hazard powers, as the explanatory note calls them. That term may stretch matters a little far: we are talking about anti-avoidance measures to stop people taking advantage of the scheme. Indeed, in Committee, the Minister referred to the episode involving a famous individual who apparently acquired Alzheimer's disease and then made a full recovery. I am sure that there have been other, less well-publicised instances of people suffering ill health and then—thanks to the wonders of medical science—making a full recovery after they have put together a satisfactory retirement package. That would be an obvious way out of the requirements of the PPF and that concerns the NAPF, which is why we tabled the original amendment. There should be a power to investigate such matters.

The new clause would give the board the power to revoke the award of a full pension on grounds of ill health. Perhaps the Minister could be a little more precise about how that would happen. The pension could be revoked some two or three years after the event, for example. Does the Minister envisage the board demanding a medical examination? What powers would the board have to require a medical examination if the person did not consent? What attention should be paid to any changes in medical condition in the intervening period? Those are practical issues, but the principle is right: we should not allow an obvious way around the PPF regulations and ill-intentioned people could use ill health to do so.

Mr. Drew: Ministers and Opposition spokesmen are trying to address an issue that we come across in our constituencies. Occasionally, people are encouraged to leave on grounds of ill health, but if that attempt fails they may be granted early retirement. That does enormous damage to pension schemes, and anything that can be done to tighten up procedures is welcome. However, does the hon. Gentleman agree that difficulties arise when people's situations are judged retrospectively? I do not know how we can reflect that in the law, because it comes down to the morality of the case. I am not sure about the term "moral hazard", but the problem needs to be addressed.

Mr. Waterson: That is a fair point. The decision to make the full award of a pension on grounds of ill health is taken at a certain moment in time, and the new clause would provide that that decision could be re-examined some years later. As I understand it, the board will try to put itself in the position of the scheme at the time that the decision was made, not at any other point in history. The obvious example is stress, the 21st century disease. In many cases, the effects of stress are very real, but it can also cover many other situations. Of course, it would be perfectly easy to argue that a high-flying executive had to retire due to ill health caused by stress, but that when the reasons for the stress were removed—whether the pressures of the job or worries about the pension—it would not be surprising that they made a reasonably good recovery.

Although we have no problem with the intentions behind the new clause, some real practical issues are involved and it would be helpful if the Minister could consider them in any further comments he makes. However, we broadly support the new clause.

Mr. Pond: The hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) are right to raise the practical issues. We are all agreed on the principle. We need to make sure that the board acts fairly when making assessments. There will be people—described by the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) as "ill-intentioned" individuals—who may try to abuse the system, but many more will have had to retire early on ill-health grounds and we want to protect their position.

We shall introduce regulations that set out precisely the procedure that can be used. I do not want to anticipate the regulations in too much detail, but there could be circumstances where medical evidence will form part of the evidence needed by the board to make its judgment. The board will need to ensure that all relevant evidence is taken into account and that an award is not made on an incorrect basis, especially because in almost all cases such decisions will be made after the event, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud said. We need to ensure that judgments are made fairly and that people have confidence in the way that they are made.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 21

Effect of a Review

'(1) This section applies where, during an assessment period in relation to an eligible scheme, the Board reviews an ill health pension under the scheme by virtue of section [Reviewable ill health pensions].

(2) Where the conditions of subsection (3) are satisfied, the Board may determine that the compensation payable in respect of the pension, in a case where the Board assumes responsibility for the scheme, is to be determined in the prescribed manner on and after the relevant date.

(3) The conditions are—

(a) that the annual rate of compensation which would be payable under this Part in respect of the pension at the assessment date, if the Board assumed responsibility for the scheme, exceeds the notional reviewed rate of compensation in respect of the pension,

(b) that the Board is satisfied—

(i) that the decision to make the award was made in ignorance of, or was based upon a mistake as to, a material fact relevant to the decision,

(ii) that, at the time that decision was made, the member knew or could reasonably have been expected to know of that fact and that it was relevant to the decision, and

(iii) that, had the trustees or managers known about, or not been mistaken as to, that fact, they could not reasonably have decided to make the award, and

(c) that the Board is not satisfied that the criteria in the admissible rules governing entitlement to early payment of pension on grounds of ill health were satisfied in respect of the member at any time after that decision but before the assessment date.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (2) "the relevant date" means the date during the assessment period on which a scheme valuation in relation to the scheme becomes binding.

(5) The power to make a decision in respect of the pension under subsection (2) may only be exercised at a time which falls—

(a) during the assessment period but before the time the Board first approves a scheme valuation under section 128 in relation to the scheme, and

(b) within a reasonable period beginning with the assessment date or, where the decision to make the award was made at a later date, that date.

(6) Regulations made for the purposes of subsection (2) may, in particular, include provision applying any provision of Schedule 7 with such modifications as may be prescribed.'.—[Mr. Pond.]

New Clause 22

Interpretation of Sections [Reviewable Ill Health Pensions] and [Effect of a Review]

'(1) For the purposes of sections [Reviewable ill health pensions] and [Effect of a review]—

"admissible rules" is to be construed in accordance with Schedule 7;

"assessment date" means the date on which the assessment period begins;

"ill health pension", in relation to a scheme, means a pension which, immediately before the assessment date, is a pension to which a person is entitled under the admissible rules in circumstances where that entitlement arose before normal pension age by virtue of any provision of the admissible rules making special provision as to early payment of pension on grounds of ill health;

"normal pension age", in relation to a scheme and any pension under it, means the age specified in the admissible rules as the earliest age at which the pension becomes payable without actuarial adjustment (disregarding any admissible rule making special provision as to early payment on the grounds of ill health) and sub-paragraphs (2) and (3) of paragraph 30 of Schedule 7 apply in relation to this section as they apply in relation to that Schedule;

"notional reviewed rate of compensation", in respect of an ill health pension, means—

(a) the annual rate of compensation which would be payable in respect of the pension at the assessment date, if the Board assumed responsibility for the scheme and the compensation so payable at that date was determined in accordance with regulations under section Effect of a review, or

(b) if no such compensation would have been so payable at that date, nil;

"scheme rules" is to be construed in accordance with Schedule 7;

"scheme valuation", in relation to a scheme, means a valuation under section 127 of the assets and protected liabilities of the scheme as at the time immediately before the assessment period begins.

(2) For the purposes of section Reviewable ill health pensions—

(a) the definition of "normal pension age" in subsection (1), and

(b) sub-paragraphs (2) and (3) of paragraph 30 of Schedule 7 as they apply by virtue of that definition, have effect as if the references in those provisions to the admissible rules were references to the scheme rules.

(3) Paragraph 33(4) of Schedule 7 (references to "ill health" to be construed in accordance with regulations) applies in relation to sections [Reviewable ill health pensions] and [Effect of a review] and this section as if, in that provision, the reference to that Schedule included a reference to those sections and this section.

(4) In those sections references to the Board assuming responsibility for the scheme are to the Board assuming responsibility for the scheme in accordance with this Chapter at the time the assessment period in question comes to an end.'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 23

REFERRAL OF QUESTIONS OF LAW

'The PPF Ombudsman may refer any question of law arising for determination in connection with—

(a) a reviewable matter referred to him by virtue of regulations under section 196, or

(b) a matter referred to him by virtue of regulations under section 197, to, in England and Wales, the High Court or, in Scotland, the Court of Session.'.—[Mr. Pond.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Pond: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause builds on an Opposition amendment tabled in Committee and accepted in principle at that time. I am extremely disappointed that the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) is not with us for this part of our proceedings, as in time the provision may come to be known as the "Tatton amendment", as opposed to "amendments in tatters", the fate of many of the amendments proposed by the hon. Gentleman in Committee. When people at bus stops discuss the role of the pension protection fund ombudsman, the name of the hon. Gentleman will fall from their lips.

Clauses 196 and 197 provide for the pension protection fund ombudsman to consider and make determinations on reviewable matters and complaints of maladministration that have been referred to him following the two-stage PPF internal review process. From time to time, the pension protection fund ombudsman, to whom I shall refer henceforth as the PPFO, may be asked to make a determination on a case involving a complex point of law on which he or she needs advice. The new clause enables the PPFO to refer such questions to the High Court or the Court of Session in Scotland. The PPFO will take the Court's ruling into account when making his or her determination. That approach is in line with the powers in place for the pensions ombudsman under section 150(7) of the Pension Schemes Act 1993, which enable him to seek advice on points of law or to clarify the limits of his jurisdiction in a particular case.

I have acknowledged the role of the Opposition in bringing forward the new clause, but we have extended the scope of their original amendment by enabling the PPFO to ask the Court's advice on points of law arising from an alleged maladministration case as well as a reviewable matter. We believe that is the right approach, given that complaints of maladministration can progress into a reviewable matter question involving a point of law and vice versa.

Mr. Waterson: As the Minister has pointed out, the new clause builds on an amendment that we tabled in Committee. However, I should not like Members to run away with the idea that that was a typical theme of our proceedings. I cannot help but feel that, had Ministers been more open to accepting our amendments, the Bill that leaves this place would be much better.

The whole issue of the PPF ombudsman—or the PPFO, as we must now refer to him—is just one part of the rather complex bureaucracy that the Bill will erect. It is a matter of great sadness, especially to the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb), that no amendment pertains to the determinations committee: those faceless men and, no doubt, women who will have a major role to play in enforcing the Bill when it becomes law.

As the Minister pointed out, we have my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) to thank for the new clause. It is fair to say that, when he argued the case for the proposal in Committee, he seemed to be pushing on a relatively open door. It seems clear—the Minister confirmed this in his opening remarks—that there will be not only a pensions ombudsman, as currently, but a PPF ombudsman. It is important to realise that we are producing ombudsmen and women in significant numbers these days.

Just to confuse matters, in another rare moment of openness to argument from the Opposition in Committee, Ministers conceded that they were seriously considering the prospect of that being one and the same person. I do not know how far the discussions with the current ombudsman have progressed, but that suggestion would make a great deal of sense because a lot of the functions are very similar. It seems a little odd to reinvent the wheel and have a completely different ombudsman for the PPF, along with all the associated administration.

As the Minister indicated, the only point behind amendment No. 538, which we moved in Committee, was to try to ensure that a power that is already available to the pensions ombudsman would be available to the PPF ombudsman. In Committee, the Minister kindly said that he would consider that proposal if we withdrew that amendment, which we duly did, and it is now back in almost identical wording. As the Minister said, this is the Tatton amendment, and if my hon. Friend achieves nothing else in politics, which I think most unlikely, he will have this to tell his grandchildren about.

We welcome the new clause. It started off as our amendment, so it would be churlish, even by my standards, to oppose it.

Mr. Pond: I am delighted that the Opposition accept the new clause, which is based on their own original amendment. That comes as a surprise to us all.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

Clause 97

MEMBERSHIP OF THE BOARD

Mr. Waterson: I beg to move amendment No. 25, in page 67, line 32, at end insert—

'(4A) Any person appointed as an ordinary member shall have knowledge and understanding of—

(a) the law relating to pensions and trusts,

(b) the principles relating to—

(i) the funding of occupational pension schemes, and

(ii) investment of the assets of such schemes, and

(c) such other matters as may be prescribed'.

[Mr. Waterson]

Again, this is an echo of an amendment that we tabled in Committee. On the face of it, the amendment might be thought wholly unobjectionable because all it modestly suggests is that members of the board

"shall have a knowledge and understanding of"

things such as

"the law relating to pensions and trusts"

and the principles for funding schemes and

"the investment of the assets of such schemes".

One would have thought that those were necessary requirements to become a member of the new organisation's board. Certainly, the feeling in much of the industry was that it would be worrying if those people did not have such qualifications—perhaps not all of them. One needs a suitable blend of people with knowledge of investment, funding and so on, and perhaps with a legal background. It is a matter of sadness—[Laughter.]—and of some hilarity to Labour Members, but lawyers occasionally have something to contribute.

John Robertson: Name them.

Mr. Waterson: The hon. Gentleman is putting me on the spot. Perhaps I could write to him.

Although the Minister gave some explanation in Committee that the Government envisaged that the board members will have the knowledge to carry out their role and that they might undertake training, they seemed unwilling to say so in the Bill. They assume that the appointments procedure will ensure that people have the relevant qualifications. That is fine and I am delighted to hear it, but a further safeguard is needed. Those people will wield enormous powers and be in charge of enormous resources. There are concerns about their powers to make restoration orders and so on. Indeed, there is much controversy about that in the business pages of the newspapers. We need to ensure that the right people are in charge.

I commend the amendment to the House, because it would set the minimum requirements for anyone who wants to become a member of the board. To put it bluntly, we do not want a bunch of the Prime Minister's cronies appointed. We do not want his former flatmates or his chums from the intelligence community. We want people with genuine independence and experience, with a genuine knowledge and understanding of their tasks.

John Robertson: I could not resist taunting the hon. Gentleman, and I have decided to participate in the debate.

On the face of it, the amendment appears to be fairly innocuous. It says:

"Any person appointed as an ordinary member shall have knowledge and understanding of . . . the law relating to pensions and trusts".

The magic word "lawyer" comes to mind. My concern is no reflection on any hon. Member, especially my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird), who is obviously very good and much better than any Opposition Member.

Why would we want lawyers involved? Is it because they know everything about the law and its intricacies? It has been said many times that if someone talks to two lawyers, he will get two different answers—so if we had half a dozen lawyers together, we would get half a dozen different answers and would never get anything accomplished. I would amend the amendment by stipulating "as long as it does not apply to lawyers". Perhaps then I would not have a problem with it.

The amendment also refers to "the principles relating to . . . the funding of occupational pension schemes, and . . . investment of the assets of such schemes, and . . . such other matters as may be prescribed".

Some of the people who would be qualified to take on the job are probably the same sort of people who caused the problem in the first place. Would you, Madam Deputy Speaker, want to employ a lawyer who caused the problem in the first place and ignore the people who are suffering? Trade unions and ordinary lay members should be on the board. It is important that ordinary people are represented. We talked at great length about what we are doing for the ordinary people. The same people should be on the board. It is important that they are listened to.

I have once again made my point about lawyers. If they want to write to me and tell me what they do, that is fine; I shall write to them and tell them what they do not do. In that way, we will get on very well.

My hon. Friend the Minister should not accept the amendment. It would encourage the people whom we least want to encourage to be on the board.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): The hon. Member makes an interesting point. Perhaps he would like to consider what happened as a result of the Belling pension fund fraud. The fund collapsed in 1992 and 200 people who went to prison for making it go bust were solicitors—legal people.

John Robertson: I thank my hon. Friend for that. He makes my case for me.

Would the amendment have the effect of requiring people to take an exam to quality for the board? Would they have to do a written test to prove that they have the knowledge and capabilities to be on it?

Mr. Waterson: We are not suggesting an exam. The hon. Gentleman might wish to reflect on the fact that he is, presumably, supporting parts of the Bill that require trustees to have some qualification. I am relieved to hear that the trustees of our very own parliamentary pension scheme recently sat an exam, which they all passed.

John Robertson: I would like to find out how those people did in their exams and whether they got an A, B or C. Were they the best people available or were they the only ones available to sit the exam, which would mean that no one could fail them?

5.45 pm

The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) is trying to look after his own in the so-called innocuous amendment. He lambasted many of my colleagues in the trade union movement and, for that matter, ordinary people. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to do exactly what I would do with it, and not accept it.

Mr. Webb: As I often say before making a speech, I had not planned to say anything.

The amendment is a tease because it requires the board of the pension protection fund to have at least the same knowledge as trustees of a scheme. Given that the PPF is a dirty great pension fund, in which the assets of wound-up pension schemes have been slopped together—presumably to be managed by someone and overseen by the board—I would be horrified if the members of its board did not know anything about pensions. Granted, they do not have to be lawyers; we do not expect trustees of our own scheme to be lawyers, although I suspect that many of them are. It would, however, be incredible if we did not expect PPF board members to have a basic knowledge of pensions law. We are in danger of forgetting the purpose of the PPF. Over time, its assets could build up substantially before they start to fall.

John Robertson: Lest I did not make myself clear, the board members do not have to be lawyers entrenched in pensions law. There are plenty of people in other spheres of business with similar experience. Trade unions deal with the trustees of pension funds. My hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) was a trustee of a pension fund, and he is one of the many people who have such experience. They do not have to be lawyers.

Mr. Webb: The hon. Gentleman makes my point for me. Trade unionists who are pension fund trustees are already obliged under the Bill to satisfy provisions duplicated in the amendment. It is not unreasonable to expect trade unionists, members of the public or anyone else who takes responsibility for potentially billions of pounds-worth of assets to be clued up about pensions so that the workers, about whom we are all worried, get their pensions. I accept that they do not have to be lawyers, but the amendment does not specify that they should be.

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus) (SNP) rose—

John Robertson: The hon. Gentleman is a lawyer.

Mr. Webb: I had better be careful, then.

If the amendment did make such a requirement, every trustee of every pension scheme would have to be a lawyer, which is clearly not the Government's position.

Kevin Brennan: Is the amendment not otiose, because appointment to the board of the PPF is a public appointment whereas the appointment of trustees of pension schemes is a private appointment?

Mr. Webb: I cannot understand why we would want to allow the public sector to employ someone who did not understand what a pension was, what investment returns were, or how the law worked.

Kevin Brennan: Would appointments not come under the remit of the Commissioner for Public Appointments, and would therefore have to meet certain minimum standards in any case?

Mr. Webb: They probably would, but I am not sure whether that is wholly reassuring.

Mr. Weir: The hon. Gentleman and the Members arguing against him are all dancing on the head of a pin. I agree with some of the remarks of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson), but as a lawyer I would be horrified to be asked to advise on pensions law. The assumption that all lawyers know a great deal about pensions law is as flawed as the assumption that trade unionists, for example, do not know about it. Individuals who deal with pensions day in, day out, are the proper people to serve on the board. They should have a knowledge of pensions, whether lawyers or otherwise.

Mr. Webb: We are in danger of becoming obsessed with lawyers. The amendment does not refer to lawyers. It merely refers to knowledge of "the law relating to pensions and trusts".

I cannot remember the number of members of the board of the pension protection fund. I am open to hand signals, as long as it is not two. The serious point is that if we are speaking about a fairly small number of appointments—10, say—it is entirely appropriate to expect just 10 people to have those skills.

We were worried about the requirement as it relates to trustees. I know that the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill), who represents our interests as chairman of the trustees of the parliamentary fund, is worried about such an amendment as it relates to every trustee of every scheme, because that would mean that vast numbers of people had to have the required level of knowledge. Surely if we are talking about only 10 people, it is not unreasonable to suppose that we could find 10 people who knew what they were talking about to run the PPF.

Mr. Pike: I was elected as a director of the Philips pension fund before I became a Member of the House. Immediately after I was elected, I and all the members of the work force who had been elected as worker representatives received the necessary training. If someone from the trade unions or the work force did not meet the criteria, would it not be possible to provide them with training? They do not necessarily need to be fully qualified before they become a member of the board.

Mr. Webb: That is a fair point. The hon. Gentleman had the joy of not being a member of our Committee. The point was raised in Committee on the set of provisions relating to general trustees. As I recall, it was acknowledged that a member of the board would not have to have the required knowledge and understanding on day one, but would be expected to acquire it, as the hon. Gentleman suggested.

Whereas trustees are generally volunteers and may not be paid, I would guess, in the case of many pension funds—

Mr. Tynan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. There was legislation to ensure that trustees were representative of employees as well as management in the company. There was also legislation to ensure that people had the opportunity to become trustees and to be trained after they were elected to the board. The hon. Gentleman seems to be talking himself into supporting the amendment. I would be concerned about that because it is so specific, and there is a danger that it would prevent people from being involved.

Mr. Webb: I will not drag the debate out more than an hour and eight minutes. The arguments that we are now hearing would apply far more to what is in the Bill, which hon. Members on the Government Benches have accepted as requirements of every trustee of every pension scheme in the country, whereas the amendment applies only to the 10 professionals, every one of whom will presumably be paid a salary—a good salary. If Labour Members are willing to accept the conditions in relation to vast numbers of volunteers, we should surely accept the same condition in relation to perhaps 10 well-paid professionals who will be in charge of a very large pension fund.

John Robertson: The issue of professionals has re-entered the discussion. We want everyone whose pension might be affected to be included. Trade unions do that for the ordinary worker, as do lay people who are members of the board of pension trustees. If we go down the road of professionals, the lay person would automatically be discounted, unless he happens to be a lawyer.

Mr. Webb: Perhaps I am not making myself fantastically clear. I appreciate that the debate has a slight "after the Lord Mayor's show" feel to it, but I shall try to clarify my argument. The hon. Gentleman must be happy with the provisions in the Bill relating to trustees, because he voted for them or failed to vote against them. They provide the same hurdle for trustees—all trustees—and he is happy with that. Lay people do not necessarily have those skills, but they can acquire them although they are not lawyers. The hon. Gentleman does not regard that point as a particular hurdle, but he thinks that expecting the people who are paid to look after the pension protection fund to know what they are doing is a huge hurdle.

I have clearly dismally failed to make my point, but at least I feel better about it. It is entirely appropriate that the small number of people whom we expect to perform that important job—they will also be paid good money to do it—are as able to understand pensions and investments as the trustees of schemes up and down the land, which is why I hope that the hon. Member for Eastbourne does not withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Pond: I must begin with a warning to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson), which was passed to me by the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle), who is a lawyer. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Anniesland asked the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) to write him a letter stating what he considers to be the good things about lawyers, but as the hon. Member for Eastbourne is a lawyer himself, my hon. Friend will probably be charged for it.

The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) will remember that the PPF board must have a minimum of seven members, whom we expect to be people of standing and understanding. It may well be that some of those people are trade unionists, but we do not expect members of the board to represent particular groups. They are there to represent the interests of pension members across the board and nobody will be ruled out from that process.

This afternoon, the hon. Member for Eastbourne and I hardly need to be separated by the red lines on the carpet that are two sword lengths apart. The Opposition originally proposed the measure in Committee, and we entirely agree with the principle. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) is probably not in the Chamber this afternoon because he is on the phone sharing his joy with the newspaper in Tatton that the Government agree, in principle at least, with so many of his proposals.

Having said that, I ask the hon. Member for Eastbourne to withdraw the amendment because it is not necessary. The members of the PPF board will be appointed to a number of specific roles, and the appointments must be based purely on the knowledge and experience required to fulfil those roles. The members of the board will have or will be able to acquire the knowledge and understanding to carry out those roles properly. That approach, along with a range of other measures that we have introduced, ensures that board members must not only demonstrate their knowledge in order to be appointed to the board but, as the hon. Member for Northavon says, develop their knowledge and understanding over time. Board members' performance will be reported on regularly, because the Government are keen on performance standards and we want board members' performance standards to improve, just as we want improvement in other areas of public service.

The package of measures achieves the same outcome as the amendment, and I would even argue that it goes further than that.

Mr. Webb: By refusing the amendment, the Minister leaves himself the option of appointing people who do not satisfy, or who would not be expected to satisfy, those conditions. Why does he want to keep that option open, because that is the effect of refusing the amendment?

Mr. Pond: We have not left ourselves the option of appointing people who do not fulfil the requirements. We expect PPF board members to fulfil the requirements in the same way as trustees.

Kevin Brennan: Is it not the case that if these are indeed public appointments—perhaps my hon. Friend can confirm that—it is a legal requirement that they be appointed on merit, and will therefore have to be the best people for the job?

Mr. Pond: My hon. Friend is correct on that, as on so much else this afternoon. Of course, these appointments will be made through the normal procedure for public appointments, and we will expect the people so appointed to have the abilities and characteristics that are necessary to fulfil their function and to ensure that the PPF provides the level of protection to scheme members that hon. Members want it to achieve.

6 pm

Mr. Waterson: It does not take much to reveal the latent hostility towards lawyers that exists in some parts of this House. I have been accused of many things—in this case, of looking after my own. It might interest the hon. Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson) to know that although I am indeed a lawyer, I am a shipping lawyer, so I doubt that I would be much use to the average pension fund and I would certainly not be much use to the board, although I suspect that the prospects of my being appointed to it under the current regime are pretty slim. [Interruption.] It is suggested that I could pass the exam. I have passed lots of exams in my time, but that does not make me a good person.

Mr. Webb: Do not be so hard on yourself.

Mr. Waterson: I thank the hon. Gentleman. I am sorry, but it is getting late in the day and my enthusiasm for pensions is waning rapidly.

In their fury at the legal profession, hon. Members misread my amendments. I am not suggesting that a board member has to be a qualified lawyer, actuary, accountant or anything similar, or even that he has to possess an AS-level in pension fund management, but merely that he has to have a knowledge and understanding of some or all of these matters. I presume that board members will be screened. I am sure that Ministers are not going to get them out of a bus queue, although that must be where they get Ministers from.

Malcolm Wicks: We are very ordinary people.

Mr. Waterson: Who could argue with that?

These people will probably be quite well paid—unlike, as the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) pointed out, many current trustees of pension schemes, particularly smaller ones, many of whom are volunteers. One of the many unfortunate side effects of the Bill is that trustees of pension schemes will be professionalised as a result of the very firm, detailed and onerous requirements placed on them, which are supported by, or at least acquiesced in, by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Anniesland. Like the hon. Member for Northavon, I am bemused as to why the people running this super-pension fund should be any different.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): Before I go any further, the hon. Gentleman does not have to believe a word I say, because I am of course a lawyer.

There is a major distinction to be drawn here. People who are appointed to be trustees may not necessarily have the kind of qualifications or understanding that the hon. Gentleman would require, but provisions exist for training them. They should be representative. It will obviously be necessary to ensure that a person is capable of running the pension fund before appointing them to do so. The word "otiose" was used before, and that is the right word to apply to the amendment. The hon. Gentleman is worrying about nothing.

Mr. Waterson: "Otiose" is one of those good lawyer's words that 90 per cent. of the population do not understand. "Surplus to requirements" is probably a better way of putting it. I take the hon. and learned Lady's point. I may be making a fundamental error in referring to a pension fund or a pension scheme, because when the Minister was asked in Committee, in the light of the deep concerns of the actuarial profession, who rarely get very excited about anything, whether this was an insurance scheme or a pension fund, he famously replied, "Neither." We still do not know the real answer to that question. Regarding these people as super-trustees of a super-pension scheme may be misleading, but they will have, on any view, some very significant responsibilities.

As is often the case with amendments, it comes down to whether the proposal is needed or otiose. In Committee and today, the Minister has assured me that he agrees with every word of the amendment and that it deals with matters that not only should but will be required of board members. I am prepared on this occasion to take him at his word. However, if any former flatmates of the Prime Minister pop up on the board I shall have something to say about the matter, possibly in an Adjournment debate. For the moment, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

PAYMENT OF SCHEME BENEFITS

Malcolm Wicks: I beg to move Government amendment No. 101, in page 84, line 7, leave out 'for that period'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): With this we may take the following: Government amendments Nos. 102 and 103.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

Amendment No. 26, in page 232, line 15 schedule 7, leave out from 'means' to end of line 17 and insert '90 per cent.'.

Amendment No. 27, in page 232, line 24 schedule 7, leave out sub-paragraph (7).

Government amendment No. 144.

Amendment No. 28, in page 247, line 42 schedule 7, leave out '2.5 %' and insert '5 %'.

Amendment No. 31, in page 249, line 19 schedule 7, leave out paragraph 29.

Malcolm Wicks: First, I will deal with the Government amendments, which are all minor drafting amendments.

Amendments Nos. 101, 102 and 103 amend clause 125 on the payment of scheme benefits. Amendment No. 101 clarifies the wording of subsection (2). Amendment No. 102 ensures that the power to make regulations permitting postponement of a person's entitlement to a pension during the assessment period may also permit postponement of a person's entitlement to a lump sum from the scheme.

Amendment No. 103 provides a definition of the term "normal pension age" that is used in clause 125(4). Amendment No. 144 clarifies the drafting in paragraph 14 of schedule 7 regarding the calculation of the revaluation amount in determining entitlement to lump sum compensation under paragraph 14. I ask hon. Members to accept the Government amendments.

Amendment No. 26 would reduce the pension protection fund compensation from 100 per cent. to 90 per cent. for scheme members over normal pension age, members under normal pension age who receive a pension on the ground of ill health and those who receive survivors' benefits before the assessment date. The amendment would mean that everyone would get the 90 per cent. level of compensation.

Amendment No. 27 would increase the level of PPF compensation to 100 per cent. for those members under normal pension age at assessment date who had taken early retirement but not on the ground of ill health. Amendment No. 31 would remove the Secretary of State's power to vary the PPF compensation percentages.

When a scheme enters the PPF, the majority of those members who already receive their pension will get 100 per cent. compensation. We believe that there are compelling reasons why older people who are some way into their retirement, survivors who already receive benefits and those who have retired early on the ground of ill health should receive the 100 per cent. level of compensation. The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) will have to explain why he does not agree with that. Those people are significantly less likely to be able to find work again, and so, crucially, the current priority order rules fully protect them.

Amendment No. 26 would cut the benefits of existing pensioners if their scheme should enter the PPF by reducing the 100 per cent. level of compensation to 90 per cent. For the reasons that I have just outlined, we do not consider such an approach to be fair. We also believe that the arguments for less than 100 per cent compensation for those over normal pension age, survivors who already receive benefits and those who have retired on the ground of ill health are less relevant.

One of the purposes of the 90 per cent. level of compensation is to give an incentive to the employer, company decision makers and those with influence, most of whom are much more likely to be below the scheme's normal pension age and may have an interest in keeping their scheme out of the PPF.

Mr. Webb: I understand that the reason for the rule about people who are "retired" but under normal pension age is to try to stop people in the know getting 100 per cent. rather than 90 per cent. However, what about the innocent person under the normal pension age who draws a pension for reasons other than health grounds? Perhaps that person has taken an actuarially—I got into trouble for using that word yesterday—reduced pension. Why should not such people get 100 per cent. of that pension?

Malcolm Wicks: In taking this approach, we want to make the PPF regime as simple as possible so that it can be administered inexpensively. We are keen that those who are not of pensionable age should get 90 per cent. I accept that there is a broad-brush nature to this approach and—inevitably, I guess—some rough justice, but we do not want to get into a situation in which we have to assess individual entitlements in the way that the hon. Gentleman suggests.

The 90 per cent. level of compensation also prevents abuse from members taking early retirement other than on the ground of ill health, and guards against levy payers subsidising schemes that manipulate the rules to gain access to a 100 per cent. level of PPF compensation. If the PPF were to apply 100 per cent. compensation to those scheme members who have taken retirement early on grounds other than ill health, there would be an approximate increase to the PPF levies of £10 million per year. Therefore we should not favour a single percentage level for all, as that would unfairly cut the benefits of existing pensioners and remove an incentive for employers, company decision makers and influencers to keep their scheme out of the PPF.

Amendment No. 31 seeks to remove the Secretary of State's power to vary the levels of PPF compensation percentages. That would remove one of the checks and balances, albeit one that would be used only in the most extreme cases, but it would undermine levy payers' confidence in the sustainability of the PPF for the long term. Pension scheme members can have confidence in the protection that the new PPF will provide, but businesses also need to have confidence that checks and balances are built into the structure of the PPF to ensure that the cost of the levy cannot rise exponentially in the future.

Mr. Webb: Does the Minister not accept that there is already a safeguard against what he just called exponential rises, because there is already a cap on the increase from one year to the next? The costs cannot go up exponentially anyway, so why do we need this further provision?

Malcolm Wicks: It is a question of having the right number of checks and balances in the system, and we think that this is an important additional one.

Mr. Waterson: The Minister says that this measure would come into effect only in extreme circumstances, but presumably the only relevant circumstances—whether we characterise them as extreme or otherwise—would be that there was not enough money in the PPF. If the Government are intent on saying that they are not standing behind the PPF, surely those are the only possible circumstances. We can call them extreme or not, as the case may be, but whenever and however they arose, those would be the circumstances.

Malcolm Wicks: We are now rehearsing issues that we have rehearsed many times.The Government are confident that the way in which we are establishing the PPF, with the levy system and the ability of the board to increase the levy subject to certain limits—another check and balance—will give us a PPF that is properly funded and which can meet ongoing pension liabilities. We are obviously confident about that, but it is prudent to safeguard against extraordinary eventualities. That is why we are putting these checks and balances into the system. We can argue whether the figure should be 100 per cent. or 90 per cent., but one argument for the 90 per cent. is simply that those below retirement age are, by definition, in a better position to find new work and to supplement their retirement income than those who are above retirement age. This is obviously a broad-brush approach and there will be some rough justice, but the amendment would remove one of those checks and balances—albeit one that would, as I have said, be used only in the most extreme cases—which would undermine confidence.

The members of the PPF board will have the relevant expertise and information available to oversee the PPF's investment strategy and set the pension protection levies at appropriate levels to ensure that the PPF has sufficient funds to pay out compensation. It is important to point out that the PPF will have recourse to a number of measures that must be implemented before reduction of compensation can ever be an option. For example, the PPF will be able to raise the pension protection levies, reduce revaluation and indexation, or borrow commercially. In fact, the compensation percentages can be varied to below the level currently set out in schedule 7 only when revaluation and indexation have been reduced to nil.

The Secretary of State can make a reduction or an increase in compensation only if a recommendation to that effect is made by the board. The Secretary of State will give extremely careful consideration to any such proposal from the board, which can be made only following consultation. In addition, any change to the level of compensation would have to be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure. The clause makes it clear that indexation and revaluation must have been reduced to nil before the percentages of compensation payable by the board can be reduced below 100 per cent. to 90 per cent., and that indexation and revaluation cannot be reapplied unless those original percentages are in payment. I am sure that hon. Members will agree that a balance is needed between building in constraints to reassure levy payers that costs will not rise beyond control and allowing the PPF flexibility to raise the funds that it needs to reassure members that they are sufficiently protected. Let us not forget that paragraph 29 also provides for compensation percentages to be increased. Amendment No. 28 seeks to increase the cap on indexation to 5 per cent.

Legislation was introduced in April 1997 requiring certain occupational pension schemes to provide indexation capped at 5 per cent. on all pension accruals. This Bill seeks to reduce the indexation capped at 2.5 per cent. on all future accruals through clause 246, which relates to the annual increase in the rate of certain occupational pensions. Clause 247 is also relevant. It would therefore be inconsistent with other provisions in the Bill were the PPF to provide indexation greater than 2.5 per cent. By restricting the amount of indexation paid, the PPF is better able to predict its liabilities and plan ahead financially. In terms, that means that the PPF can provide consistent and meaningful compensation to scheme members.

Were indexation increased from 2.5 to 5 per cent. on all post-1997 accruals, we estimate that the PPF levies would increase by approximately £100 million per year. It is not clear to me whether that is a new spending commitment—the hon. Member for Eastbourne will wish to tell us. We must not lose sight of the fact that businesses must ultimately bear the burden of financing PPF levels of benefit, and although we aim to provide meaningful compensation, we must balance that with affordability. In addition, from 10 May 2004, as we know, the priority order has changed for schemes that wind up, giving greater priority to scheme members who are under normal pension age by dealing with them before the indexation of pensioner members. I ask the hon. Gentleman to consider withdrawing the amendments.

Mr. Waterson: Let me reassure the Minister that these are probing amendments, but what they are designed to probe is an important issue, which has emerged as a major theme in Committee and will certainly be a major theme on Third Reading—the difference between spin and reality as to the sort of guarantee or safety net that this Bill is supposed to deliver.

I was slightly amused in relation to two of the factors on which the Minister was trying to rely, in terms of availability of the right decision making and resources. First, there were the qualifications of members of the board. We have just had that debate. Let us hope that they are well qualified, as that will not be stated in the Bill. Secondly, he talked about commercial borrowing. I have not had time to look up the reference, but the Minister was pretty adamant in Committee that that would only be for relatively short-term cash-flow requirements, and that the PPF would not be expected to borrow massively on the markets. Indeed, it would be odd if it were being given that power without some sort of Treasury guarantee.

[Mr. Waterson]

That brings me on to my main point, before I deal with the specific amendments in more detail: there are only limited numbers of directions from which resources can come to the PPF. There are the assets that it may take over from schemes that, by definition, are short of assets, and the investment income that it makes from them. There is the levy income, which we know is reduced in the early stages in any event, certainly in the first year. There may be some short-term borrowing, but we can discount that. Certainly, no public money is to be made available, as I understand it. This is, then, an organisation with finite resources. I do not say that that is necessarily a bad thing, but it is the background against which the amendments must be examined.

I can say immediately that I have no difficulties with amendments Nos. 101, 102 and 103. Our proposal to substitute "90 per cent." for "100 per cent." is really an attempt to draw out the justification for the distinction between those who are not retired and those who are. I did not get to the bottom of that in Committee. One late entrant in the reasons race was that there would somehow be an effect on key decision makers who would otherwise go out of their way to arrange matters so that a particular company's pension scheme did not function properly. I must say that I think that a rather desperate argument. I do not see why there should be a distinction. Ideally all involved should receive 100 per cent., because the Government are offering a guarantee.

The Minister talks of rough justice. That brings me to the question of indexation, and the 2.5 versus 5 per cent. The Minister talks as if we were trying to do something new and different. All we are trying to do is reinsert the current 5 per cent. figure. We had a lengthy discussion of the issue in Committee. The 2.5 per cent. figure may be all right for the moment, while inflation is relatively low, but every time I pick up a newspaper I see talk of a sharp rise in inflation, mainly because of oil crises. No doubt the Chancellor himself is getting a bit worried. Why seek to reduce the existing figure to 2.5 per cent. at this stage of the game, when there seems to be a reasonable consensus—certainly in the industry—that 5 per cent. is sensible? The Minister has put it to me in terms of a public spending commitment, but I would put it the other way round. Given that the purpose of a Bill that has been allotted 22 sittings in Committee and three days on Report is to restore confidence in pensions, why should there be all this cheese paring in people's entitlements?

A closely related aspect is the cut-off date for pension increases. In its briefing, Age Concern has expressed its own worries. It says that the actuaries Lane Clark and Peacock and the Occupational Pensioners Alliance estimate that some pensioners may receive only 70 to 80 per cent. of their total pension promise under the PPF. It refers to pensioners who retired before 6 April 1997. It states:

"We believe the Bill should be changed so everyone can be entitled to 100 per cent. compensation".

That is the point I am trying to make. I cannot see why there should be either the 90 versus 100 per cent. distinction or the little distinctions buried in the small print, not immediately visible to the average leisured reader, which will cheese pare away the amounts that people will receive in real life.

Mr. Webb: It would not be in the spirit of today's debate to carp at this juncture, but on the one hand the hon. Gentleman asks why everyone cannot have 100 per cent. compensation and 5 per cent. indexation, while on the other hand he has tabled amendments designed to cap the levy so that there is no burden on business. Surely the flip side of what he is demanding is an even greater burden on business about which, presumably, the Conservatives will be worried tomorrow. What is his position?

Mr. Waterson: Unlike the Liberal Democrats, we are concerned both about pensioners and about business and industry. We think that there is a balance to be struck. I said in Committee, and will repeat on Third Reading, that the Government approached the whole business the wrong way round. One reason why the Bill has been overshadowed by our earlier debate about the 60,000 people whom it would not compensate, many of whom may still not be compensated—we must await the small print—is that the Government were desperate to get the legislation on the statute book so that they could say that they had set up the PPF. What they should have done was take a more measured approach to the legislation, which presumably will be there for a long time, and initially tackle the problem of the people who have already lost out. The American scheme, which was a model for this scheme, did not pay out any moneys for several years, as I understand it, because it was building up its resources. I think that we will end up with a very rickety PPF in the early stages, potentially with claims waiting to fall upon it and insufficient resources to meet them.

That brings me neatly to the most important of this group of amendments, amendment No. 31, which relates to the Government's power, tucked away in paragraph 29 of schedule 7, to reduce payments. The Minister says, accurately if not fairly, that there is also the power to increase compensation. However, we are really talking about an overweening power of the Government to reduce payments. On the one hand, the Government say that they will provide a complete safety net, a guarantee for people in these pension schemes, so that if the unpleasant things that have happened to people in the past, particularly the recent past, happen again, people will be fully protected. However, on the other hand, they say in the small print that there are going to be caps, that there is a 90 per cent. figure for people who have not actually retired, that they are going to fiddle with the indexation, and that they will take the power to reduce the compensation and benefits paid under the legislation.

It is no good the Minister saying, as he did, that the Government will use that power only in extreme circumstances. As I tried to point out in an intervention, I presume that the only circumstances in which that will happen will be where there are not enough resources in the fund. I cannot think of any other circumstances in which that will happen. That might be an extreme circumstance, but it is the only one that could, I imagine, prompt the operation of paragraph 29 of schedule 7. If the Government are really persisting with the notion that the PPF is a stand-alone fund with no Treasury backing and no Treasury guarantee, and that it will have to stand on its own feet, those are the circumstances that will prompt a reduction in benefits.

It is no good Ministers saying that they are providing a full guarantee and safety net. We visited the BBC website the other day, which said bluntly that people will get 90 per cent. if they are not retired and 100 per cent. if they are, with no qualification. We have had to write it a letter pointing out that that "ain't necessarily so". Ministers should be more up front. They were more up front in Committee, because they had no alternative, but we need to get the message across to people out there in the real world that this is not a full guarantee. To use the Minister's phrase again, there is an element of "rough justice". That is the point behind our probing amendments, and I commend them to the House.

Mr. Webb: This is an important group of amendments, despite the stage in the process of assessing the Bill that we have reached. As the Minister says, the Government amendments are largely technical. We have no problem with them.

I want to address two of the amendments of the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson): amendments Nos. 27, on the issue of 90 per cent. and 100 per cent., and 31. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's notes said this, but he forgot to say that amendment No. 31 was a Liberal Democrat amendment in Committee. I take it that, imitation being the sincerest form of flattery, he has brought back our amendment as a Conservative one on Report. I have certainly not changed my view that amendment No. 31 is very necessary and goes to the heart of the Bill, because it essentially relates to the fact that the Government will not act as lender of last resort to the PPF, which will have to go elsewhere. I shall come to amendment No. 31 in a moment.

I deal first with amendment No. 27, which is on the issue of 90 per cent. and 100 per cent. One can see a certain amount of logic in saying that people who have already retired cannot do anything about their predicament. So if their employer becomes insolvent, the scheme does not have enough money and the pension protection fund takes over the scheme's liabilities, it is reasonable for retired members to expect to get their full pension because, essentially, there is nothing else they can do.

6.30 pm

It is important to remember that even that statement needs qualifying. The question is—the Minister will doubtless intervene if I am wrong—100 per cent. of what? Even 100 per cent. will not necessarily constitute the entire pension that a person was expecting to get, and for two reasons. First, they will get 100 per cent. of the pension that they were expecting to get, excluding indexation for pre-1997 rights. In other words, even if the scheme of which they were a member offered them indexation on pre-1997 rights, the PPF will not. So there will be a set of people going into the PPF who will get a lower pension over time than they would have received had their existing scheme continued.

To some extent, this has been a theme of the day. Even now, to talk of guarantees and 100 per cent. is somewhat dangerous and potentially misleading. The literature that the Government send out to members of schemes who, in effect, will become members of PPF schemes will need to be explicit in pointing out that they will not get 100 per cent; otherwise, we could have a repetition of what happened with inherited SERPS—the state earnings-related pension scheme—whereby everybody in this place knew what had changed, but nobody else did. The official literature sent to SERPS members did not explain what had happened, and in the end the Government had to point out that people had been misinformed, and had to spend billions of pounds on putting matters right. Our discussions have given rise to one or two, albeit charitably intended, warnings. The Government need to look very carefully at the way in which they communicate with PPF scheme members. They need to realise that they will not necessarily get 100 per cent., if they were entitled to anything other than post-1997 indexation.

Moreover, such people will not get 100 per cent. anyway if, for example, their scheme includes particular provisions relating to survivor's benefits or to unmarried spouses. We touched on this issue in Committee, and I suggested then to the Minister that the PPF, which presumably will roll forward over decades, should be a forward-looking scheme that reflects best practice in the private sector, rather than a 1940s view of society. The 100 per cent. provision ought to match best practice in the occupational sector. For example, if a scheme provides for a surviving unmarried partner, the PPF should do the same.

Malcolm Wicks: It might help our deliberations on Report if the hon. Members for Northavon (Mr. Webb) and for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) cared to cost their proposals and to tell the House where the money would come from. I am advised that 100 per cent. compensation for all and indexation capped at 5 per cent. would add £200 million a year. Would the hon. Gentlemen raise the levy to raise that money, or would they make an Exchequer contribution? The House should know whether the Opposition do occasionally cost their proposals.

Mr. Webb: The Minister's intervention may well have been inspired, but it does not relate to anything that I have said so far. My point is that the terms "100 per cent." and "90 per cent." create a particular mental picture; indeed, that is what amendment No. 27 is all about. Those who listen to our deliberations—poor souls!—will get the impression that the PPF will provide full compensation. I have tried to illustrate through two particular cases that "100 per cent." does not mean 100 per cent., and it is very important that people should not get the impression that it does. Even raising the rate from 90 per cent. to 100 per cent. would not mean full compensation, because of the exceptions that I have mentioned.

Even if we were to raise the rate to 100 per cent., as amendment No. 26 would do, we would still not be providing full cover. But the key question, which amendment No. 27 addresses, is: who gets 90 per cent. and who gets 100 per cent.? We are agreed that people who have already retired will get 100 per cent., even though 100 per cent. is a rather limited concept. I am not uncomfortable about people who have not retired—they are still working— getting 90 per cent., but the nub of the amendment is about the people in between; that means people below the normal pension age of the scheme who might be drawing a pension. If the Bill is not altered as the amendment suggests, they will receive only 90 per cent. of their pension. The question is whether that is fair.

The Minister's response was that it was a moral hazard point—something that the Government appear to have been fond of during the Bill's passage. Sometimes it happens that a company director, perhaps in his early 60s and seeing that things are going wrong with the company, decides to retire, even though he has not reached the normal pension age of the scheme. He applies to the scheme for retirement benefits and then, mysteriously, the company winds up the next day. Lo and behold, he is in the 100 per cent. rather than the 90 per cent. camp. That would certainly apply under existing rules about wind-up. Before the PPF is introduced, such a person falls into the favoured rather than the unfavoured category. The Government appear to be saying that, to avoid that happening, they will treat anyone under the normal pension age—whether retired or not—as being in the 90 per cent. category.

The point that I put to the Minister in my intervention—I have to say that I was not convinced by his response—was that the provision amounted to a sledgehammer. I am not sure whether sledgehammers can catch rotten apples, but this one appears to be trying to catch the odd rotten apple, while at the same time hitting many deserving people. Leaving aside ill health—it is dealt with in a separate part of the Bill—it might affect people who, for perfectly good and proper reasons, have taken early retirement at an actuarially reduced level. They then find that that level of pension, already below the norm, is reduced by a further 10 per cent. As I understand it, that is what the Government's proposals will do. The people affected are living on pensions that are already fairly modest, perhaps because they have been drawn early on account of family circumstances.

Let me provide an example to explain why such people are important. Someone could take an early retirement pension to look after a spouse and become a carer. They need money to live on and they cannot wait until they are 65. They have to stop working so they draw an early retirement pension at, say, 62. If the firm goes to the wall, they may believe that the PPF into which their employer had paid PPF levies will provide them with insurance, effectively replacing the pension. However, the PPF may come along, under which they can be paid only 90 per cent., not 100 per cent. The critical point is that that will not apply just for one year, but for ever—an issue that has not emerged from our debate so far.

Malcolm Wicks: The hon. Gentleman seems to make no allowance for the fact that, where a company pension scheme goes bu and there are relatively few assets, people could be faced with receiving only 20 per cent. of their pension rights. Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that, if such people could receive 90 per cent. under the PPF, they might be rather pleased that we legislated to set it up?

Mr. Webb: I wonder whether the Minister has misunderstood me. My illustrative people are a man in his early 60s or a woman in her late 50s who give up work to become carers. When the firm goes to the wall, such people are, under the present regime with the present wind-up rules, in the privileged category that gets first call on the fund. The problem is that those people might get 100 per cent. and the workers next to nothing. If there is absolutely no money in the fund whatever, of course the Minister is right. Generally, however, those people will receive privileged treatment.

My key point is that the Government are using the rule pertaining to people below normal pension age as an anti-moral hazard point, thereby catching many deserving good people.

In all other parts of the Bill, the Government have introduced screeds of new clauses to deal with moral hazard. Instead of tarring everyone with the same brush, they have thought about how people might abuse the system, and defined very specifically what will not be allowed. For example, the Bill does not allow a person to set up a company with no assets to run a pension scheme, and then let that company become insolvent. The Bill explicitly prohibits that sort of moral hazard.

Why do the Government not deal with the rotten apples by inserting a clause to prevent people from retiring the day before a company goes bust? That would be my strategy, and it would not have the damaging effect on carers that the Government's strategy will.

Amendment No. 27 would protect the pension rights of what I imagine is a relatively small number of people, and is therefore desirable, but accepting it would mean that another anti-moral hazard provision would be needed. Perhaps the hon. Member for Eastbourne has something in mind: history shows that some people have abused the system by using their inside knowledge to put themselves in a favourable position just before a pension fund is wound up.

That outrage is clearly unacceptable, and a further anti-moral hazard provision is needed to prevent it. However, the Government's proposal is much too broad, because it includes many worthy and deserving people.

Mr. Waterson: Before the Bill even appeared, many industry experts told me that the key would be the anti-avoidance provisions that it contained. However, they have appeared only at the end of the Bill's passage through the House, and many have not been subject to proper consideration, either in Committee or on Report. Surely the right way to go about this matter is to consult the experts who might advise people how to get around the so-called moral hazard provisions. That would be preferable to the scatter-gun approach adopted by the Government.

Mr. Webb: That is an interesting question. Ironically, the Bill originally contained only one anti-moral hazard provision—the one that we are discussing now, which will catch many innocent people. All the other provisions were introduced at the last minute and, although I am sure that they are not merely an afterthought, their late appearance is rather worrying. But I do not want to go too far down that route.

I shall be interested to hear the Minister's response to this debate. I was a member of the Standing Committee, which did not consider this matter in any depth, and I do not think that I am repeating debates that have been held already on this point. There are deserving people in the middle group—the pre-pension age retired, not workers or retired people over pension age—who would benefit from amendment No. 27. At present, they are being harshly treated, and I am sympathetic to the amendment for that reason.

My main observations will concentrate on amendment No. 31, but I want to say a few words about amendment No. 28, which would replace the proposed 2.5 per cent. indexation level with a level of 5 per cent. The Minister said that that would not be possible as the Bill was premised on 2.5 per cent. indexation, but in fact it already contains a 5 per cent. indexation level in connection with revaluation. The Government seem to have forgotten to change that bit. They cannot argue that amendment No. 28 would not work because it is out of kilter with the rest of the Bill, or because inflation will be 2.5 per cent. always and for ever. The weakness of that argument is revealed by the fact that a figure of 5 per cent. already appears in the Bill.

Funnily enough—and I made this point in an earlier intervention on the hon. Member for Eastbourne—an argument for taking 5 per cent. down to 2.5 per cent. could be made on the basis that the Bill places a burden on final salary schemes, in the form of the PPF levy. The flip side of that is that it will reduce the burden on such schemes through retirement benefits and indexation. The implication of amendment No. 28 is that the schemes would have to bear that burden but that they would not get the relief from it.

The Secretary of State asked whether it would not be better to accept a trade off and have safe company pensions—albeit with more limited indexation through the PPF—rather than unsafe ones, and that is quite a strong argument. However, the hon. Member for Eastbourne needs to explain how, if he wants 5 per cent. indexation, he would reconcile that with his other amendments that try to reduce the burden on the scheme.

My main concern is amendment No. 31, which is based on an amendment that we tabled in Committee. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) made fun of the fact that we did not table very many amendments, but we tabled this one because we feel strongly about the issue. Amendment No. 31 would remove the Government's ability to undermine the PPF. Otherwise, it would not really be an insurance scheme, because the Government would be able to say, when the going got tough, that the benefits would be cut.

This point only dawned on me during the recent exchanges—I had thought that the only way in which the Government could undermine the PPF was through the draconian and extreme process of affirmative resolutions in both Houses of Parliament to cut the 100 per cent. and 90 per cent. benefits: I had forgotten that before we got to that stage, the Government could have undermined the PPF in other ways. That is why amendment No. 31 is necessary.

When times get hard, the PPF could put the levy up. It could also cut the indexation or the revalorisation, and that would mean a real cut in people's entitlements. I had thought, charitably, that the PPF was a strong guarantee of benefits, because although 100 per cent. did not quite mean 100 per cent. and 90 per cent. did not quite mean 90 per cent., only in extremis would the Government undermine the value of benefits. However, I had forgotten that the PPF, without recourse to this House, could cut indexation benefits. Why does that matter?

The cut might be only 2.5 per cent. and we might think that we could live with that. However, people—especially women—might typically be retired for 20 to 25 years and if the non-indexation were to take place over several years, pensions could be cut by 10 or 15 per cent. Indeed, if the fund were not restored, that reduction in benefits could continue for the rest of the recipients' lives.

When the Minister responds, I hope that he will tell us whether the PPF will be under any onus to restore lost indexation. Amendment No. 31 is about what will happen when times get tough and the indexation is knocked off. When times are good again, will the PPF be under an obligation to restore the indexation? People who pay the PPF levy through their employers will want to know what they can expect. Will the literature for the members of PPF schemes say that not only does 100 per cent. not actually mean 100 per cent., but the inflation protection may be undermined and never restored? If it does not say that, there is a danger that scheme members will be misled.

What should be the appropriate response from the PPF when things get tough? The first step would be to put up the levy. We have already discussed the cap on increases in the levy and that could put a financial pressure on the fund that it might have to respond to in other ways. The Minister said that paragraph 29 of schedule 7, which the amendment would delete, is necessary because the levy could rise "exponentially". But there is a cap, so there is a limit on how much the PPF board can respond to adverse circumstances by raising the levy.

If raising the levy does not deal with the financial shortfall, what would happen? In that case, the indexation or revalorisation would stop, and people would not have inflation protection. In other words, their pensions would be cut in real terms.

At that stage the Government say that the next thing that the board can do is to borrow money on the market. In Committee, we discussed whether that was a good idea and it struck me as absurd that because of their obsession with privatisation the Government would prefer the PPF board to borrow money from the private market, with all the associated risk premiums and profit margins, yet the Government could raise the money more cheaply so that the taxpayer obtained better value.

We would not necessarily want the PPF board constantly to have to come back to the Government, so it could perhaps borrow money for cash flow. I accept the arguments about the need for the board to be at arm's length from the Government, so we could allow it some day-to-day flexibility. However, it would be bad economics if, in the event of a serious financial crisis, such as a big steel company or a big airline going to the wall and making a large claim on the fund, the board responded by huge borrowing on the commercial markets. It would be bad public spending and the National Audit Office would probably have something to say about it.

None the less, the Government say that the board can borrow on those markets and having done so it will have recourse to paragraph 29 of schedule 7. When the Minister responds, will he tell us whether there will be a limit on the PPF's borrowing powers? Why does it need such powers? If the Government think that it should be able to borrow money, it should be able to borrow as much as it needs. Why are the Government allowing the PPF to cut back further on the 100 per cent. or the 90 per cent? If the Government accept the principle that the PPF can borrow, what limits do they have in mind?

Perhaps the Treasury view is that the debts of the PPF would be on the Government's balance sheet. Can the Minister tell us whether the Chancellor is worried that if the PPF borrows—because there is a financial mess—its debts will be on the public sector balance sheet and will feature in his borrowing figures? I presume that is why PPF borrowing is to be capped. If so, what would happen?

Let us suppose that all avenues have been tried: we have cut indexation; we have borrowed money; we have increased the levy up to the cap and there is still not enough. What would happen then? There are two options. The first is in the Bill; it would be to ask the House and the other place to approve a cut in the pay-out—to reduce the 100 per cent. to 90 per cent. or the 90 per cent. to 80 per cent., or whatever the figure happens to be.

People have been told not to worry because their pensions will be insured. The Secretary of State has told us that just as we can insure our holidays or our cars so, too, we can insure our pensions. But what sort of insurance company would say when someone made a claim, "Sorry, we're having a bad year and we're not going to pay you"? That would be outrageous and probably actionable. It would be wholly unacceptable for Direct Line to tell me, in response to a claim on my car insurance: "We're having a tough time. The roads have been icy lately so there have been a lot of claims. We can't increase premiums so we can pay you only 80 per cent. of the value of your car, not the 100 per cent. you were expecting." It would presumably be illegal to do that in the private sector, so why do the Government want such a power in the Bill?

What is the alternative? What should have been in the Bill? The Government should act as lender of last resort. They would not make a grant, nor would they bail out the PPF in the sense of handing over public money from the taxpayer, but would stand ready to lend. That is what happens in terrorism reinsurance. The Government want there to be a market, but as insurers would be subject to calamitous risks if they offered insurance against terrorism, the Government say, "Don't worry. You offer the insurance and we'll stand behind it. If necessary, we will lend money to make the market work." That is precisely what the Government should do in this case.

When things get difficult for the PPF, which may happen not in year one, but decades down the line, the Government should be there to say, "You've tried putting up the levy as much as you can", perhaps to the ceiling, "You've got rid of indexation"—although I have some reservations about cutting benefits at all, because even cutting indexation benefits is the same as ringing up Direct Line to be told that it will not pay out, so I am more worried about that provision than when I started considering these proposals—"You've done all those things. You may even have done some borrowing, but things are still tough. Right, we can borrow money more cheaply than you can. We will lend to the fund to tide it over, but the money will be repaid."

I stress that the money would be repaid. It is not a public spending commitment, but a cash flow issue. Something calamitous could happen to the scheme. That happened in America, where big airlines and big steel companies became insolvent. We have been talking about steel companies today, so this is not far fetched. Such things can happen. We could experience a sectoral recession that hits an industry, causing a rush of claims on the fund. It would then be wrong to jack up the levy excessively on the firms that survive or to slash the pensions in payment to retired people.

The right thing for the Government to do would be to tide over the PPF. That would not be expensive; the Government would get back their money, because steel firms or airlines will not go to the wall every year. There will be good years and bad years, and the Government would see the PPF through the bad years. I simply cannot understand the point of paragraph 29 of schedule 7, unless the Chancellor is behind it, and I presume that he is because he does not want the borrowing to appear on his balance sheet. We fundamentally believe that this will not be a proper insurance scheme unless the Government stand behind it as lender of last resort.

To draw those threads together, we moved a similar amendment in Committee because we believe passionately that the Bill is fatally flawed: it will set up not a proper insurance scheme, but an insurance scheme with a hole in it. If people make a claim on the scheme in a good year, everything will be fine; but if they make a claim in a bad year, the insurer may turn round and say, "Sorry, we're not going to pay out." Given that we have discussed restoring confidence in pensions and that the PPF and the special financial assistance scheme are supposed to restore confidence, what will paragraph 29 of schedule 7 do? It will undermine confidence in pensions. It says, "You thought you were insured, but you weren't."

The history of pensions is that people are given promises and Governments tell them things, but when they go back to the Government, they are told, "We didn't mean it," "We meant something else," "We forgot to tell you," or "There's something in the small print." That is a dreadful basis on which to set up a shiny new scheme. Paragraph 29 of schedule 7 does not belong in the Bill. A better way forward would be for the Government to lend the money when things get difficult. That is why amendment No. 31 deserves the support of the House.

Malcolm Wicks: The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb), who has spoken for about half an hour, has a certain style. His style is to seek to rubbish any decent, progressive and positive social reform that this Labour Government bring. With pension credit, he says that it is about stigma and complexity and, as a result, some of his own constituents will be put off claiming it. With the PPF, he pours circumstance on circumstance and absurd eventuality on eventuality to say that we will not be able to pay proper benefits. Of course, he was equally cynical about the assistance scheme that we introduced this afternoon. As I said, he has a certain style. It is cynical, pessimistic, negative and sneering; it is about seeking to achieve the triumph of fear over hope. But we have seen through him and will not let him get away with it.

We have carefully costed the pension protection fund. We are determined that those of pensionable age will have 100 per cent. of pension rights. We are determined that the workers will get 90 per cent. We are determined that those who have to retire on ill-health grounds will get 100 per cent. We know how we will pay for it. We have learned the lessons from the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation—

It being Seven o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

SITTINGS IN WESTMINSTER HALL

Ordered,

That, on Thursday 10th June, there shall be no sitting in Westminster Hall.—[Mr. Heppell.]

Children's Hospices

Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough) (Lab): I wish to present a petition on behalf of my constituent, Mr. Peter Finnegan, and several thousand residents from my constituency and throughout South Yorkshire to protest at what is perceived to be the iniquitous level of national health service funding being allocated to children's hospices when compared with that allocated to adult hospices.

The petition states:—

To the House of Commons

The petition of Mr. Peter Finnegan and residents of South Yorkshire

Declares that while adult hospices receive 37 per cent. of their funds from statutory sources, children's hospices receive only 4.17 per cent. of their funds in this way. Children with life-threatening illnesses and their parents need adequate hospice facilities, and the gap between the funding allocations to adult hospice facilities and to services for children is unfair to children and their parents.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Health to review hospice services for children. The petitioners further request that the House of Commons pass legislation to rectify the imbalance in funding allocations to children's and adult hospices.

And the petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Travellers' Sites (West Leeds)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Paul Clark.]

7.2 pm

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West) (Lab): In recent times, there have been several attempts, through early-day motions and private Members' Bills, to address issues to do with Travellers and the law, and those have received helpful and encouraging responses from Ministers. However, we need legislative action now to break the Gordian knot of local conflict.

In the Minister for Housing and Planning's opening remarks on the Housing Bill last week, he reminded us of its overall aim and purpose, which is to help to build sustainable communities and to tackle the most pressing problems of homelessness and unfit conditions, but I submit that that will be unachievable unless the persistent conflict between residents and Travellers in our neighbourhoods is addressed. The Government have some responsibility, as do local authorities, to resolve the conflicts.

Supported by the Commission for Racial Equality, Shelter, the Local Government Association, the local chief police officer, the Children's Society and the Travellers law reform coalition, I tabled amendments to the Housing Bill. They attempted to reinforce that aim of sustainable communities in practice by changing the law so that we could tackle the conflict that has been raging unresolved for years in our neighbourhoods and communities between the settled population and the Travellers and Gypsies who are camped on inappropriate illegal sites.

The Government have a responsibility not to push the problem on to local councils, which then push the conflict into the surrounding neighbourhoods, while hoping that it is somehow magically resolved. We need to come up with a solution from which both Travellers and local residents benefit. We need to give Travellers accommodation, which means proper sites, with the same status as housing, so that it is assessed and delivered in the same way. That could be twin-tracked with a statutory duty to provide and facilitate more site provision. There should be a proper obligation on local authorities to provide and facilitate sites, and we should allow Housing Corporation money to be used for the purpose of constructing new sites, as my amendments suggested. In the words of the Traveller law reform coalition, we need to work for "a win-win situation from which Travellers and non-Travellers will benefit."

We cannot toughen up the law to move Travellers on if there is nowhere for them to go. Recently, in the neighbourhood of Wortley in my constituency, 12 caravans were parked on the Oldfield Road football pitches, which were moved off. They moved to Farnley park over the Easter weekend, making local football and cricket impossible. They were evicted and moved down to Hunslet, where they were evicted again and moved to another public park, Western Flats, in Wortley. They have been driven off the Western Flats and are now at Wortley recreational ground. They have received a notice to move on Friday.

Those 12 caravans belong to one family, who have lived in Leeds for generations. The family group includes an elderly man with Alzheimer's, a young child with pneumonia, a two-month-old baby who has never received appropriate medical attention because of the constant movement of the family, and a mother who recently collapsed and was in hospital for two days. Some of the children go to local schools in my constituency and are taken there every day by the Travellers education support unit. Since January, the caravans have been moved 50 times, so the children do not know where they are going home to after school. That is quite apart from the fact that the caravans are on sites without water or toilets, and are thus insanitary and quite inappropriate for families.

The endless round of court notices and eviction enforcements mean that families are pushed from pillar to post. Everybody, from settled neighbours to Travellers and their families becomes totally exasperated, and council officials and the local police are caught in the middle of many angry conflicts. The cause of the problem is the shortage of sites or pitches on which the caravans can stop. In practice, 30 per cent. of Travellers in Britain are hounded from one unauthorised place to another, with all the associated problems of unofficial camping, clean-up costs and no chance of proper education for the children. Furthermore, poor living conditions have a detrimental impact on the health of Traveller families, who have the lowest life expectancy and the highest child mortality rates of any group in Britain.

Ironically, the only permanent site for Travellers in Leeds is in the very Wortley ward where that family is being moved around. It is located at Cottingley Springs and has 41 plots. The Caravan Sites Act 1968, backed up after 1980 by 100 per cent. Government grants, was designed to provide sites. The unauthorised encampment figure went down from 80 per cent. to 30 per cent., but the measure was repealed by the Conservative Government in 1994 and the duty on local authorities to provide sites ended. The Conservative Government suggested that the onus in future should be on Travellers and Gypsies to provide their own private sites. In practice, as everyone knows, when Travellers buy private land they can hardly ever get planning permission to have a site on it. Following the repeal of the duty on local authorities to provide sites, the number of sites has declined, and some have been shut down altogether. Bradford, for example, has a site of 30 plots; Wakefield, 40 plots; and Leeds, 41 plots, all at Cottingley Springs, which was built in 1969. In Leeds in January 2004, however, there were 51 unauthorised encampments, an increase from 34 the previous January. In Leeds, if my figures are right, there are some 1,500 Travellers, including 500 children of school age. About 50 to 70 Traveller families now live in ordinary housing. The real problem, for which Leeds city council should take some responsibility, is that there are no transit sites. There is a permanent site, but no transit sites.

A briefing paper from Leeds city council race equality advisory forum that was sent to the council's scrutiny board states:

"The primary concern of Leeds Travellers is inadequate site provision."

It acknowledges the existence of Cottingley Springs, but goes on to say:

"There are no official transit sites in Leeds."

The Travellers' view is, "You want to evict us, but where can we go?" There is nowhere that can be suggested. Every week an average of 10 Traveller families—80 to 90 people in 30 caravans—are living on unauthorised sites with no sanitation, no utilities and no refuse collection. There are an average of three evictions a week that cost about £2,500 a time, excluding police costs, staff costs and possible legal costs.

There are no vacancies at the Cottingley Springs site. Families are doubling up and there is a large waiting list—60 families, I understand. In Yorkshire, there are no local authority sites at all in Castleford, Pontefract, Huddersfield, Dewsbury or Halifax. There are no sites in the Kirklees area, none in Calderdale and none in the whole of north Yorkshire. There is only one site in Wakefield, one in Leeds and one in Bradford.

The Conservative Calderdale council, for example, which takes a hard line, evicts Travellers from unauthorised sites and escorts them to the Sheffield roundabout, directing them to head for Leeds or Bradford. That is unacceptable. It does not resolve the problem, but merely passes the buck and is a recipe for continued local conflict.

In a debate such as this we need a sense of perspective and a sense of proportion. The problem is not infinite. The Traveller community in the whole of England and Wales is made up of 90,000 to 120,000 nomadic or mobile Travellers, with an estimated further 200,000 of Traveller ancestry living in settled housing. In the last national count of Travellers' caravans published by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister in January, there were 14,309 caravans, 3,571 or 25 per cent. of which were on unauthorised encampments. There were 5,848 caravans on authorised council sites and another 4,890 on authorised private sites.

There are some 320 council-owned sites in England, providing some 5,000 pitches. I know that research carried out by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister in 2002 showed that by 2005 a further 3,000 to 4,500 additional permanent and transit pitches would be needed to resolve a future crisis. The Gypsy Council believes that that is an underestimate of the real need. I believe we need 1,000 to 2,000 additional residential pitches and between 2,000 and 2,500 transit pitches in England and Wales. Surely we can go some way to making that provision and resolving the problem.

We need to broaden our definitions of accommodation and include the accommodation needs of Travellers and Gypsies under the definition of housing need. That would enable them to be considered as in housing need, rather than telling them that by law they must move on to some undefined place. That would alleviate pressure on site provision. It would enable local authorities and the Government to access housing association resources to provide new sites with decent provisions on a scale that we have not managed to achieve since the efforts of 1969. It would allow social landlords to register as site providers. That in itself could open up flexibility in provision.

I do not believe that there are no practical measures that could be taken to resolve the problem. Including Travellers in the provision of accommodation should be part of social cohesion and sustainability strategies, not forcing them to live in permanent housing, but to allow sufficient capacity of permanent and temporary sites to enable them to move around and retain their traditional way of life. A little joined-up working between local authorities is needed to stop Travellers being passed backwards and forwards across local authority boundaries to councils that have sites from councils that do not have sites. The Traveller law reform coalition has introduced proposals to underpin the mainstream approach to site provision. It works with local authorities, the Children's Society, Shelter and the Commission for Racial Equality to press for an effective accommodation policy.

The Government have promised a review, and that point was reinforced by a helpful reply from my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning on Third Reading of the Housing Bill on 11 May, in which he said that the Government were looking to bring the review forward and to take some action.

In 2002, the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) attempted to introduce the Traveller Law Reform Bill, based on work by the Traveller law research unit of Cardiff university and the Joseph Rowntree housing trust, so the attempts to resolve the problem are underpinned by hard-headed research. Sites are not provided on the basis of guidance to local authorities alone—we have seen that that does not work—so sites must be treated like other forms of accommodation.

Sites should be assessed alongside housing needs, which are fed into the regional housing strategy, the regional spatial strategy and plans at the local level. That will enable us to ensure that sufficient provision exists to resolve the problem sensibly and practically. We need new measures to increase the level of Traveller site provision to break out of the vicious circle of unauthorised stops, complaints, evictions, moves on, unauthorised stops, complaints, aggravation and moves on. Residents and Travellers should not be forced into that cycle for ever.

The new Housing Bill provides a good opportunity for the Government to break through that vicious circle. We must move the agenda forward and resolve the challenge as a matter of urgency. The Housing Bill now moves to the other place, so I plead with the Minister not to miss this parliamentary opportunity to do something positive about a long-standing conflict that affects many constituencies, urban as well as rural. Positive action will benefit both local residents and Traveller and Gypsy families alike. The challenge can be met and the problems can be resolved, but it will take determined action by the Government and local authorities to play their full part.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Yvette Cooper): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) on securing the debate and on raising an important issue.

My hon. Friend addressed the issue in a balanced, thoughtful way by describing his constituency experience and the impact of the shortage of sites both on Gypsy and Traveller groups and on the settled community. He is right that the issues can cause extreme stress and distress for both the settled community and people who are struggling to find somewhere to stay put.

My hon. Friend rightly identifies that the heart of the problem is that not enough sites are currently available to meet demand. That can lead to unauthorised encampments, which can cause great distress to the local community, especially where damage is done to local areas. That can also lead to unauthorised development, where Gypsies and Travellers buy up sites for which planning permission is not given, which causes all sorts of frictions both within the planning system and, again, with local communities. Unauthorised development has increased significantly over the past few years.

My hon. Friend set out that Gypsy and Traveller communities often have below-average health and educational outcomes and life expectancy, above-average infant mortality, and that their children achieve poor results in school. Social exclusion is also a serious consequence, which may be exacerbated when families move from place to place over a short period of time. There can also be serious consequences in terms of social tensions between different groups and communities. Given our strong desire to promote social cohesion and sustainable communities, we need to take those issues seriously. We should recognise that in many areas, sites have been responsibly managed and Gypsy and Traveller groups can live amicably alongside local settled communities. However, my hon. Friend is right to say that all sorts of tensions can arise where matters are badly handled and there are problems with site provision.

There are wide variations in the approach taken by local authorities in terms of their attitude to planning applications, the efficiency of their planning enforcement systems and the number of sites that they provide. My hon. Friend described the position in parts of Yorkshire. Other parts of the country, too, show very wide variations. It is disappointing that some local authorities with significant problems with unauthorised encampments and developments do very little to provide appropriate sites. We are concerned about that.

We have launched a major Government review of Gypsy and Traveller accommodation. I believe that it is unprecedented for any Government to look in such detail at the accommodation requirements of Gypsy and Traveller groups and communities. In conducting that review, we are working closely with local authorities, Gypsy and Traveller groups, the all-party group on Traveller law reform, the Commission for Racial Equality and other groups. I have taken part in seminars to discuss the issues and possible options with a range of stakeholders. I have also met several MPs from all over the country to try to ensure that as wide a range of views as possible feeds into the review and that concerns from across the country are taken seriously.

The review is still under way, but I want to take this opportunity to highlight a few aspects on which we are already making progress. My hon. Friend referred particularly to publicly provided sites, but the issue of privately provided sites is increasingly significant. Interestingly, the level of unauthorised encampments over the past few years has stayed broadly stable, but the level of unauthorised developments has increased significantly. That can cause great conflict in the planning system. There are two problems with the planning system as it stands: first, planning guidance can make it difficult for Gypsies and Travellers to identify appropriate sites to buy or to get planning permission to move on to; and secondly, the local authority's enforcement process in respect of inappropriate sites can be ineffective or cumbersome. We need to deal with both sides of that problem at the same time.

That is why we are reviewing the planning guidance that is given to local planning authorities in relation to Gypsy and Traveller accommodation. We expect local authorities to provide more help and support for Gypsies and Travellers in identifying appropriate sites, because too many do not do so. We are considering how planning guidance should be revised to ensure that that happens. At the same time, we have introduced into the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill a new temporary stop notice that will allow local authorities to take swift action to prevent long-term damage to sites where development is inappropriate. Again, we intend to consult in more detail on how that should work and be implemented before it is introduced because it is important to maintain a balanced approach and ensure that we are fair, in a way that the current system is not, to Gypsy and Traveller groups and the settled community.

My hon. Friend is right that public site provision varies throughout the country. We are keen for Gypsy and Traveller accommodation needs to be tackled alongside those of everybody else. It should be part of mainstream consideration of accommodation and housing need in every local area. For the first time, therefore, we expect local authorities to consider and tackle the need for accommodation for Gypsies and Travellers in their assessment of local accommodation needs. We shall issue revised guidance next year on how to do that. Housing and site need assessments will feed into the regional spatial strategies and the regional planning system. We are considering in more detail exactly how that should work and whether other measures are required to overcome some of the unnecessary barriers to site provision.

The Gypsy site refurbishment grant is available and has been expanded and extended to improve the conditions on sites throughout the country and to provide new transit sites and stopping places. My hon. Friend mentioned the need for transit sites in his area. Local authorities can apply for the refurbishment grant to provide more transit sites. So far, 205 separate site improvement projects have been funded. They have already made substantial improvements to the quality of many residents' lives.

My hon. Friend also mentioned permissible purposes for Housing Corporation money. We plan to extend the permissible purposes of that money to allow local registered social landlords to provide Gypsy and Traveller sites.

We are still considering a series of other issues, as my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning said. We have not yet made any decisions about legislation and believe that many of the changes will be possible without it. However, we have not concluded the process of considering different legislative options, as my right hon. Friend explained when he replied to the debate on the Housing Bill.

We recognise the importance of the issue and of a level playing field for local authorities so that they acknowledge and accept their responsibilities. Local authorities face different problems in different areas, and the need for sites and accommodation will be very different in different parts of the country; we would not expect to take a uniform approach. It is right that the authorities should recognise their responsibilities in this regard, as my hon. Friend said.

It is important for us to conduct the review in a thorough way, and to involve all those who have a stake in the process, so as to ensure that we get the right response. My hon. Friend's points have been very helpful in that regard. We also need to recognise that this is not simply an issue of site provision, important though that is. There are other issues involved, including those of antisocial behaviour and unauthorised encampments, which need to be addressed. That is why we are consulting, in conjunction with the Home Office, on guidance on the new powers against trespassing that were introduced in the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003. In the longer term, we are keen to work with other Departments on other issues, particularly the Department of Health and the Department for Education and Skills, in regard to the health needs of Gypsy and Traveller groups and their educational attainment, given the lower levels of attainment for Gypsy and Roma groups in many of our schools.

As I have said, a wide range of social exclusion issues is raised by the circumstances that Gypsies and Travellers face. It is important that we take a fair approach across the country, taking into consideration the different circumstances of Gypsy and Traveller groups and the needs of the settled community in different areas. I will certainly keep in touch with my hon. Friend about these issues as they progress, and about the work that we are doing as part of the review. There are not as many easy or swift answers as we would like, but I can assure him that we are taking this issue very seriously and examining it thoroughly, so as to find long-term improvements to the problems that trouble many areas of the country and which should not be doing so. It ought to be possible to resolve those issues in the long term, but we will need local communities, Gypsy and Traveller groups and local authorities to work together to ensure that we find sustainable solutions that meet everyone's needs.

Question put and agreed to.

PRIVATE BUSINESS

IPSWICH MARKET BILL

Considered; to be read the Third time.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Haskins Report

1. Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): If she will make a statement on the progress her Department is making towards implementing the Haskins report. [174399]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): I intend to publish a refreshed rural strategy for England later in the spring. The strategy will include a full response to the recommendations coming out of Lord Haskins's rural delivery review. Good progress is being made with stakeholders to develop this response.

Dr. Cable: I thank the Secretary of State for the positive tone of her reply. How does she propose to reconcile the approach of Lord Haskins, which is to deal with inefficiency and overstaffing in DEFRA through decentralisation, with the approach set out in the Chancellor's Gershon process, which is to deal with overstaffing and inefficiency by centralising decision making?

Margaret Beckett: With respect, I think that the hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the impact of the Chancellor's proposals. There is no difference of view between us that the decentralisation of delivery processes would be highly desirable, and that is entirely consistent with reducing perhaps unnecessarily full core activities at the centre.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend accept that, although Haskins has made many good recommendations, the true test is what is happening in rural areas? We must ensure that some of the good programmes that have been put in place by the Countryside Agency and others are allowed to continue. Does she agree that we need to ensure that that happens?

Margaret Beckett: I entirely agree that there are at least two important aspects to Lord Haskins's proposals, one of which is that we should have more effective organisation of the agencies and organisations that relate to DEFRA. The second, which is much more germane to the ordinary citizen in rural areas, is what happens to the plethora of rural funding streams; I believe that Lord Haskins identified between 70 and 100 of them. I have asked the Department to examine, as its first priority, how we can simplify this area to give better delivery of services to customers in rural areas.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): The Secretary of State talks about her rural strategy, and she will be aware that there is a plethora of organisations involved in the provision of flexible labour in agriculture and horticulture, particularly related to the work of gangmasters. What steps will she take, in the light of the report of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, to ensure that the Government at last appoint a Minister with the power to rationalise and make policy in this area effective?

Margaret Beckett: The right hon. Gentleman will know that the Select Committee report, which was published only yesterday, deals with a good number of the Committee's thoughts on that matter. I have not had a chance to study it, although I shall of course do so. The Government are conscious that this is an extremely difficult problem, with which successive Governments have grappled without success. We hope to be more successful.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): The Secretary of State will know that, as resources are moved from the Countryside Agency to local authorities and regional development agencies, concerns remain in rural areas that the money intended for improvements to the countryside might be swallowed by other budgets and that, instead of the delivery of projects, there might be delay or even destruction in some circumstances. What assurance can she give the House that that is unlikely to happen?

Margaret Beckett: Of course I understand that anxiety, and I seem to recall that great concern was expressed when the regional development agencies were first set up. However, it will be within my hon. Friend's memory—as it is within that of most of us—that, during the recent outbreak of foot and mouth disease, the RDAs were very helpful and supportive. Many of those anxieties have therefore not been realised. I can assure him that we shall monitor the situation carefully to ensure that the right support goes to rural areas. That will also be part of the remit of the new, slimmed-down Countryside Agency, which I am sure will be robust in its observations.

Fallen Stock

2. Mr. David Rendel (Newbury) (LD): When she expects to introduce a national collection scheme to assist livestock farmers in disposing of fallen stock. [174400]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): It is expected that an industry-led scheme backed by Government funding will be introduced in the autumn of this year.

Mr. Rendel: Obviously, the scheme should have been introduced before the regulation was introduced last July. We were promised then that it would be introduced by the new year. Is it not deeply depressing that we still have no definite date for the scheme—merely "the autumn of this year"? Will the Minister guarantee that any farmer who does not have an abattoir within easy reach of his or her farm will not be prosecuted if they do their best to dispose safely of their fallen stock on their own farm premises?

Mr. Bradshaw: Farmers are expected to comply with the regulation, although local authorities, which are responsible for enforcement, have been told to implement it with a light touch before the scheme is up and running. I share the hon. Gentleman's regrets about the length of time that it has taken, but this is quite a complex matter. It involves trying to get agreement across all the livestock and other sectors involved. We have now achieved that. It is an industry-run scheme, it has buy-in from the industry and those who run it are confident that it will be launched this autumn.

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): Does the Minister recognise that any future ban on hunting with hounds would reduce the options available to farmers? Will he acknowledge that in 2003, 143 hunt kennels processed 500,000 carcases, free to local farmers? There will be further problems if that is not recognised and if there is a ban. Will he also tell the House whether the EU—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Bradshaw: If the hon. Lady checks, she will find that the vast majority of hunt kennels charge for the service—they do not provide a free service. We acknowledge that hunt kennels play a role, but it is small in terms of the amount of stock they collect and dispose of, and it is sensible for them to develop this service as an alternative source of income. Those on the board who administer the scheme, and representatives of the collection and disposal industry, assure me that a hunting ban would have absolutely no effect on their ability to dispose of fallen stock. There is plenty of capacity available within the industry.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): The Minister says glibly that any ban on hunting would have no effect whatever on the fallen stock company that was set up this week. Why, then, did he announce that 146 of the registered collection centres will be hunt kennels, and that about 80 per cent. of the countryside of England will not be serviced by anybody apart from hunt kennels? Will he not pay some tribute to the valuable service that they have given to the countryside over many years? Will he acknowledge that whether or not hunts charge for collection—most of them do not—they collected 600,000 carcases last year, at a cost of £3.5 million? What would he do if hunting were to be banned?

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Gentleman was not listening to my answer. I quoted the chairman of the board of the National Fallen Stock Company, who assured me that a ban on hunting would have no impact whatever on the industry's capacity to dispose of fallen stock.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): Will the Minister reassure the House that farmers in remoter rural areas will not be disadvantaged by excessive charges for the collection of their fallen stock compared with those in areas closer to collection centres? Given the Government's evidently mañana attitude to a regulation that should have been acted on more than a year ago, do they believe that it is an effective and worthwhile scheme that is making a significant impact on the biosecurity of livestock farms?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that we gold-plate all EU regulations, although perhaps that is the new Liberal Democrat approach to these matters. I take on board his concern about livestock farmers in remoter rural areas. I am aware, for example, of the concerns of the sheep industry in the remoter parts of Wales, although the National Sheep Association supports this scheme. One of the advantages of the new scheme is that it is a pay-as-you-go scheme, so it is likely to drive down prices. We already know that at least one collector in Wales has said that he will reduce his prices once the scheme is up and running.

Single Farm Payments

3. Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): What discussions she has had on her proposals for single farm payments in respect of farmers in severely disadvantaged areas. [174401]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): I have had discussions with, and received representations from, a wide range of interests on this subject. As a result, I made a parliamentary written statement to the House on 22 April.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: As the Secretary of State knows, part of my Macclesfield constituency lies within the Peak District national park. Will she take seriously the views of my farmers, who are deeply concerned about the proposed single farm payments? Up to 200,000 cows are estimated to be on the 5,000 farms in severely disadvantaged areas, and the National Farmers Union believes that those farms will no longer be profitable and will go out of business in respect of livestock farming. Would not that be a disaster for farming, the upland environment and our rural economy?

Margaret Beckett: Of course I am aware of the concerns that exist. It is because of them that the Government have agreed to phase in the move to area payment over some eight years. That gives farmers in every part of the United Kingdom plenty of opportunity to assess the position of their own businesses and make their own business decisions. Other payments are available, such as the hill farm allowance, which is paid under the rural development regulation. It will continue until the present period ends in 2006.

We believe that all farming interests will benefit from decoupling. We have sought to deal with the concerns, but the hon. Gentleman, who is also a staunch advocate of his manufacturing constituents' interests, will know that many businesses would like the degree of certainty that we seek to offer agriculture.

Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby) (Lab): Many of my constituents in areas such as the North York moors will be affected by the proposals. Will my right hon. Friend consider holding a seminar for all Members representing such severely disadvantaged areas, so that we can talk to officials and perhaps, if necessary, bring along some of our staff? I am sure that we shall need to give a great deal of information to constituents facing the new arrangements. It would be helpful if that information were as good, as up to date and as factual as possible, so that we could cut through some of the confusion that currently exists.

Margaret Beckett: That is a wise suggestion, which echoes one made a while ago by the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack), who chairs the Select Committee. We certainly have it in mind to offer special briefing to all interested colleagues, not least those representing moorland areas. We are well aware that although the moorland line has been fairly well established for a long time, when it was established there was no process of appeal, as there was in the case of the boundaries for special areas.

We are considering all the issues. Officials are currently tied up with detail, but I hope and expect that we shall be able to offer the support that my hon. Friend seeks in the not-too-distant future.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): The Secretary of State is familiar with my constituency in the Peak district. Although the change she has had to make since her original announcement has been welcomed, many farmers are asking why they are being treated differently from those farming perhaps only half a mile away but outside the area. Would it not be better to have only one distinction, between moorland and non-moorland farms?

Margaret Beckett: We thought about that carefully. One of the factors that led us to refine our decision—not reverse it, as the hon. Gentleman suggested, although he may not really have meant that—was the scale and unanimity of representations from a wide range of farming organisations. We believe that this is an improvement, because it mitigates the effects of the redistribution that would otherwise have occurred.

We looked carefully at the possibility of using the distinction suggested by the hon. Gentleman, but when people were forced to choose the balance was in favour of the proposals I announced a week or so ago.

Hunting

4. Mrs. Helen Clark (Peterborough) (Lab): What progress has been made towards a ban on hunting with dogs. [174402]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): A clear commitment has been given to the House that the issue of hunting with dogs will be dealt with during the life of this Parliament.

Mrs. Clark: The Minister is of course aware that three quarters of the British public think hunting with dogs should be banned. Over the past seven years, the House has repeatedly shown the same determination. Will the Government introduce a Bill to ban hunting with dogs in time for it to become law during this Session? I will accept a one-word answer—yes or no.

Alun Michael: My hon. Friend knows that I am not going to give her a one-word answer. She also knows from the reaction of Opposition Members that there is a knee-jerk reaction in some quarters when the issue of hunting is mentioned. I have made it clear that a commitment has been given to the House by the Prime Minister, the Leader of the House and me that the issue will be dealt with during the life of this Parliament.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): What possible case is there for criminalising a large section of the most law-abiding members of the rural community?

Alun Michael: In view of the hon. Gentleman's long experience in the House, I should have thought that he would know that the House of Commons—the Houses of Parliament—frequently passes new laws, as a result of which certain actions become illegal. It is not a question of criminalising people; those who offend against laws passed by Parliament are offenders. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman should put his question in a rather more neutral manner.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): I know that my right hon. Friend gave his answer in good faith, and I am sure that he intends to deliver on it, but does he accept that many people who are currently writing to many MPs believe that this House has overwhelmingly voted in favour of the banning of hunting on many occasions and that it is wrong for the other House to block that? They want to see that ban as soon as possible.

Alun Michael: I understand the strength of view that is shared by a large number of right hon. and hon. Members. I should say gently to my hon. Friend that much concern is often expressed before things happen, and then silence when the Government deliver on what they have promised, as they have on so many issues.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): Does the right hon. Gentleman understand that such a Bill would be widely regarded as an unwarranted attack on the civil liberties of minorities, and would tend to bring parliamentary government into widespread disrepute?

Alun Michael: The right hon. and learned Gentleman voices an opinion that is shared by a narrow group of people. It is only fair to say that opinion on this issue is divided passionately among rural people, just as it is divided among urban dwellers. It is one of those issues on which there is a deep divide between those who hold strong and opposing views. I have tried to encourage people on both sides of that divide to listen to those on the other side, and I would encourage the right hon. and learned Gentleman to take that approach.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Does the Minister recall that in the course of the past two or three weeks the Tories have laid claim to the notion that when we have introduced some decent legislation, they thought of it first? This is something that they have not thought of first. If the Minister wants to wipe that oily grin off the Tory party leader's face, this is the one thing that he should do—and do in this Session of Parliament.

Alun Michael: My hon. Friend makes his points in his usual, vigorous manner. I am not sure whether many of those claims to have thought of things first are justified, but I recall some of the things that the current leader of the Opposition thought of first when he was Home Secretary. I do not recall that he was very effective then in bearing down on crime and disorder in the way that this Government have been, but I hear what my hon. Friend says.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): In order to demonstrate that this is not a piece of malignant legislation left over from the old Labour class-war politics, will the Minister inform the House what the scientific basis is for introducing such a Bill? What scientific research has he seen that informs him that hunting with dogs has a greater adverse effect on the welfare of the fox than shooting, trapping, snaring or poisoning foxes, which will remain perfectly legal under his proposals?

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman always gives the impression that he has wandered in from some sort of parallel universe. I would urge him to do what both sides in the debate urged us to do: to start with the Burns report. That interesting, revealing report was produced with independence and great engagement from all sides. He should also carefully consider the hearings that took place in Portcullis House in September 2002. They were very interesting, because we looked at the facts and the science and gave everyone the opportunity to question those who gave evidence. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman stay in our universe for a few minutes, and do some reading and some homework.

Cormorant Predation

5. Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): What plans the Government have to allow fishery owners and angling clubs to protect inland waterways from the effects of cormorant predation. [174403]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): Following representations from my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter), I am actively considering extra measures that could help fishery owners and angling clubs to deal with the increasing problem of predation by cormorants.

Mr. Salter: I thank the Minister for his reply, which will be welcomed by the 3.5 million anglers in this country. He is well aware of the serious environmental damage being caused to many inland fisheries in Britain as a result of the massive increase in cormorant numbers in the past 10 years. He is also aware that many European countries are relaxing their rules and granting themselves derogation from the EU birds directive. Is it not about time that Britain followed suit?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am not sure that we would be prepared to go that far. If my hon. Friend studies the experience of France, which has granted such derogation and has killed many cormorants, he will see that the evidence of a beneficial effect is at best patchy. I accept the concern that he expresses on anglers' behalf that serious localised problems exist, particularly in some of our inland fisheries, and I will re-examine this issue to see whether more can be done.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): The Government have a declared policy of equal rights, yet the hon. Gentleman's Department is here defending and promoting the interests of those who like dragging fish around in the water and pulling them out by sharp hooks before putting them back, while at the same time wishing to ban hunting with dogs. What are the Government and his Department doing to stamp out hypocrisy on these issues, both inside and outside this House?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am not sure what that has to do with cormorants, but the right hon. Gentleman is right: any Government have to strike a balance between the rights of fish and the rights of cormorants, and we are indeed trying to strike that balance.

Mr. Tony Banks (West Ham) (Lab): Why has there been such a large increase in the cormorant population?

Mr. Bradshaw: As with many of these very interesting questions, there is no conclusive scientific evidence, but one reason might well be that because our streams and rivers are cleaner than they have been for generations—thanks to the environmental improvements undertaken by this Government—fish populations in inland waterways are much higher, and cormorants that used not to live inland have migrated there in recent years.

State Veterinary Service

6. Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): If she will make a statement on the future of the state veterinary service. [174404]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): The Government believe that the state veterinary service should become an Executive agency from 1 April 2005. A consultation exercise will be launched soon.

Mr. Williams: I thank the Minister for that reply. The announcement was made last October, and it seems that the Minister has already made his mind up, given that the advertisement for the post of chief executive of the next steps executive agency has already appeared. Surely the Minister should have consulted first. Has he consulted the British Veterinary Association, the National Farmers Union or—in particular, so far as I am concerned—the National Assembly for Wales?

Mr. Bradshaw: We have had discussions with those bodies. Indeed, the former president of the British Veterinary Association said on the wireless this morning—on the "Farming Today" programme—that in his view the separation of delivery and policy was a good idea. However, we have not made up our minds. This is a genuine consultation process, and if the results are overwhelmingly hostile we will think again. The advertisement had to be placed then in view of the need to stick to the deadline and of the time it will take to appoint somebody. No firm decisions have been taken, which is why full consultation will take place.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): Is the state veterinary service sufficiently organised to cope with the annual 20 per cent. increase in bovine tuberculosis predicted by the Government?

Mr. Bradshaw: Yes, it is, and the hon. Gentleman might be interested in the following figures. Currently, there are the equivalent of 1,445 full-time members of staff in the state veterinary service, compared with only 1,100 in 1995—a 31 per cent. increase since the Conservatives were in government. Moreover, the amount spent on the state veterinary service increased in the same period by 60 per cent.

Large Combustion Plant Directive

7. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): If she will make a statement on how she intends to implement the large combustion plant directive. [174408]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): We have yet to make a final decision on the mode of implementation of the revised large combustion plant directive. We will make an announcement as soon as possible.

Paddy Tipping: Will the Minister confirm and publish the Mott MacDonald study commissioned by his Department, and will he confirm that his noble and ministerial Friend Lord Whitty visited one of the midlands pits only a few days ago? In the light of both those events, is it not true that if a national plan approach were taken half the coal collieries in this country would close within the next five to six years?

Mr. Morley: It is true that if the national plan approach were implemented in its currently discussed format, it would have an impact on the coal sector. There are no two ways about that. Similarly, if the alternative approach on emission limits were put in place, that would also have an impact on manufacturing. It is a complicated issue, as my hon. Friend knows. We want to put as much information as possible in the public domain. Our objective is to meet desirable environmental standards, but to do so with the minimal impact on the relevant sectors. That is what we are currently trying to do.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): As the Minister rightly says, this is a complicated issue. He would accept that existing plants are in danger of breaking all the Government's emission targets. When will the Government make an announcement to confirm that existing plants will be included as part of the national plan, and what will be the costs to the industry of meeting the regulatory impact goals?

Mr. Morley: On the latter point, some figures have been made available on the costs of the regulatory impact, but we need to be aware that there are also health benefits to wider society from lower emissions. That reduces costs on the NHS, for example, so there are positives and negatives to the approach. I repeat that we want implementation to produce environmental gain with the minimum impact on the sectors concerned. That could mean some delay as we assess the various models and talk to the different sectors about implementation. I believe that it is better to have some delay in order to get it right and minimise the impact.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton) (Lab): I join my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) in appealing to the Minister to have regard to the impact of the national plan on the electricity generating industry and the coal industry. I accept that the aluminium industry, with its single unit, has to be taken into account. Will the Minister impress on the European Commission the need for some variation in the application of the plan, which is what the French are doing in their submission to the EEC by seeking to variate in order to protect their businesses and industries?

Mr. Morley: I can assure my hon. Friend that we examining the French proposals, but he will be aware that there are complexities surrounding legal interpretation. I repeat my general point. In respect of the Commission, there should be elements of flexibility in the regulations that are designed to bring about the desirable environmental outcomes. We want those outcomes to be achieved in a way that recognises the impacts on industry and does not have a disproportionate effect. We want the outcomes, but with the minimal effect in respect of the economic impact.

Sugar Beet

8. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): When she next expects to meet sugar beet growers to discuss reforms of the EU sugar beet regime. [174409]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): Ministers frequently meet the National Farmers Union and other farming organisations to discuss a range of topical subjects, including sugar reform.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for that reply, but is she aware of the vital importance of sugar beet to Norfolk's rural economy? In fact, Norfolk grows about half of the beet grown in this country. Has she had a chance to reflect on the recent remarks of the noble Lord Whitty given in evidence to the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs? He seemed to say that he favours full liberalisation, but is that the Secretary of State's view. Does she agree that, if the Government are to opt for full—or, indeed, any—liberalisation, it is vital to put in place a well thought out bioethanol programme? That alone can offer hope to Norfolk's beet growers.

Margaret Beckett: First, I do know about some of the remarks of my noble Friend. His point was that he did not believe that any of the options currently on the table—including the status quo—were fully viable. He was speculating about what might finally emerge from the balance of potential options. I take the hon. Gentleman's point about bioethanol and the possibilities for the future, but I was under the impression that the Conservative party was in favour of liberalisation. I believe that it was on 1 March that the Leader of the Opposition said:

"Rich countries should act in accordance with what they know to be true: free trade spreads prosperity, protectionism does not."

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the common agricultural policy damages the third world most of all through what it does to the sugar trade? Does that not make a powerful case for the eventual abolition of the CAP? Should not sugar policy be repatriated to member states so that they can choose what they do with their sugar producers? Should we not aim to create a world in which we do not damage third-world producers?

Margaret Beckett: I certainly agree that it is important to try to make sure that we do not damage third-world producers, and any proposals that are made ultimately will have to be judged in part against that criterion. However, I am afraid that I do not share my hon. Friend's view that there should not be a common policy on agriculture. The Opposition took us into the European Community and passed the Single European Act, and one requirement of a single market is that there is some sort of co-operative marketing structure.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): Does the Secretary of State accept that, unlike other European producers, the UK produces only half of what it consumes, with the rest being imported from third-world countries? Does she agree, therefore, that any reform should take account of that fact, and that the EU might do well to look at the British model—that is, opening up its market to third-world countries while at the same time preserving a domestic sugar industry? Does she also agree that, as part of reform, the Government must help sugar growers to find new markets, of which the bioethanol market is certainly one?

Margaret Beckett: Certainly, any implications of new proposals would have to be examined carefully. However, although sugar producers, refiners and so on can make a very strong case, the sugar regime has remained basically unchanged for something like 35 years while every other regime has been reformed around it. It seems to me that a regime that demands a price for sugar that is twice the world price is not sustainable in the long term.

Wind Turbines

9. Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): What discussions she has had with the Department of Trade and Industry on the environmental impact of wind turbines. [174410]

10. Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): What discussions she has had with the Department of Trade and Industry on the environmental impact of wind turbines. [174411]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): Lead responsibility for wind energy lies with the DTI, although the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs is also a regulator for offshore wind farms. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State regularly meets with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to discuss matters of mutual interest.

Mr. Forth: The Minister for Energy, E-Commerce and Postal Services at the DTI is a well-known wind enthusiast. Indeed, I think that he has said that 80 per cent. of renewable energy should come from wind. Will the Minister say where the thousands of wind turbines needed to achieve that target will be located? What account has he or his Department taken of the effect on birds, aircraft and local communities? Has he discussed that with the DTI? How on earth is the Minister's wind going to provide reliable energy?

Mr. Morley: We must put the matter into perspective. The objective is to get 10 per cent.—rising to 15 per cent.—of our energy from renewables, of which wind is but one part. We are encouraging and supporting other technologies, and it is likely that the sector will develop in due course. However, there is no getting away from the fact that wind is a cheap and reliable option in the renewables sector. It is important that we increase the amount of energy taken from renewable sources in this country, but the impact on the environment and landscape cannot be ignored.

The potential impact on birds is a serious issue that we take into account in our studies of offshore farms. In the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Goole (Mr. Cawsey), for example, very large applications for wind farms have been made. He and other hon. Members have represented very strongly the reasonable case put by local people about the potential impact. We take that case seriously, and take it into account.

Bob Spink: The hon. Gentleman is generally an excellent Minister, but he is a little unsound on this subject. He will be aware that a wind farm is mooted for the Thames estuary that would have serious implications for navigation and the environment. In addition, some people say that the noise of such a farm would adversely affect surrounding residential areas. Before any steps are taken in respect of the Thames estuary wind farm, will he ensure that the people of Castle Point—and of Canvey island, in particular—are fully consulted, so that their interests can be taken into account?

Mr. Morley: I want to make it clear that many of these matters are for the DTI, while others, such as navigation, are for the Department for Transport. A co-ordinated approach is therefore required, but I can assure the hon. Gentleman that this Department takes very seriously those aspects of the environmental impact of wind farms that are our responsibility. They tend to be offshore, as we have a role in offshore consents. I assure him that we insist on environmental impact assessments: for example, we support the research into offshore bird populations undertaken by the Joint Nature Conservation Committee. We also insist on long-term monitoring of those effects. All those issues can be taken into account. If we are serious about tackling climate change, we must increase the amount of renewable energy used, and wind is an important part of that.

Mr. Ian Cawsey (Brigg and Goole) (Lab): When my hon. Friend considers the environmental impact of wind turbines, will he include the gold-digging syndrome that is seen when one company comes into an area and does a study to see if it is suitable, and then many other companies come in on the back of that study? In no time, an area is bogged down with application after application for wind turbines. My hon. Friend will know, from his knowledge of my area, that in North Axholme and Goole Fields many companies are now considering applications. The people of Crowle are not anti-renewable energy and they can see that wind might have a role to play, but they are sick and tired of the scale of what is proposed. It is too much for one small part of the country.

Mr. Morley: I understand the point that my hon. Friend makes, and he arranged a meeting with the local action groups in his constituency, which I attended to listen to their views. I have great sympathy with many of the points that were made. People oppose wind farms for many reasons, not always because of their environmental impact. People have valid concerns and we take those into account in our environmental assessments. I know that the scale of the applications is taken into account by the DTI in its scoping studies, and I will certainly speak to my colleagues in that Department about my hon. Friend's concerns.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): Has my hon. Friend the Minister seen the press reports this week about the first school in the UK to construct a wind turbine on its roof? Is not it the case that the new generation of compact wind turbines will enable every school, factory, hospital and even private house in the UK to generate its own electricity? When my hon. Friend next discusses the issues with his colleagues in the DTI, will he also involve my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills in discussing the potential for more schools to generate their own electricity through wind turbines?

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. We have been discussing issues such as sustainability with the Green Ministers group and I know that the DFES is very interested. The House should also recognise that this country is developing industries that are leaders in new energy technologies. The roof-based wind turbines are produced by a British company based in Scotland, and the export market for their products has enormous potential. The new technology will provide environmental benefits, as well as gains for our wider economy.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): Has the Minister noticed that those who are keen to rubbish wind power are often the same people who advocate a new generation of nuclear power stations? Has he discussed with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry the full lifecycle costs of wind power as against nuclear power, given the £48 billion decommissioning costs—£8,000 per person in this country—of the latter? Does the Minister agree with the Secretary of State that it would therefore be wrong to set out on a new generation of nuclear power?

Mr. Morley: There are no proposals in the energy White Paper for new nuclear power stations. The hon. Gentleman makes the point about the choices that have to be made about energy generation. Renewables must be part of that balance, and we must increase the proportion they provide. People have various motivations for opposing applications for wind farms, including some members of the hon. Gentleman's party in their constituencies. I hope that he will speak to them about that.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): The Minister and the DTI are swamping the country with wind farms in pursuit of his failing policy on climate change. Is he aware that CO_2 emissions went up last year? Instead of putting all his eggs into the wind farm basket, he should focus on wave and tidal power, solar energy, photovoltaics, biomass and hydrogen, and introduce a proper diversified renewables policy that might actually see CO_2 emissions going down, instead of up.

Mr. Morley: What blatant opportunism! It comes from the party that tabled a Prayer to try to block emissions trading in the European Union and that made no progress in addressing climate change when it had the opportunity to do so. The energy White Paper is universally recognised as a world leader in global strategies for dealing with climate change. It addresses all the issues, including tidal energy, solar power and gas. That is all part of the research and development that we have put in, but which the previous Conservative Government cut.

Milk Prices

11. Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): If she will make a statement on milk prices. [174412]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): The most recent available figure shows that the average UK farm-gate price for milk delivered in March was 18.51p per litre, which is 1.14p per litre higher than last year. That is the highest figure for milk delivered in March since 1999.

Mr. Turner: I thank the Minister for his reply. Farmers in my constituency strive to get 10p a pint for milk, but the housewife in the supermarket has to pay 37p. How successful have the Government been in dealing with rip-off supermarkets and their oligopoly?

Alun Michael: We welcome the Office of Fair Trading decision to undertake a compliance audit of the supermarket code of practice to establish evidence for any further action. Furthermore, the work that has been done demonstrates that changes in farm-gate prices and supermarket prices are reflected one on the other. There was thought to be dissonance between the two, but that does not appear to be the case.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): I am sure that my right hon. Friend is aware that some milk processors are going out of business at present. The supermarkets' cartel is putting on pressure, so farmers struggle to find someone to buy their milk and are then forced into selling it at a reduced price against the premium that they always had in the past. That is a worry and we need to look into it. The matter is urgent for dairy farmers, especially as they have nowhere else to turn if they produce milk alone.

Alun Michael: I understand my hon. Friend's concern, but we are trying to move to a situation where farmers produce what the market requires. In my initial reply, I referred to the work of the OFT, which is considering whether anything needs to be done to ensure that there is a level playing field. I encourage my hon. Friend to look at the available information, especially from the KPMG study on prices and profitability in the British dairy chain, which contains a number of lessons for us to learn in looking at the future of the dairy industry.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Is it not still the case that the entire dairy chain is distorted from beginning to end, so that primary producers and processors are constantly squeezed to the point that there are unsustainable milk prices, which mean that many of them are going out of business? Do we not need if not a stronger code of conduct, one that is properly implemented and properly enforced so that supermarkets do not simply make profits while our dairy industry is being exported?

Alun Michael: I encourage the hon. Gentleman, too, to look at the detailed information about the industry. We have gone to some trouble to ensure that it is available—for example, on fluctuations, a 1p increase in the farm-gate price resulted in an increase of only 0.6p in the retail price of liquid milk, whereas a 1p decrease in farm-gate prices reduced the retail price by 0.7p. Clearly, there are fluctuations in the market and there are pressures, and supermarkets do things in order to try to keep their prices down. That is why the examination by the OFT, which is based on facts, not fears—although the fears are understandable—is the right way to approach the issue.

Hunting With Dogs

12. Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): When she will be in a position to bring forward legislation to ban hunting with dogs. [174413]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I can only repeat the assurances, which the Government have given consistently and repeatedly, that the issue will be dealt with in the present Parliament.

It must be remembered that the Government did bring forward legislation during the last Session, which was amended in the House of Commons, and that the House of Lords failed to complete its consideration of the Bill.

Mr. Blizzard: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer.

There have been inquiries and endless debates on whether hunting is an essential tool of countryside management, but is not the key to be found on the placards that huntsmen hold up when they go on their demonstrations? The placards say, "Leave country sports alone". Hunting is a sport. It is a cruel sport. It is an unnecessary sport. It is a sport that the people of this country want banned. It is a sport that the House wants banned. May we have a Bill as soon as possible so that we can do just that?

Alun Michael: My hon. Friend is right to point to the revealing nature of the messages on some of the placards. I do not think that such messages did any favour to those who tried to make a case for hunting having a role in, for instance, the control of vermin and so on. I would only point him to the conclusions that I reached and brought before the House as a result of exhaustive inquiries and listening to all sides of the debate. The evidence deserves better attention than the sort of placard to which he refers.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): The Minister again referred to the evidence during his answer to the hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard), and the Minister often professes a great attachment to scientific objectivity and curiosity in matters that relate to hunting with dogs, although his body language and rhetoric sometimes suggest something rather different. I suspect that that criticism could be made of me, of course. The peer group review will be completed soon into the middle way group study into the welfare effects of shooting foxes. May I ask the Minister to pay very careful attention to that peer group review, whatever it says? It may or may not support our study, but may I ask him for an assurance that he will at least look at the peer group review before introducing any further legislation in the House?

Alun Michael: As for body language, the hon. Gentleman is sometimes referred to as enthusiastic and perhaps as over-excited. I think that he will acknowledge that I have always looked at any evidence that he, the middle way group or, indeed, other organisations have produced, and I have tried to do so objectively and to listen with care where they have evidence that should be treated as a serious contribution to the debate. So, of course I will look at anything that he and his group produce.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Would it shock and surprise my right hon. Friend if I were to tell him that I no longer believe that this Government will ban hunting with dogs? May I remind him—this is why he is being pressed by Labour colleagues—that the Parliament Acts can be used only if a Bill is brought back in this Session? If a Bill is not brought back in this Session, we will not ban hunting with dogs. So why does he not forget about being so delphic and just give us a straight answer to a straight question?

Alun Michael: Nothing that my hon. Friend contributes in the Chamber could shock or dismay me. I assure him that he lost all capacity to have that sort of impact a long time ago. I have given a straight answer to a straight question: the matter will be dealt with in this Parliament. If he wishes to extrapolate from that into the mechanics, I can assure him that I have looked at the implications of the procedures as well, and with great care.

Statutory Management Requirements

14. Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): What representations she has received in respect of the inspection regime to oversee statutory management requirements. [174415]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): Officials continue to work closely with stakeholders and enforcement bodies to evaluate the current inspection regimes. Stakeholders have been engaged throughout by involvement in bilateral meetings, workshops and the current public consultation on cross-compliance.

Mr. Plaskitt: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer, but will she confirm whether the new regime, when it is introduced, will be made fully consistent with all the other inspection regimes that are already in place? Will there be full data sharing between them?

Margaret Beckett: My hon. Friend makes a very important point. That is exactly the kind of issue that we are discussing with stakeholders. We are conscious of the fact that, as he will appreciate, the statutory regimes are already the subject of current inspection, but we are anxious to simplify and streamline inspection processes as much as is practicable. We are certainly very mindful of the point that he makes about the need in the future for greater data sharing and greater efficiency. That is something that we are considering in general, with a view to all our regulation, but in particular, of course, in this new field.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): What mechanisms exist in the Secretary of State's Department to ensure that that regime, or any other inspection regime or regulatory burden, does not weigh down harder on British business than similar regulatory regimes do in other EU member states?

Margaret Beckett: Quite simply, there are Commission requirements, and they are binding on every member state and apply in particular to that section of the cross-compliance regime. We believe that the changes that we are making will make ours a more efficient and effective regime than perhaps those in some of the other member states.

Waste Disposal

15. Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): If she will make a statement on her policy on fly-tipping and waste disposal. [174416]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): The Government are determined to tackle fly-tipping. We issued a wide-ranging strategy for consultation in February. The consultation period closed on 14 May and responses are currently being collated. The Government's policy on waste disposal is set out in "Waste Strategy 2000". A number of actions are also being taken forward as a result of recommendations in the 2002 strategy unit report, "Waste Not, Want not".

Andrew Selous: Does the Minister recognise that there is a fundamental contradiction between his waste disposal policy and his anti-fly-tipping policy? In particular, should not small building or garden maintenance firms be allowed to take their waste to tidy tips? If we cannot differentiate between an ICI and a small business, we have got the policy wrong. In addition, will not limiting householders to a permit for one item per month significantly increase fly-tipping throughout the country?

Mr. Morley: I think that the hon. Gentleman's point relates to a decision by his local authority in respect of its disposal sites. It is entirely up to local authorities to decide what to do in respect of their own sites and how to apply such decisions. If local authorities feel that there is an issue of trade waste, it is not unreasonable to have a charge in that respect. The matters of strategy that the hon. Gentleman raises are for local councils to decide.

Sue Doughty (Guildford) (LD): The ban on co-disposal of hazardous waste in landfill sites becomes operational this year. The industry says that few facilities will be available to deal with that waste. What will the Government do to prevent fly-tipping resulting from their inability to implement effective solutions in response to legislation that was in place in 1999?

Mr. Morley: Let me update the hon. Lady. There are about 30 applications for separate cells for the disposal of hazardous waste, and that number does not include in-house sites. We take fly-tipping seriously, which is why we have given local authorities new powers, for example, to stop, search and confiscate vehicles. We are also considering the way in which the legislation works and how to disseminate information. We are prepared to bring in further measures and to examine the level of fines, if there is a case for doing so. We are not complacent—we are dealing with these issues on a wide front, in relation to our overall waste strategies.

Animal Welfare

16. Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): If she will make a statement on the animal welfare rules governing (a) domestic and (b) imported pig rearing. [174418]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): The vast majority of imports of pork and pork products into the UK are from other member states. All member states have to implement and comply with minimum welfare standards for pigs, as agreed by the European Union.

Mr. Bacon: The British Pig Executive estimates that 70 per cent. of the 767,000 tonnes of pigmeat imported into this country is produced to standards that would be unlawful in the UK. Given that 92 per cent. of consumers want imported meat to be produced to animal welfare standards equivalent to those in the UK, is it not time at least to have clear and unambiguous country of origin labelling, so that consumers can make an informed choice? To that end, will the Minister give his full support to the magnificent Bill of which I am the promoter, which is to receive its Second Reading on 16 July, and which would give effect to clear food labelling?

Mr. Bradshaw: We are looking at the subject of labelling. I always urge all British consumers to buy British pork. One of the reasons for the figures that the hon. Gentleman quotes is the unilateral ban on sow stalls and tethering that was passed by the Conservative Government—a move that we supported and implemented in 1999. It was the Labour Government who, in 2001, managed to extend the ban to the rest of the European Union, thus ensuring a level playing field for our pig producers.

Waste Incinerators

17. Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): How many waste incinerators have been built in (a) London and (b) Kent since 1997; and how many others have been approved in (i) London and (ii) Kent since 1997. [174419]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): No waste incinerators have been built in London or Kent since 1997. At Allington, near Maidstone in Kent, an operating permit was granted in September 2003, and planning permission has been obtained for an incinerator. An application for a proposed incinerator at Bexley, south London, was granted a permit in September 2003.

Bob Russell: I wonder whether the Minister will therefore kindly instruct local authorities in Kent and London to stop dumping their rubbish in Essex. If they want to incinerate their waste, why do those local authorities not build the incinerators in their area, instead of transporting the waste 60 miles into Essex?

Mr. Morley: That might well be something that authorities consider. There is a strong case for local authorities coming together to provide a strategic approach to waste disposal, which can require consideration of a range of options of which incineration is but one.

Vital Villages Grant Scheme

18. Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): If she will make a statement on the termination of the Countryside Agency's vital villages grant scheme. [174420]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): Vital villages was established in 2001 as a three-year programme, so it should come as no surprise that the Countryside Agency has announced that the scheme is closed to new applicants. All existing grant commitments will be met, and some £14.2 million will be spent in 2004–05 supporting action by and in rural communities.

Norman Lamb: I thank the Minister for his response. The vital villages scheme has provided funding for some valuable schemes in north Norfolk, including the revitalisation of village shops. Many people who have applied for grants are frustrated by the plethora of different routes that they have to take to get money, which often means that it is the most informed communities—the ones that know how to play the system—that get hold of the money. Is there not a case for rationalisation—making sure that money is available and goes to the communities that need it most?

Alun Michael: I thank the hon. Gentleman for making an excellent point. He is absolutely right to be concerned about the plethora of funding streams, which is why my right hon. Friend established the inquiry that was undertaken by Lord Haskins and why some of the emphasis of her forthcoming statement on the refreshed rural strategy is about simplification of funding streams. Since DEFRA was set up, we have been keen to get better evidence about where disadvantage lies in rural communities rather than, as he suggested, merely allowing those who are best informed get to the source of finance first—I nearly said get to the trough first, but that was the previous question. The publication of work by the Rural Research Centre in January will be the start of our having the quality of information to help rural communities that we have been able to take for granted in urban regeneration for many years. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman clearly welcomes that.

Business of the House

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House give us the business for next week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): Mr. Speaker, you are responsible for security within the House, but I thought that it would be helpful to update Members on my discussions with the Security Service this morning in advance of announcing the business. It is advising on what action needs to be taken following the incident yesterday. This will be considered by the joint committee on security on Monday and the House of Commons Commission on Tuesday. As the House will be aware, there has been a wider Security Service review, which will report in the summer. It is my intention that, once the final report is considered, the executive summary will be published and will be followed by a debate on the Floor of the House.

I want to reassure the House that we need to strike a proper balance between proper security and the right of public access to Parliament and its Members. Voters should, and will, continue to have the right to come to Parliament, but in conditions that are secure for them and for Members and their staff.

The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 24 MAY—Remaining stages of the Civil Contingencies Bill

TUESDAY 25 MAY—Remaining stages of the Gender Recognition Bill [Lords].

WEDNESDAY 26 MAY—Opposition Day [12th Allotted Day]. There will be a debate entitled "Financial Burdens on Local Authorities by Central Government", followed by a debate entitled "Town Planning and Urban Sprawl". Both debates arise on an Opposition motion.

THURSDAY 27 MAY—Motion on the Whitsun recess Adjournment.

FRIDAY 28 MAY—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the week after the Whitsun recess will be:

MONDAY 7 JUNE—Second Reading of the Patents Bill [Lords] followed by a motion to amend the Standing Orders in relation to the nomination of Select Committees.

TUESDAY 8 JUNE—Remaining stages of the Age-Related Payments Bill, followed by a debate on the future of air transport White Paper on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

WEDNESDAY 9 JUNE—A debate on veterans' affairs on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

THURSDAY 10 JUNE—A debate on disability on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 11 JUNE—The House will not be sitting.

I should also like to inform the House that the business in Westminster Hall for June will be:

THURSDAY 17 JUNE—Debate on the report from the Work and Pensions Committee on the European social fund.

THURSDAY 24 JUNE—Debate on the report from the Science and Technology Committee on Government investment in nanotechnology.

Mr. Heald: I thank the Leader of the House for the business, particularly the debate on the air transport White Paper, for which we have been calling.

There is widespread concern about the incident yesterday during Prime Minister's questions. Does the Leader of the House accept that he has my support for sensible measures to improve security, while always remembering that the public must have access to their Parliament? There are clearly lessons to be learned, which the Commission will consider next week.

Turning to another policing issue, about a week ago it looked as though the long-standing demonstration on Parliament square that involves so much police time might be over. Yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) opened a debate in Westminster Hall on the Sessional Orders. What progress can the Leader of the House report concerning the Sessional Orders?

The right hon. Gentleman will know how anxious we are to have the debate foreshadowed by the Foreign Secretary about Iraq. This morning the Leader of the House criticised the Leader of the Opposition as "opportunistic" for telling the Prime Minister to stand up to President Bush when he disagrees with him, and not just to tag along. What would he say about these remarks:

"A future in which the UK tags along behind a unilateralist United States would reap a bitter harvest"?

Those were his words last October, reported in The Sun under the heading, "The Hate of Hain". So who is the opportunist now?

Then there is the Deputy Prime Minister, who was telling us this week that "Tony" was consistently trying "to channel America" towards UN action, but that "we might lose . . . influence if we start having a go at the Americans".

Is it not time that the Prime Minister took a lesson from Baroness Thatcher when she was Prime Minister and was a frank and straightforward friend of the United States of America?

Turning to our Olympic bid, it seems that it depends on the completion of the London Crossrail project. The Leader of the House will have heard the concern expressed by business leaders about the Government's failure to implement it. Can he confirm that as soon as the period of election purdah is over, there will be a statement about its future?

Finally, now that the Chancellor has been forced to concede the failures of the new deal, will the Leader of the House arrange an oral statement so that the Chancellor can apologise for wasting billions of pounds providing help to those who would have found a job anyway and doing precious little for those with real problems finding a job, such as the over-50s, those on incapacity benefit through stress or disability and the lone parents with children at secondary school—all of them let down by Labour?

Mr. Hain: The local election campaigns really do seem to have started, do they not, Mr. Speaker?

[Mr. Hain]

On the hon. Gentleman's last point, I find it extraordinary that when 210 people in his constituency have had the opportunity of getting a job with extra training and skills, he wants to send them back to the dole queue, where they were under the Conservatives. Nearly 1 million people have had the chance for skills training, extra opportunities and jobs under the new deal, including very many disabled people in my constituency. The hon. Gentleman should be supporting them, not seeking to consign them to the scrap heap, as they were under the Conservatives.

I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's support for what he calls sensible measures to improve security in the House and I agree that lessons—some hard lessons—need to be learned about what happened yesterday. There will be, as I described, recommendations coming from the Security Service, which we will be able to consider early next week. It is extremely important that the old-fashioned culture of security in the House is modernised and that we update our procedures and protect the House against terrorist attacks or any other security breaches.

As regards Parliament square, the Home Office will undertake a consultation exercise on developing police powers and ensuring that the police are empowered to act effectively and proportionately, including using their existing powers. The paper will be issued shortly and there will be a three-month consultation period. I am well aware of the Adjournment debate yesterday in the name of the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), the Chairman of the Standards and Privileges Committee. I am also aware of the long delay on the matter, which I greatly regret, but the debate yesterday may have accelerated the outcome, to the general benefit of the House.

On Iraq, which the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire (Mr. Heald) raised in a contentious fashion, it is extraordinary that Conservative Members should seek to split our soldiers and American soldiers by separating those armed forces' leaders in Washington and London when the situation is at its most dangerous in the field. I wonder whether the shadow Defence Secretary agrees that we should distance ourselves, when our soldiers and American soldiers are battling together side by side against terrorists and jointly working to hand over power to Iraqis at the end of June.

On the Olympics and transport, the relevant Ministers and authorities are addressing the issues. I should have thought that the hon. Member for North-East Hertfordshire would welcome London's being on the shortlist and pay tribute to the Government's drive in securing that position.

Mr. Heald: You had to bring Seb in.

Mr. Hain: The Government were prepared to put in extra resources to win the Olympics for London, and the hon. Gentleman should back that.

Sir Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough) (Lab): The House is grateful for the confirmation by the Leader of the House that the Speaker has sole responsibility for security in the House. Can the Leader of the House confirm that the House supported the Speaker's decision to raise the screen? Can he also confirm that after the review to which he referred and the meetings of the joint committee on security on Monday and of the House of Commons Commission on Tuesday, any recommendations that the Speaker makes to the House should be fully supported, rather than receiving a majority of seven, which we saw in the last vote?

Mr. Hain: I agree with everything that my hon. Friend said. You, Mr. Speaker, are indeed responsible for security in the House. Everybody in the House of Commons Commission, including my hon. Friend, the shadow Leader of the House and me, backed your decision to the hilt. Our position was united, and we intend to maintain it. Following recommendations from the security services, we will move forward together to ensure that the House is properly protected, while always ensuring that we do not shut ourselves off to influence and pressure from members of the public who are properly here to lobby us.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): May I assure the Leader of the House that my hon. Friends and I support his new approach on the security of the House? May I ask him to re-examine the debate on the security screen on 22 April, to which other hon. Members have already referred, and particularly column 478 of Hansard? He will recall that in that debate several senior hon. Members and I expressed the precise concerns that have now become so important. For example, I said that it was important to make certain that the new screen did not divert attention from the wider interest of the security of the whole House, and that we should review the positioning of the screen in the light of the assessment to which he referred.

Will the Leader of the House now accept that the perimeter of Parliament is the critical issue? Although nearly 13,000 security passes have been issued, hundreds of them have gone astray. What steps are being taken urgently to review that point? I have asked him that question on two previous occasions, but I have not received an answer on either the number of passes that have gone astray or the steps that might be taken.

We all accept that it is difficult for the Leader of the House or anyone else to give details on a public occasion such as this, but will he assure us that this summer's executive report will be by the professionals, who should be given an opportunity comprehensively to examine the whole House, including all the buildings and all the people who come here, rather than just this Chamber? Although every democrat wants to resist this building becoming a fortress—we must maintain a balance—it is important to ensure that, rather than simply putting this Chamber in a glass box, we are making Parliament a safe place for all our constituents to meet us and hear what is undertaken on their behalf.

The issue is extremely important and I understand the point that the Leader of the House made about getting the right professional advice, which is difficult to bring to the Floor of the House, but he must accept that the issue concerns not only security, but this House's important role as the cockpit of the nation's debates.

Mr. Hain: If that was support for my proposals, I would like to know what opposition is. As the shadow

Leader of the House indicated, it is important that we move together on a united basis with the Serjeant at Arms and the Speaker in order to maintain security.

If hon. Members—possibly even the hon. Gentleman himself—wish to consult Hansard to look at what was actually said in that debate on 22 April, they will realise that there is a certain amount of humble pie to be eaten by those who voted against the erection of the security screen. If it was possible for a guest sponsored by a Member of the House of Lords to do what was done yesterday, imagine what might have happened if someone had come in, apparently innocently, with anthrax or ricin and lobbed it into the Chamber at the Prime Minister. What is important now is that we should examine the access arrangements for sponsored visitors to ensure that the whole Palace is properly secure. That is being done.

I very much agree with the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) that it is a question of protecting not only Members in the Chamber, but our constituents who visit this place and the staff of the House of Commons. We must consider the security arrangements for the whole of the Palace. That is precisely why, a few months ago, the House of Commons Commission, under the leadership of the Speaker and with the support of the shadow Leader of the House and other members of the Commission, embarked on the wider security review. There will be an interim report from that security review next month. The final report will be published later in the summer and thereafter proper consideration can be given to it.

I agree with the hon. Member for North Cornwall that there is no intention to make this place into a fortress and lock ourselves away from our constituents, who are entitled to come here to press us and to make their representations. That will of course continue, but in conditions of greater safety for them as well as us.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield) (Lab): Will the Leader of the House give time in the coming weeks to a debate on press intrusion into ordinary people's lives? I raise that issue because in the past couple of weeks much public and press attention has been given to the case in my constituency of a 14-year-old girl who was pregnant and subsequently had an abortion. Money has changed hands and photographs and the names and addresses of all the children involved have been made public. That is despicable and should not be allowed in British society today.

Mr. Hain: I share my hon. Friend's concern about the most unfortunate circumstances surrounding that story. It is very important that everybody learns serious lessons from it.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Just why have we still not had the debate on Zimbabwe that has been promised by the Leader of the House and by Foreign Office Ministers? Given that the business for the week after the recess is incredibly light because of the local elections, surely the Leader of the House is running out of excuses.

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman and I share a common position on what is happening in Zimbabwe. Interestingly, I was notified earlier about an Opposition application for a debate on Zimbabwe that was withdrawn at very short notice.

Anne Picking (East Lothian) (Lab): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to this week's edition of "All-Party and Associate Parliamentary Group Notices", which said that postal services from this House are to be changed from special delivery to first class? That once again disadvantages MPs who have only constituency-based staff members. London-based MPs will not be affected by that, but those who are as far-flung as I am will be. Will the Leader of the House please look at that urgently?

Mr. Hain: That is primarily a matter for the Administration Committee, but my hon. Friend raises a serious point. I am frankly surprised and concerned to hear what she says, and I hope that the necessary authorities will take action to remedy the problem.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): While I appreciate that in March we had a general debate about the Post Office service, can the Leader of the House tell me whether it will be possible in the next few weeks to have a specific debate on village post offices and their importance to the community? I mention that because the village post office of Pyrford in my constituency is threatened with closure, as are many others. Village post offices provide a vital service. Is not that issue of sufficient importance across the country to have a debate on it in Government time?

Mr. Hain: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's point about the effect on his constituency. As he knows, £400 million has gone into supporting local post offices. He has the opportunity to apply for a debate but, given the number of questions that have been asked on the matter at business questions in recent months, I shall consider his request.

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton) (Lab): Will the Leader of the House take the opportunity to read a letter, a copy of which I have, to the leader of the Liberal Democrats? It is written by Mr. Sean Doherty, Liberal Democrat membership No. 8056293, an erstwhile candidate in the local elections in Liverpool. He wrote to the right hon. Gentleman to complain about what he described as the "disgusting and unbelievable practices" of the Liberal Democrats in Liverpool. He implies racism among Liberal Democrat councillors. Will my right hon. Friend consider finding time to give the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) a chance to come here to confirm or deny the veracity of the charges of his former candidate? That might also give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity to clean up the act of his councillors in Liverpool.

Mr. Hain: I am concerned to hear my hon. Friend's remarks and I am sure that the people of Liverpool will be even more concerned.

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay) (LD): Will there be an opportunity to debate an issue that has affected my constituency and will affect many others? It is the removal of manufacturing jobs from this country to China. My constituency lost 600 jobs yesterday in Bookham Technologies on top of the 4,300 non-seasonal manufacturing jobs that we have lost in the past three years. That is a serious matter, which has hit the south Devon economy especially hard. However, there is a wider issue about the movement of assembly jobs to the far east.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right that we are affected by global economic pressures and he is right to identify the vulnerability of assembly-level manufacturing jobs. Last month, during the Easter recess, I was in China as Secretary of State for Wales. I discovered that engineering wages there are 60p an hour, but that is only one side of the picture that threatens our competitiveness. The other is that last year China produced 2.1 million new graduates—two thirds of them in science, IT and engineering. I am advised that this year it will produce 2.8 million new graduates. There is therefore a massive increase in China's capability at graduate level. We beat that competition not by seeking to defend ourselves against all global pressures—that is impossible—but by being the best, investing in skills, infrastructure, science and communications so that jobs in Devon and elsewhere can be safeguarded and improved. However, one does not achieve that by cutting spending on education, science and skills but by investing more and more. The Government are doing that.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): I hear what my right hon. Friend said about security, but does he accept that many of us were surprised that the Chamber was evacuated yesterday when the event occurred? All the advice that we received from the Select Committee on Science and Technology about substances such as anthrax and ricin was that hon. Members should either have stayed in the Chamber or been contained in immediate outside areas, such as the Lobbies. I should be grateful if my right hon. Friend would give urgent attention to providing hon. Members with instructions about what to do if yesterday's events are repeated.

Mr. Hain: That is, of course, a matter for you, Mr. Speaker, and for the Serjeant. We can all learn some hard lessons from what happened yesterday and it is important that we do that. That is exactly why I announced that the House of Commons Commission and the joint committee on security would meet to receive urgent recommendations from the Security Service. The subjects covered will include the way in which House arrangements are affected in the circumstances to which my hon. Friend referred.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): The Leader of the House has announced provisional business for 10 June. Does he acknowledge that attendance on that day may be thinner than it is today because the whole country will vote in the European elections and many parts of the country have local elections? Would it not be better if the important debate that has been announced for that day were held on another day so that all hon. Members were free to be in their constituencies, reawakening interest in democratic institutions?

Mr. Hain: I shall certainly consider the right hon. Gentleman's request, but I do not propose to adjourn the House on that Thursday and I am sure that he would not propose that either. The business is a motion on the Adjournment but if his point relates to the fact that the subject is disability issues rather than others on which there could sensibly be such a motion—the previous Government would have tabled a motion on the Adjournment in the same circumstances—I can consider the matter. However, I am sure that he would not want a three-liner on 10 June.

Mr. John Lyons (Strathkelvin and Bearsden) (Lab): Yesterday, most of us believed that there was a lack of clarity about what we should do in the circumstances that we faced. I agree with the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) made. In my right hon. Friend's review of security, I recommend a paper from the Royal Society on chemical and biological attack. Its main theme and central point is the need for greater co-ordination between the front-line services and sometimes with business, which has to supply the chemicals and equipment to help deal with the attack.

Mr. Hain: I am sure that you, Mr. Speaker, would not wish me to go into a great deal of operational detail, but my hon. Friend makes serious points, which the House authorities will note and take into account.

David Burnside (South Antrim) (UUP): The Leader of the House may have seen a new series, which started this week on BBC 3, called "Underworld Rich List". It named Thomas "Slab" Murphy from south Armagh as having amassed a personal fortune of £35 million in his role as chief of staff of the Provisional IRA. May we have an urgent debate about why Mr. Murphy and his two colleagues on the army council—Gerry Adams, the president of Sinn Fein, and Martin McGuinness, the chief negotiator—are not under investigation by the Police Service of Northern Ireland for their continuing involvement in major international criminal activity?

Mr. Hain: That is not a matter for me, but the hon. Gentleman has the right to apply for a debate, if he wishes.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East) (Lab): I agree with the earlier points about security. I was shocked to see hon. Members running around like headless chickens yesterday. Last night, some told me that they did not know what to do but they knew that they were not doing what they should be doing. In April, I tabled a question to the House of Commons Commission that was not called. I subsequently spoke to a senior Government Whip and the Chairman of the House of Commons Commission. I wrote to him on 20 April, asking when Members of Parliament would be briefed in the same way as BP workers, who deal with chemicals every day, are briefed about what to do in the case of major incidents. I received a reply on 28 April, saying that letters would be sent to heads of department in the following week, that briefings would commence with members of staff of the House and that Members of Parliament and their staff would be included in the briefings. What has happened to that promise by the Chairman of the House of Commons Commission?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am the Chairman of the House of Commons Commission. Is the hon. Gentleman referring to my writing to him?

Mr. Connarty: The person to whom I wrote and who replied to me was the right hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Sir Archy Kirkwood).

Mr. Speaker: He is not the Chairman of the House of Commons Commission.

Mr. Hain: Mr. Speaker, I think that you have dealt with that matter, but the point behind my hon. Friend's question is that hon. Members and members of staff are entitled and ought to know exactly what the procedures are. That is one of the many hard-learned lessons from yesterday's incident.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): Will not people find it inexplicable that a statement or debate has not been scheduled on civilian deaths in Palestine? As the Leader of the House must know, in the Islamic world the events in Gaza get even more publicity than the disastrous events in Iraq. Is there not a need for clarity in the Government's approach, given that yesterday they rightly signed and supported the United Nations Security Council resolution condemning civilian deaths but only a few weeks ago, they abstained from the Security Council resolution that condemned extra-judicial killings of Palestinian leaders? For clarity and to reassure many of our fellow citizens that we are worried about those events, is not there a need for an urgent statement and debate on the massacres in Gaza?

Mr. Hain: I shall bear in mind the hon. Gentleman's comments about the need for a debate. However let me be clear: the British Government were in the lead in obtaining the Security Council resolution, which condemned the actions in Rafah and the appalling destruction of Palestinian homes. Such action escalates the conflict rather than producing circumstances in which a negotiated settlement could occur, resulting in a secure Israel, secure from terrorists and suicide terrorist attacks, and an independent Palestinian state, which can move forward in justice and freedom. That is imperative, as the Prime Minister has made clear throughout. It is important that Members remember that the Prime Minister insisted that the road map was part of the processof negotiation alongside the decisions about interventiot in Iraq. I am absolutely at one with the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) in condemning the appalling acts and the predicament of the Palestinians, but I am sure that he would join me in saying that the tit-for-tat violence and killing has to stop on both sidesand that Israelis are just as entitled to be free from suicide attacks.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): The Leader of the House will be aware that yesterday more than 40 Iraqis were killed by American troops in Iraq, adding to the thousands of civilians who have already been killed by the coalition. There is huge concern outside the House about what is going on in Iraq, yet we are not having debates on the matter in Government time. It is a bit like "Fawlty Towers" in here: "Don't mention the war!" Will the Leader of the House assure us that we will have at least a one-day debate on what is going on, and an update on the number of civilians who have been killed?

Mr. Hain: I am certainly ready to discuss with my colleagues the scope and opportunity for a debate on Iraq when the time is right, and I shall note what my hon. Friend has said. It is important, however, to get into perspective the events that she has described, which often follow terrorist attacks on Iraqi civilians as well as on the coalition. We should also bear it in mind that there are 20,000 reconstruction projects going on in Iraq, supported by our Government, which are providing hundreds of thousands of jobs. The Baghdad to Mosul train service has been reopened, almost 33,000 Iraqi teachers underwent training in the February school holidays, and so on. My hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd) has reported regularly—and again recently—that, whatever the Iraqis' legitimate concerns about the security predicament in which they find themselves, they want us to continue to enable them to take control of their own lives, as we are determined to do by handing over control to the new Iraqi interim authority at the end of next month.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): There is growing discontent and disbelief among prison and probation officers, the voluntary sector and, now, politicians in the House about the way in which the Government are implementing the National Offender Management Service, which is the successor to the Prison Service and the probation service. It is probably the largest ever change in the justice system, yet there has been no debate in the House on a motion to discuss NOMS. The implementation date is 1 June, but the problems involved are so great that it is rumoured that that is to be pushed back to 1 September. There was a large lobby of the House the week before last by prison and probation officers, but still the appropriate Minister has not given us the detail that we need.

Will the Leader of the House consider having an urgent debate in Government time on this serious subject, so that the Minister can give us more details and let us know whether legislation is necessary to ensure that public protection is not jeopardised by the terrible way in which the Government are implementing the changes?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Lady has the right to apply for a debate in the normal way, and the Home Secretary will obviously have noted the points that she has made. I am sure that she will want to support the Government in resolving any teething troubles that might become apparent, in order to bring together the services to create an integrated service for dealing with offenders. That is surely something that she would welcome.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): In replying to an earlier question, the Leader of the House referred to the need to invest in education and science. He might not be aware that the university of Cambridge gets four times as much money per student as the university of Wolverhampton, which is headquartered in my constituency. Conversely, the university of Cambridge is one of the least accessible to working-class students—indeed, it got worse last year—while the university of Wolverhampton is the most accessible mainstream university in the country. Another contrast between them is that, whereas the university of Wolverhampton allows students to work, the university of Cambridge tells prospective students that they will be "sent down", to use its archaic language, if they get a job. That is hardly doing much to encourage accessibility for working-class students. Can we have an early debate on the matter?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Vote Labour in Wolverhampton!

Mr. Hain: Indeed; vote Labour in Wolverhampton and right across the country.

I am concerned to hear what my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) says. Obviously, Wolverhampton is lighting a path for opportunities for students from working-class and low-income backgrounds, and that example should be followed right across the university sector. That is precisely why, as a result of the Government's new legislation, more and more opportunities will be provided for low-income students, and more obligations will be placed on universities such as Cambridge to ensure that those students can take advantage of them.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): Further to the issue raised by my hon. Friend the shadow Leader of the House and the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon), I believe that my constituents will think it very strange if we do not have a debate on the question of strategy in Iraq post-30 June. Will the Leader of the House give us some indication that the Government will have a debate on the issue well before the end of next month? To have such a debate would in no way undermine the valiant duties being performed now by the British forces in Iraq.

Mr. Hain: I accept the hon. Gentleman's point and, as I have said, I am open-minded about such a debate and its timing. That is not to suggest—I am sure that he is not doing so—that there have not been many opportunities to debate Iraq. Defence debates in recent times—including one only last week—have been dominated by the subject, and the Prime Minister made a statement on Iraq very recently, in which hon. Members were able to question him. If and when it is the right time to have a debate on Iraq, the hon. Gentleman can be assured that the Government will call one.

Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak) (Lab): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion 1173?

[That this House notes that the monitoring evidence collected by the International Baby Food Action Network (IBFAN), a network of more than 200 groups in over 100 countries, demonstrates that companies continue to market baby food products in breach of the World Health Assembly International Code of Marketing of Breastmilk Substitutes and subsequent relevant resolutions; also notes that where there is malpractice it is systematic and institutionalised and that, globally, 1.5 million infants die every year because they are not breastfed, and that even in industrialised countries with universal access to health care, there are significant negative effects of artificial infant feeding, including increased risk of diabetes and obesity; is concerned that UK law only implements some provisions of the Code, limiting these to infant formula, not all breastmilk substitutes, and that follow-on formula, with similar packaging and the same name as the infant formula, is widely advertised, that bottles and teat marketing is totally unregulated, and that while the Code bans direct contact with the mother, UK companies have baby clubs and carelines; therefore calls on the Government to support independently monitored and enforced legislation fully implementing the Code and resolutions at UK, EU and international level and additional WHA resolutions to strengthen protection of appropriate infant feeding practices, to address emerging aggressive baby milk food marketing, to make appropriate policy changes in response to scientific developments, and to take action to ensure that EU Council Resolution 92/C172/01 on the marketing of breastmilk substitutes in third countries by community-based manufacturers functions effectively.]

The motion was tabled in national breast-feeding awareness week, and draws attention to the violations of the international code on the marketing of breast milk substitutes by the manufacturers of baby food products, and the consequential harmful effect that that is having on infant mortality across the world, and even on public health in this country. The Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson), has accepted that the 1995 regulations on infant formula are not fully in compliance with the code. Will my right hon. Friend make time available so that the Government can implement the recommendation of the committee on the rights of the child that the UK should adopt the international code in full?

Mr. Hain: All parents will be grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that matter. As she says, the Government are well aware of the differences between United Kingdom legislation and the international code, and we are exploring, with the Food Standards Agency, ways in which our regulations could be better aligned to the code.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): There are two things that we learned from yesterday. One is that those on the Treasury Bench and the Prime Minister did not flinch under fire, and they should be applauded for that. The other is that the House does not have an evacuation plan. Will the Leader of the House tell us whether the review that is being undertaken will take a holistic approach to incidents that occur both at this end of the Palace and at the other end, where other people are responsible for security? We have concrete barriers outside at the moment, which are unsightly and have been there for a long time. We need to do things that are not so intimidatory or obvious, but which will make us secure. Other procedures for evacuation need to be put in place. It is not a matter of just sitting here and waiting.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): Or running away.

Richard Younger-Ross: Or running away. We will need walk-through showering facilities, for example. I hope that that will be taken into account in the review, without going into detail.

Mr. Hain: May I express my gratitude for the hon. Gentleman's steadfast praise for the Prime Minister? "Holistic" is more of a Liberal Democrat word than a Labour word, but I take his point. It is not sufficient to look at just one aspect of security, such as the screen in front of the Strangers Gallery. Every aspect of the issue must be looked at in the round, which is precisely why the Speaker and the House of Commons Commission have ordered this widespread review by the Security Service and the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, and why we are determined, as a result of that review, to see big modifications in security and to learn the lessons of recent events. We are agreed on that, and we intend to take it forward—in a holistic way, by all means.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be well aware of the genuine concern surrounding the future of British manufacturing. Can he begin to understand the frustration felt by British workers, including those employed at Fergusons shipyard in my constituency, who tender for British contracts, are denied, and see the contract awarded to foreign competitors? More worryingly, such decisions are taken by faceless bureaucrats, with little or no ministerial responsibility or accountability. Will he therefore use his good offices to ensure that the Government's procurement policy takes account of the potential job losses when British Government contracts are awarded to foreign competitors?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend makes a persuasive point, and I am sure that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will want to listen carefully to his comments. I am sure that if my hon. Friend had had more time or had been in order to do so, he would have wanted to acknowledge the Government's very good record on job creation, having been responsible for running an economy in which since we came to power nearly 2 million more jobs have been created in the past seven years, and in which unemployment is lower in every constituency in the land, including my hon. Friend's.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): Can time be found for a series of statements from Departments on what steps they are taking to improve their woeful record on the answering of written parliamentary questions and the quality of the answers given? Statistics that I have obtained show that the worst offenders in answering written questions are the Foreign Office, which in the previous Session took 102 working days to answer one question; the Department of Health, which took 127 working days; the Department for Work and Pensions, which took 130 days; and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, which took 132 working days. Other Departments either cannot or will not answer the question on how long it has taken them. The Home Office took nearly three months to answer my question by saying that it could not give the figures that I was seeking.

Even when answers are given, they are frequently inadequate. I have been waiting since 2 March for a letter that was promised to me regarding greenbelt erosion in metropolitan areas, and on 4 May, the Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education told me that the figures that I had requested were "not to hand", but that he would send them to me when they were—apparently, they are still not to hand. It is simply unacceptable. Members of Parliament cannot get on with their jobs if the Government will not give us the information that we request. Can we have some statements on what will be done about it?

Mr. Hain: I have ensured that everybody in government is aware of the need to answer Members' questions as appropriately and as quickly as possible. Every effort is being made to do that. In some circumstances, the basis for the answers takes time to collect. Obviously, our intention is to meet the House's requests and to meet our obligations, and we continue to strive towards that.

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): The Leader of the House will be aware that last week I requested that time be found to debate the future—or lack of it—of further education in Wales, and particularly in Gwent. As he will be aware, in some of the poorest communities in Wales, such as mine, colleges are facing redundancies, closure of departments and transfer of departments to other parts of the county, which are almost impossible to get to. He will also be aware of the importance of maintaining those departments in an area of high deprivation, with some of the highest levels of unemployment.

Can we have a debate on the discussions that the Leader of the House has had in the past with Coleg Gwent—perhaps he can share with the House his experience of dealing with its management—and with Education and Learning Wales and the Welsh Assembly? Would he be willing, with the First Minister of the Welsh Assembly, to conduct an investigation into the management of that institution, because we are now faced with a new principal, who will be in post within the next few weeks but who, we are told, still supports the plans to carry out those redundancies and department closures?

Mr. Hain: I share my hon. Friend's concern about what has happened, as I have said publicly previously, and as I repeat now. I still find it baffling that, given all the huge resources that have gone into education funding right across Wales—including further education funding, which is getting more resources under our Labour Government than ever before—this situation should have arisen. That is why I have raised it with the First Minister. As my hon. Friend will know, the Education Minister made a statement in the National Assembly this week saying that she wanted to get to the bottom of the affair, so his representations are being closely listened to and followed.

[Mr. Hain]

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): May I, too, warmly welcome the debate on the civil aviation White Paper, which is to take place on 8 June, especially as it is on the Adjournment and not on a substantive motion? Will the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that soon after that debate the Secretary of State for Transport will come to the House and give his conclusions on the precise policy that Her Majesty's Government are to follow, since air transport operators, airport operators and communities around airports need to have blight lifted and to have some certainty about the future?

Mr. Hain: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's welcome of the debate. He is one of the Members who has in recent weeks been pressing on me the need for such a debate. I am well aware of the situation that he is properly looking after at Northolt and of course at Heathrow, near to his constituency. I will certainly bear in mind what he has said.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that deaths from exposure to asbestos have now reached epidemic proportions? For example, last year, there were 2,000 deaths from mesothelioma cancer alone, and it is forecast that by 2015 those deaths will be beyond 6,000 per year, and that over the next 40 years, there will be 185,000 such deaths. Will he therefore consider a debate in Government time to discuss how we might develop a strategy—a health, prevention, benefit and care strategy—for sufferers of exposure to asbestos?

Mr. Hain: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his tireless, lifelong work, especially in the House, to expose this problem and to work to solve it. I know that the Secretary of State for Health is aware of that, and is conscious of the representations that he is making. My right hon. Friend will certainly be aware now of my hon. Friend's passionate feelings about the need to tackle the matter.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Shortly after the invasion of Afghanistan, we were having a sensible debate on post-conflict reconstruction, nation building, and international donor conferences. Notwithstanding the fairly sizeable chunk of the Department for International Development's budget that is now going to Iraq, we simply have not had that sort of debate in relation to Iraq. Today, the Financial Times reports a poll finding that, even in northern Iraq, nine out of 10 Iraqis now see the coalition as occupiers rather than liberators. The House must work out how we are going to win the peace and the humanitarian campaign. Please can we start to debate those issues on the Floor of the House?

Mr. Hain: I very much take the hon. Gentleman's point on conflict resolution and conflict prevention, particularly given his position on the Select Committee on International Development. It is essential to maintain the focus that the Government have had on these matters through the Department for International Development—working with the Foreign Office and the Ministry of Defence—and the special conflict prevention fund, which was established through pooling those Departments' resources, which I am sure the hon. Gentleman will welcome.

I note the hon. Gentleman's point about the opinion reported in the Financial Times, but the other reports that we are getting are that people in Iraq—while being very worried about the situation and having many criticisms of one kind or another about the security situation and even the performance of the coalition—do not want us just to walk out on them. It is important that he acknowledges that, given the Leader of the Opposition's statement overnight that he also acknowledges it.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that time should be allowed for a debate on those people who loyally give up valuable time by volunteering to become magistrates? There is a great danger in Lancashire and in the Chorley constituency, where there are no magistrates under the age of 40 and the age profile is much older, that they will all retire together. What will the future hold for magistrates courts if we do not get young people involved and volunteering?

Mr. Hain: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend. It is not simply a question of filling vacant seats on the bench but of getting and maintaining a bench that is representative of the community, as I am sure that he agrees. I am sure that his points will have been carefully noted.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): May I gently counsel the Leader of the House against using the term "old-fashioned" as an all-purpose term of deprecation, as in "old-fashioned security measures"? The way in which we refer to each other here is old-fashioned, but it makes for a good and effective form of debate. The security staff, the policeman, the Badge Messengers, the men in tails and the men in tights respond to us with great but old-fashioned courtesy, which is very effective in the context of the security measures that they implement on our behalf.

Mr. Hain: I join the hon. Gentleman in paying tribute to all staff of the House for the support that they give us, in terms of security and in other ways, which enables us to do our jobs as Members of Parliament. We are all very grateful for that. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree, however, that an old-fashioned security approach was dealing with an old-fashioned security situation 20, 30 and 40 years ago, when we did not face the risk of suicide terrorist attack and did not experience the breaches of security that we have seen in the last few months—protesters climbing up the Big Ben tower, or what happened yesterday. In 2004—in the age of the suicide terrorist, which is an entirely new development—we need a House of Commons that is properly protected. Surely the hon. Gentleman agrees that that is a modern, not an old-fashioned approach to security.

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): May we have an early debate on the uses of neighbourhood renewal funding? I was shocked to learn that £40,000 of money earmarked for my constituents had been spent by local Tory councillors on consultancies for a project that probably would not go ahead, and is not even in my constituency. At a time when my constituents' priorities are better street lighting and action to deal with graffiti, litter and antisocial behaviour, is it not outrageous that these people can short-change them in such a fashion?

Mr. Hain: On the basis of that account, I find it outrageous as well. I am sure that my hon. Friend's constituents, and voters in the coming weeks, will bear in mind what he has said.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend re-examine the way in which we deal with Northern Ireland business? On Tuesday, during our debate on the Pensions Bill, there was a discussion about the problem of matters having to be dealt with by Order-in-Council rather than being written into the Bill. It is a general problem with Northern Ireland legislation.

Why does the Northern Ireland Grand Committee, which will meet in about an hour, never visit Northern Ireland? The Northern Ireland people might be interested to meet Grand Committee members from the mainland, and convey their interests and concerns as they do to members of the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs.

Mr. Hain: The meeting arrangements for the Northern Ireland Grand Committee are not a matter for me, but my hon. Friend's points have been noted and will also be noted by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): I support the earlier call by the shadow Leader of the House for a debate on the new deal and employment policy. In my constituency, more people are in work than ever before. There is a job for everyone who wants one, and there are more opportunities for the over-50s, disabled people and single parents to return to the labour market. Given that the Tories have expressed concern about the topics of debates taking place during the week beginning 7 June, would it not be appropriate for us to have a debate on the new deal on one of the days leading up to 10 June?

Mr. Hain: I am very tempted to consider that. Many hundreds of thousands of people, including those with disabilities—

Mr. Heald indicated dissent.

Mr. Hain: The shadow Leader of the House shakes his head. I repeat that many hundreds of thousands of people, including those with disabilities, lone parents, and youngsters and long-term unemployed people—including some in my constituency—whose prospects were hopeless under the Conservatives are now being given opportunities to upskill and start work. I have met many people—I am sure that we all have; if we have not, we are not doing our jobs as Members of Parliament—who have benefited from the new deal, and would be horrified if they realised that the Conservatives planned to abolish it.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I thank the Leader of the House for his announcement about a debate on the aviation White Paper after the recess. Next time we have the opportunity of a full day's debate on a motion for the Adjournment, will he agree that it is about time we discussed public health? As he is one of the best-briefed Cabinet Ministers, it will not have escaped his attention that in recent weeks the Royal College of Nursing, the British Medical Association and the Government's own chief medical officer have called for action to ban smoking in public places, that a Mintel survey showed this week that most British adults were in favour of a ban, and that an Imperial college study showed that hundreds of people die every year in this country from the effects of second-hand tobacco smoke. As chair of the all-party group on smoking and health, may I urge my right hon. Friend to ensure that the Government's programme includes further action on that important area of public health before the end of this Parliament?

Mr. Hain: I am very sympathetic to my hon. Friend's policy points on smoking. As a non-smoker myself, I am well aware of its impact on the health of smokers, and indeed of the danger of passive smoking. That is why the Secretary of State for Health has embarked on a consultation exercise, and why the issue is being debated up and down the country in the big conversation. The idea is to discuss how policies on smoking can make progress in the future.

Points of Order

1.26 pm

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I apologise to you unreservedly for confusing the role of the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Sir Archy Kirkwood)—who speaks on behalf of the House of Commons Commission—with your role as Chairman? My question to the Commission spokesman was not starred for inclusion on the Order Paper. Having spoken to the hon. Gentleman, I am sure he did not intend to mislead me, but assumed that I knew his role. He asked me to write to him, in his capacity as the Commission's representative. I have furnished you with the letter, Mr. Speaker, to which he replied on 28 April.

I hope you will accept my apology, Mr. Speaker, and that the promise of briefings for Members and their staff will be kept so that Members know what to do in times of crisis.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman need not apologise. It is just that I have a good memory, and I always remember when I have written to him.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Given that only 6,000 of the 1 million disabled people who want jobs have been helped in any way by the new deal, is it in order for the Leader of the House to pretend that the Conservatives want to wind down help for the disabled? In fact we want to increase it, rather than wasting money on people who would have had a job anyway.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has some privileges, but they do not include a second go at business questions.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the last hour I have received an extremely unusual and very disturbing e-mail from Zimbabwe. It was sent by Sekai Holland, the former Secretary for International Relations to the Movement for Democratic Change, and states

"The unfolding story is that . . . zanu/pf thugs are being bussed into Harare . . . to then find their way to Parliament where they are saying that they want to kill MP Roy Bennet . . . and then they will bomb the MDC . . . headquarters . . . please pass this to parliamentarians all over the world now."

Is there anything that this Parliament can do to support the remnants of parliamentary democracy that are left in Zimbabwe, or is there any way of sending a message to the Government—who have acted well over this—perhaps via the Leader of the House?

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. Gentleman will know, that is not a matter for me, but many Back Benchers on both sides of the House are doing what they can to raise the case of Zimbabwe.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have here a printout from the website of the Conservative party, which has launched an attack on me for withdrawing the Fisheries Jurisdiction Bill. That comes as something of a surprise to me. In fact, this excellent Bill is due to be debated further on Friday 16 July instead of tomorrow, which I think would have been inauspicious in terms of its chances of further progress.

Another curious aspect is the fact that the hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Duncan), who is named on the website, did not manage to sign early-day motion 937, in which 42 Members on both sides of the House demand parliamentary time for my excellent Bill.

Is there anything you can do, Mr. Speaker, to protect the House from misleading websites that report our proceedings—or, for that matter, from the blundering incompetence of novice Conservative Members who do not read the parliamentary monitor?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has broad shoulders, and I am quite sure that he can take criticism. From time to time, he has had criticism from me, but that was at another time and on another day.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your advice on a point of order of which I have given you notice. As you know, robust debate is in the nature of politics and no one, least of all you, would want to inhibit that. However, I hope that you agree with me that there is an important distinction to be made between matters of argument and the deliberate misreporting outside this place of proceedings within it, including the doctoring of quotes from Hansard and the invention of votes by hon. Members on motions that were never moved.

My point of order, Mr. Speaker, is to say that that is what has been happening in Birmingham, where a Conservative councillor, Peter Douglas Osborn, distributed a leaflet misreporting a Hansard quote from the Minister for E-Commerce, Energy and Postal Services in respect of the Post Office urban reinvention programme. You will also be aware that Councillor Douglas Osborn, together with Liberal Democrat Councillor Holtom, has written to a third party alleging that I voted against a motion that did not exist regarding a post office in my constituency. Those documents follow allegations made by the leader of the Liberal Democrats on the city council in leaflets distributed in my constituency, also alleging that I and other Labour colleagues voted for a number of propositions concerning local post offices that were never put to this House.

May I therefore seek your advice, Mr. Speaker, on what can be done to protect the integrity of the parliamentary record and to safeguard the reputations of hon. Members of all parties against those who seek to falsify them?

Mr. Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me advance notice of his point of order. He has raised a significant matter, which should be of concern to the whole House.

On 16 July 1971, the House resolved not to entertain any complaint of contempt or breach of privilege in respect of the publication of its debates or proceedings, but that resolution in no way removed the constraints on those who, for whatever reason, choose to misrepresent the proceedings of the House or to publish false or misleading reports of our debates.

As "Erskine May" makes clear, since at least 1699 the House has regarded the misrepresentation of its proceedings not only as a contempt, but as "destructive of the freedom of Parliament".

Nothing in the 1971 resolution alters that view.

I can therefore advise the hon. Gentleman and the House that the deliberate or reckless misrepresentation of the debates and proceedings of the House is potentially a contempt of the House, against which the House may wish to proceed. Moreover, those who act in this way are unlikely to be protected in the courts by the unqualified privilege which normally attaches to the reporting of our proceedings.

I am sure the that House will take a serious view of the situation if the conduct which the hon. Gentleman has described continues.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful to you for responding in that way to the point of order raised by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Richard Burden). It certainly illuminates a number of remarks that might be made about any of us, at any time. However, is it not the case that many Labour Members voted for the network reinvention scheme on 15 October 2002, and that it is under that scheme that many urban post offices are threatened?

Mr. Speaker: That has nothing to do with the point that I made regarding the point of order of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Richard Burden).

Orders of the Day

Pensions Bill

3RD ALLOTTED DAY

As amended in the Standing Committee, further considered.

Clause 125

PAYMENT OF SCHEME BENEFITS

Amendment proposed [19 May]: Government amendment No. 101, in page 84, line 7, leave out 'for that period'.—[Malcolm Wicks.]

1.34 pm

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Speaker: I remind the House that with this we are discussing the following: Government amendments Nos. 102 and 103,

Amendment No. 26, in page 232, line 15, Schedule 7, leave out from 'means' to end of line 17 and insert '90 per cent.'.

Amendment No. 27, in page 232, line 24, leave out sub-paragraph (7).

Government amendment No. 144,

Amendment No. 28, in page 247, line 42, leave out '2.5 %' and insert '5 %'.

Amendment No. 31, in page 249, line 19, leave out paragraph 29.

The Minister for Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): We were yesterday in the middle of an important debate on aspects of the pension protection fund. As I recall, as proceedings came to a halt I was gently advising the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb), in relation to important social reforms, that he should perhaps try to adopt a less pessimistic and cynical approach to what I regard as proper social advances. Although there are always difficult questions to ask and proper scrutiny is needed, we should not be in the business of trying to undermine confidence in important measures such as the pension protection fund.

In the course of yesterday's discussion, various detailed issues were raised, and I should like to reply to them in a little detail, notwithstanding the pressures on time this afternoon. I feel that some of the issues around the 100 per cent. compensation, as opposed to 90 per cent., were discussed in great detail in Committee, but I shall try to summarise some of the issues.

Hon. Members made various suggestions about changing the levels of compensation to be paid to those over and under a scheme's normal pension age. There were some calls for compensation to be increased to 100 per cent. of the PPF benefits for non-pensioners, and questions about levelling down to 90 per cent. for all. Before I begin a detailed response to the points made, I shall first remind Members why we are setting up the PPF. It is to guard against a situation in future where employers go bust, leaving pension schemes desperately underfunded and pension scheme members receiving only a small fraction of the pension that they were promised. From time to time, one or two hon. Members forget that important fact. We can argue about the respective merits of 100 per cent. and 90 per cent., or something in between, but many people, who after years of paying contributions would otherwise be left receiving only 20 or 30 per cent., will be grateful that Parliament has done its work to provide at least the 90 per cent. That is sometimes forgotten.

All things being equal, we would of course prefer to pay 100 per cent. to all, but some reduction in compensation is necessary to guard against the moral hazard of companies' taking advantage of PPF compensation and, of course, to control costs. By providing 90 per cent. compensation for those under a scheme's normal pension age, we are incentivising those who have the greatest influence over funding levels—such as high-paid directors—to keep the scheme out of PPF. That is an important element of the range of moral hazard provisions that the Bill now contains.

In designing the pension protection fund we have learned lessons from the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation in the United States. Yesterday, we discussed the admissible rules and the disregarding of rule changes in the previous three years, which are learned directly from the US experience. Like the US PBGC, the PPF will apply a benefit cap—in our case £25,000 for those below normal pension age. The 90 per cent. compensation level for those below normal pension age, too, builds on the US experience, where no such moral hazard provision exists, and where all scheme members are guaranteed 100 per cent. We do not want to take money away from people above normal pension age who are receiving their pension. Under our scheme, those who enter the PPF who are already above normal pension age and receiving their pension will receive 100 per cent. compensation and will not suddenly be left with a drop in their income. Surely that is sensible.

I should emphasise that, in designing the PPF, we have worked hard to balance the need to provide meaningful protection for scheme members with the need to ensure that the fund will be affordable. Hon. Members have suggested equalising compensation to 100 per cent. for all, but that would add an estimated £100 million to the levy each year. As I said to hon. Members yesterday—again, gently—they were not very forthcoming about the cost implications of their amendments, and it was not at all clear whether those costs would be met by increasing the levy or by the taxpayer.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): Perhaps, then, the Minister can assist the House by assessing the cost implication of a proposed reform. He says that the extra would be £100 million if everyone under normal pension age were to receive 100 per cent., but I made the distinction in my contribution yesterday between workers below pension age and retired people below pension age. Does he know how much of that £100 million relates to retired people—people who are drawing pensions below pension age? I imagine that that is a small fraction of the figure. My key point was that the anti-moral hazard measures will hit carers and others who have retired early for good reasons. There might be a better way of dealing with the moral hazard issue.

Malcolm Wicks: From memory, the figure is approximately £10 million, but if I have it badly wrong I shall write to the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Gentleman asked about early retirees and whether the PPF compensation levels were unfair. We recognise that with any scheme such as this there will be aspects of rough justice, but we have taken the view that early retirees will be more likely than those over the normal pension age to be able to top up their income—for example, through part-time work. We recognise that that will not be true for those who retire early on grounds of ill health, so such people will receive 100 per cent. compensation if the board considers that the trustees made the ill-health award correctly.

If we did not apply the 90 per cent. figure to early retirees, new questions of moral hazard would be opened up. If early retirees also received 100 per cent., individuals could start taking early retirement with the sole intention of maximising their entitlement to PPF compensation. It would be hugely difficult to prevent this, as early retirement is not awarded in the same way as an ill health pension, so it would be more difficult for the PPF to police. Furthermore, there is also a cost implication in paying early retirees 100 per cent. compensation. Notwithstanding the moral hazard risk that I have described, we estimate that such a payment would require PPF levies to be increased by £10 million per annum.

On the power to vary compensation and levels of benefit, the hon. Member for Northavon—he features in our debates and in our thoughts—asked what extreme circumstances might lead to the board's making a recommendation to the Secretary of State. He inferred that as soon as a big scheme came into the PPF, compensation levels would immediately be reduced. We expect that the circumstances in which that might happen would be extraordinary rather than extreme. It is important to emphasise that if two or three big FTSE 100 companies go bust—in case any City editors are half-listening, I should repeat that this is an extraordinary, in extremis scenario—the PPF will take control of the pension assets. In the short to medium term, the PPF will therefore be very cash rich, so the circumstance described in which the PPF might "fall over" is simply not right. In such a scenario, the board will have no problem in paying benefits, but it will obviously want to consider the requirements of the long-term funding situation in order to reduce any deficit between assets and liabilities. In other words, the PPF is likely to be able to cope, even in the in extremis situation of two or three very large companies going bust.

In the very unlikely event that the board wanted to vary the level of compensation, it would have to consider raising the levy. Before a recommendation was made to the Secretary of State, the board would have to reduce indexation and revaluation to zero, which would significantly reduce liabilities. The board would also be required to consult. Any changes to the compensation percentages would of course be subject to the affirmative procedure. There is no need, therefore, for the Government to be a lender of last resort. If a large pension scheme comes into the PPF, this will not create a liquidity problem, as the assets of the scheme will be taken into the PPF. The scheme will of course be underfunded to some extent, and the PPF levy will ensure that, over time, the PPF is financed adequately to pay all its liabilities.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): My neighbour the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) has drawn the Minister's attention to the problems associated with the Lister-Petter pension scheme, and the Minister is indeed meeting the hon. Gentleman and some members of that scheme. The subsidiary went bust and the main company is still trading, yet pensioners in the subsidiary scheme seem not to be covered. Can the Minister clarify what is happening? If he cannot do so now, perhaps he will write to me if I first supply him with more details of that scheme.

Malcolm Wicks: It would be wrong of me to comment on a particular scheme because I do not know the circumstances, but if the hon. Gentleman sends me the information I shall consider it carefully and write to him. We have considered various moral hazard provisions, and we are fully aware of the danger that sophisticated company structures—involving parent companies and many subsidiaries—can lead to the dumping of pensions in one scheme, while the parent or subsidiary companies remain solvent. We are dealing with this issue in general terms, but I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising it. We will deal with it in the way that we discussed.

1.45 pm

Mr. Webb: The Minister is being very generous in giving way—he has clearly had a good night's sleep. No one is arguing that it is likely that the Government will have to be the lender of last resort, and he is right: if a large scheme goes down, a big pot of money goes into the PPF in the year in question, so there is no problem. However, the Government have included a "what if?" provision in schedule 7, with which amendment No. 31 deals, that creates a reserve power. My question is: what happens if the fund gets into a really difficult situation? The Minister says that that is not very likely, but he clearly concedes that it is possible; otherwise, such a power would not be included in the Bill. If such a situation is possible and that power could be exercised, surely it would be better for the Government to act as lender of last resort, rather than cutting benefits. So the question of the likelihood or otherwise of the scenario is not relevant; the Government have included the "what if?" provision in the Bill, so would not the alternative strategy be preferable?

Malcolm Wicks: As ever, I am in a generous mood, so I shall not point out that the hon. Gentleman is rather good at "what if?" scenarios. That can be helpful in testing things out, but occasionally it can prove somewhat absurd. It is right and proper that there should be no liability on the general taxpayer as regards the PPF, not least because many taxpayers are not in final salary pension schemes. We have therefore carefully costed likely liabilities to the PPF. Yes, we have built in certain provisions and safeguards, because it would be irresponsible to ask the House to support this Bill without building in an in extremis scenario.

Mr. Webb: A "what if?" scenario.

Malcolm Wicks: Yes. In terms of national emergencies—perhaps this is not a very good comparison—it is right and proper that we plan for the most extraordinary things that might happen to our various institutions, or to the country as a whole. However, so far as such events are concerned, we are not talking about their likelihood. We are convinced that raising the levy by 25 per cent. a year to a cap of 100 per cent., along with the requirement to consult the Secretary of State on crucial matters, provides the necessary flexibility.

We have learned the lesson of the need for such flexibility from the United States. In discussing the American war on poverty and its relationship to this country, the great Professor Halsey of Oxford once spoke of ideas drifting across the Atlantic, soggy on arrival and of dubious utility. However, as a proponent of the special relationship, I should point out that this situation is very different; we have learned proper lessons from across the Atlantic. The fact that the board itself, subject to certain provisions, can raise the levy without having to come to Parliament—in the United States, Congress has to be consulted—is a very important flexibility.

I emphasise the point about assets because in this debate and the dubious comments occasionally made about the American Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, it is sometimes forgotten that the PBGC, despite the current financial difficulties, holds considerable assets. Notwithstanding anything else, those assets would enable it to meet its commitments for several decades. It is sometimes suggested that in an extreme scenario in which a particular company crashes, the PPF would be unable to operate, but in fact, considerable assets would go to the PPF. That point gets forgotten.

A recent Channel 4 documentary—the hon. Member for Northavon might have contributed to it—talked about the PBGC being on the verge of collapse. On watching that documentary, I thought that the merger of Channel 4 and Channel 5 had already taken place, such was the absurdity of the analysis offered by the young gentleman presenting it. He was riding a moped, and seemed to think that he was in a film with Sophia Loren.

May I move on to indexation? One of the amendments was designed to increase the cap on indexation to 5 per cent. As I have already explained, the Bill is designed to reduce the level of the indexation cap to 2.5 per cent. on all future accruals. By restricting the amount of indexation paid, the PPF is better able to predict its liabilities. It also means that the PPF will not end up paying more than some schemes are required to do. Furthermore, it avoids creating a further increase to the levy of around £100 million a year. If we add to that the proposal for 100 per cent. compensation for all, the amendments would effectively add an estimated £200 million to the levy each year.

Once again, I look to Conservative Front Benchers to intervene to explain their proposals. If they seriously believe in provisions that would add an extra £200 million a year, we need to know whether it is a proper spending commitment. It sounds like one. Are they saying that the taxpayer should fund the proposals or that the levy should be substantially increased? Or is it that they are thrashing around as ever without being clear where they are going—one way or the other?

[Malcolm Wicks]

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): Given that the Minister provokes me and that the world's media are standing several deep in the Press Gallery, craning to hear our every word, let me make it clear that our probing amendments are designed to get the Minister to admit that what the Government are selling is not a total safety net. Indeed, the Minister just made the point—it will be interesting to read the Hansard—that the reason for making reductions in indexation is to ensure that the PPF has enough money to pay people out. It is yet another example of cheese-paring the benefits to be paid to pensioners in order to make the scheme work in the first place. That is the point, and it is important that the public end up with a clear impression of what they are and are not getting with the scheme.

Malcolm Wicks: If we are cheese paring, there should presumably be more cheese and it has to be paid for. The hon. Gentleman has not answered my point. Is he making a spending commitment—I think he is—of £200 million a year? Is he telling industry to pay much more on the levy or saying that the taxpayer should subsidise it? I would be happy to give way again. Answer came there none. We are not cheese paring. Unlike in Monty Python, this is a cheese shop with a whole variety of cheeses—ample for everyone and ample to cover the liabilities on pensions that we are predicting. A further point is the impact that such a measure might have on schemes. If schemes followed suit, it would increase scheme liabilities and contribution levels, as well as a bigger hit on schemes via the levy.

The hon. Member for Northavon also asked about the consistency of 2.5 per cent. indexation with a revaluation cap of 5 per cent. There is no inconsistency. Pension schemes are required to revalue in line with the retail prices index with a cumulative cap of 5 per cent. The PPF revaluation maximum rate of 5 per cent. therefore mirrors the maximum rate in the Pension Schemes Act 1993 and, as with the PPF indexation, it is in line with the requirements of the schemes.

The Government have taken account of the recommendations made in the Pickering report regarding indexation and revaluation. While that report recommends a reduction in indexation, it specifically recommends that revaluation should remain unchanged. We followed that advice.

Finally, I should like to clarify the position on borrowing. I hope that my distinction between the cash flow position of the PPF and its funding position has already dealt with the doomsday scenario of the hon. Member for Northavon. [Interruption.] My speech writer is beginning to understand my approach to these matters. I should clarify that borrowing will be needed only in extreme cases where there is an exceptional cash flow need. That is most likely to happen at the outset, but even there, the PPF will collect the levy at least a year in advance of the PPF having to start paying any pensions. There will also be a limit, set through regulations, on the amount that the PPF can borrow.

Mr. Webb: It is not me who puts the provisions in the Bill; it is the Minister—or somebody. It is the Bill, not me, that gives the PPF the power to borrow money. It is the Bill that says that those circumstances may arise and that provision needs to be made for them. At that point, why is it better value for money for the taxpayer for the PPF to borrow privately at a higher interest rate than the Government could provide?

Malcolm Wicks: We covered that in Committee. We believe that the normal rules of borrowing should apply. I urge the hon. Gentleman—gently, as ever—not to adopt a doomsday scenario on this front. Like many of us, I am sure he has insurance against fire risk in his house, but it is unlikely that his house or my house will burn down. It is perfectly proper for the most difficult scenarios to be taken into account in legislation and to make provision for them. The PPF is a well developed, well costed and evidence-based scheme, which we believe will stand the test of time. I hope that I have convinced the House that hon. Members should not press their amendments.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 102, in page 84, line 16, after 'pension' insert

'or payment of a member's lump sum'.

No. 103, in page 84, line 19, at end insert—

'(4A) For the purposes of subsection (4)—

(a) "normal pension age", in relation to an eligible scheme and any pension or other benefit under it, means the age specified in the scheme rules as the earliest age at which the pension or other benefit becomes payable without actuarial adjustment (disregarding any scheme rule making special provision as to early payment on the grounds of ill health), and

(b) where different ages are so specified in relation to different parts of a pension or other benefit—

(i) subsection (4) has effect as if those parts were separate pensions or, as the case may be, benefits, and

(ii) in relation to a part of a pension or other benefit, the reference in that subsection to normal pension age is to be read as a reference to the age specified in the scheme rules as the earliest age at which that part becomes so payable.

(4B) In subsection (4A) "scheme rules" has the meaning given by section 134(7).'.—[Mr. Jim Murphy.]

Clause 127

BOARD'S OBLIGATION TO OBTAIN VALUATION OF ASSETS AND PROTECTED LIABILITIES

Amendments made: No. 104, in page 85, line 13, leave out from second 'valuation' to end of line 15 and insert

'of the assets and protected liabilities of the scheme which—

(a) is in the prescribed form and contains the prescribed information, and

(b) is prepared and signed by a person with prescribed qualifications;'.

No. 105, in page 85, line 32, at end insert—

'( ) In a case where there are one or more reviewable ill health pensions (within the meaning of section [Reviewable ill health pensions]) under the scheme, nothing in subsection (2) requires the actuarial valuation to be obtained during the period mentioned in section Effect of review(b) (period during which Board may exercise its power to make a decision following a review) relating to any such pension.'.—[Mr. Jim Murphy.]

Clause 134

APPLICATION FOR RECONSIDERATION

Mr. Webb: I beg to move amendment No. 219, in page 90, leave out lines 14 to 16 and insert—

'(b) audited accounts covering the period from the date of the latest statutory annual accounts of the scheme to a date no later than three months prior to the day the application is made.'.

You will have noticed, Madam Deputy Speaker, that relatively few of the amendments tabled on Report—I do not mean the Government amendments—are signed by both Liberal Democrat and Conservative Members. This is one of those rare examples. We were simultaneously inspired by the need to change the audit and accounting arrangements in cases where trustees make an approach to the pension protection fund. We both received the same letter from the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales. It wrote to the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson), who did not reply, so it asked me to table the amendments. The Conservatives then got round to it and may have been rather shocked to find their names on our amendment—but we will move on. In Committee, the hon. Member for Eastbourne generally got to speak first and read out the brief before I did; on this occasion—I am enjoying the moment—I can read it to him first.

The substance of the point is that, under clause 134, arrangements need to be made for trustees to approach the PPF to ask it to take over the assets of the scheme. There are two issues. First, the clause refers to "an auditor's valuation of the scheme as at a date ("the reconsideration date") within the prescribed period ending with the day on which the application is made."

That is straightforward. The first question asked by the Institute of Chartered Accountants is about the concept of an auditor's valuation. Usually, there is a set of accounts and the role of the auditor is not to value the assets of the scheme, but to audit those accounts. It is the accountant who produces the account and the auditor who then certifies whether it has been done properly. The Institute of Chartered Accountants believes that it is not the job of the auditor to provide the valuation. Should the PPF be supplied with audited accounts, and is the auditor the right person to do the valuation? That is the first question.

That is why our amendment refers to "audited accounts" and not to an "auditor's valuation", as the Bill does.

2 pm

The second point has to do with timing. The concept of an auditor's valuation is difficult. We are talking about audited accounts, which have to be signed by trustees. However, the Bill provides that trustees relinquish responsibility when a scheme's assets are transferred to the PPF, in which case there would be no trustees to sign the audited accounts. If the Minister accepts that we need audited accounts and not an auditor's valuation, there needs to be a provision in the Bill to ensure that trustees are in place to sign the accounts. That implies that the date of valuation or of the audit of the accounts must come before the assets are handed over to the PPF, as otherwise there would be no trustees to sign the audited accounts.

The amendment provides that the period should extend from the final annual accounts to three months before the date when the application is made. The reasoning is that it will take three months to produce accounts, have them audited and passed to the PPF. The ICAEW reckons that three months will be just enough time for that. The trustees—who would remain until the assets were handed over—would be able to sign the accounts off, and the PPF board and its staff would be able to look at what happened to the assets in the three months after the audited accounts were signed off.

I freely admit that I am not an authority on the distinction between the roles of auditors and accountants, but not surprisingly, it is important to the ICAEW. The institute considers that the Bill is unclear when it refers to a "prescribed period ending with the day on which the application is made."

It also believes that the clause confuses the role of the auditor with that of the accountant, as the latter prepares accounts to be audited. It is also concerned that audited accounts could not be signed off by trustees if the assets had already been handed over to the PPF, for the reason that I have given already.

I hope that I have done justice to the concerns that have been raised. I am delighted that the hon. Member for Eastbourne backs the amendment. I look forward to his contribution and to the Minister's response.

Mr. Waterson: There seems to have been a photo-finish at the Table Office when the amendment was submitted. All credit must go to the ICAEW for getting in just under the wire and ensuring, on the final possible date, that the amendment could be debated in the House. I hope that it will add some credibility to the amendment if I make it clear that it is backed by the official Opposition. I do not want it to be undermined by the fact that the names of Liberal Democrat Members appear at the top of the list of sponsors.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson) has popped out of the Chamber for a moment. I am delighted about that, as the mere mention of any professional body incenses him and provokes him into an attack. Yesterday it was lawyers, and today it might have been the turn of accountants. I had better sit down before he reappears, so I will only say that we support the amendment and hope that the Government will accept it.

Malcolm Wicks: The support of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition of course adds enormously to the credibility of the amendment. It therefore pains me to suggest that it is unnecessary and might be withdrawn.

Clause 134 details the process by which the trustees or managers of a scheme may make an application to the board to reconsider a decision not to admit the scheme into the PPF. Amendment No. 219 would require this application to be accompanied by audited accounts that cover the period between the date of the latest set of annual accounts and a date that must be no later than three months prior to the date of application.

Clause 134(4)(b) already requires an application to be accompanied by an auditor's valuation of the scheme. Because an auditor's valuation would have to take, as a starting point, the final set of statutory accounts, there is no substantive difference between an auditor's valuation and a set of audited accounts as described in the amendment.

The amendment would require the accounts to cover a specific period of time—the period between the latest set of annual accounts and a date that must be no later than three months prior to the date that the application is made. It is absolutely essential that the application for reconsideration be accompanied by an up-to-date set of accounts, as that will provide the basis for the board's decision. The amendment would effectively allow the accounts to be three months out of date, which is unlikely to be acceptable in all cases.

We will be consulting further with the pensions industry, wind-up specialists and trustees to ensure that the period prescribed is the right one. We will also consult all those who have made useful contributions to the debate.

Mr. Webb: The audit could take place 11 months after the accounts for the previous year have been completed. I do not understand how the auditor is supposed to do an evaluation when the available accounts are 11 months old. The amendment would mean that, at worst, the accounts would be only three months old. The ICAEW has said that the auditor's role is different from the accountant's, so how can the auditor provide an up-to-date valuation when the accounts are 11 months old? Is that not what accountants do, rather than auditors? Is not what the accountants produce validated by the auditors?

Malcolm Wicks: This is very detailed territory, and none of us is an expert. However, we are talking about an auditor's valuation, and that will clearly involve the auditor making a judgment about a scheme's finances. The final set of statutory accounts will be one of the building blocks in that, but I promise that my officials will reconsider the matter. I have said that we will consult on it in any case. We are not against the spirit of the amendment, but we do not think it necessary.

Given the reassurances that we will consult, I hope that the hon. Member for Northavon will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Webb: I am grateful to the Minister for his constructive response to the amendment. My assumption is that auditors check what other people have done. Although it may be rather crude, that is the distinction that I am trying to draw. I do not want to demean large swathes of the profession, but it seems to me that auditors check someone else's sums and do not do the sums themselves. Accountants and auditors have different qualifications and expertise, which I do not want to understate.

The Minister has listened to the argument, however, and reflected on it, and he has promised to talk to people who can advise him on these matters. I therefore beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 157

INITIAL LEVY

Mr. Waterson: I beg to move amendment No. 33, in page 105, line 5, after 'regulations', insert

', which shall be no earlier than the day on which the basis for calculating the risk-based levy in the first financial year after the initial period has been published.'.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments:

No. 34, in page 105, line 6, leave out '12' and insert '6'.

No. 35, in page 105, line 27,after 'liabilities', insert—

'(ia) the likelihood of an insolvency event occurring in relation to the employer in relation to a scheme,'.

No. 36, in page 105, line 33, leave out paragraph (a).

No. 37, in page 107, line 10, leave out '50%' and insert '75%'.

No. 38, in page 107, line 43, at end insert

'save that in the first year, the levy ceiling will be no higher than £600 million'.

No. 39, in page 109, line 31, leave out from 'means' to end of line 33 and insert

'a period of time no longer than two years after the initial period begins.'.

No. 40, in page 109, line 41,at end insert—

'( ) The trustees or managers of the scheme may charge a sum at least equivalent to the non-risked based amount of the levy to all scheme members.'.

Mr. Waterson: I shall be fairly brief as the amendments, almost without exception, echo equally important amendments that we moved in Committee—much good it did us then. They have to do with the nature of the levies, and especially the initial levy. The Government are moving, slowly, to a risk-based levy—and I shall say more about that on Third Reading—but they are opting for a flat-rate levy in the initial stages.

The amendments probe the matter from different directions. Amendment No. 33 would delay the start of the levy until the risk base had been established. Amendment No. 34 stipulates a shorter period for the initial levy. Amendments Nos. 35 and 36 deal with expanding the basis of the risk in the risk-based levy, and would give higher priority to the likelihood of an insolvency event relating to the sponsoring employer of a pension scheme.

Amendment No. 37 provides that the risk-based element of the levy, when it is finally sorted out, should be at least 75 per cent., rather than the 50 per cent. set out in the Bill. I think that the Minister said in Committee that that was Government's intention, but that he did not want to be tied down to it. We still think that it would be worth while to make it clear that far and away the greater proportion of the levy would be risk based.

Amendment No. 38 would place a cap on the initial levy of £600 million a year. Amendment No. 39 calls for a shorter period for the introduction of the risk-based levy. Its merits are fairly clear, and we debated the matter at length in Committee.

Amendment No. 40 raises the difficult issue of whether a sponsored scheme can pass on some or part of the levy to the members of that scheme. When we tabled the amendment in Committee, the Minister gave various reasons why it would not work, including that it would be difficult to administer. I understand that some schemes would face practical difficulties in finding the people to invoice. The Minister said that it could "result in a reduction in the level of income for current pensioner members".—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 1 April 2004; c. 597.]

He also thought that it might be unfair. I raised at length the situation of some companies that, for historical reasons, are now relatively small but have large numbers of pension members in their scheme. For example, Marconi, which has written to me on the issue, has 3,327 active members and 69,000 deferred and pension members, which is a ratio of more than 20:1. For a company like that, the levy will be a significant chunk off the bottom line.

In the debate, I also referred the Minister to the regulatory impact assessment on the Bill, which suggested—in the impenetrable language in which RIAs tend to be written—that it was envisaged that schemes would be able to pass on some or all of the levy to their members. However, the Minister was adamant that that was not the case. Imagine my surprise to read an answer given by Baroness Hollis in the other place in which she said that "the requirement to pay the levy will fall on the trustees of the scheme, who will be left to judge how the levy charge could then be shared as they see fit among employers and employees as one of the overall pension costs."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 4 May 2004; Vol. 660, c. WA101.]

Obviously the Government were in "being nice to business" mode on that particular day. She also talked of minimising the burden on schemes. My question is: who was right—the Minister in Committee or Baroness Hollis?

Mr. Webb: This is an important group of amendments, because the basis of the PPF levy is central to the nature of the scheme. I know that my noble Friends in the other place attach great importance to the PPF being a genuine insurance scheme, and therefore think that the levy should be a risk-based levy, preferably in its entirety and from day one. I therefore have much sympathy with some of the amendments in the group, especially amendment No. 37, which would raise the proportion of the levy that would be risk based.

The worry about amendment No. 33 is that there might be a delay in getting the scheme going. I think that I understand the effect the amendment would have, but if I misrepresent it I hope that the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) will correct me. His point is that a risk-based levy would need some tough arithmetic, some data gathering and some research—in other words, it would not be easy to implement and industry should be warned about that—and all that would need to be done before the initial levy was introduced. I am beginning to think that "half-baked" was a generous assessment of the Bill, but I shall return to that point on Third Reading. We certainly want to start providing the assistance as soon as possible, especially given the meagre level of benefits provided by the financial assistance scheme introduced yesterday. Any delay in the introduction of the full PPF could mean that some pensioners get not the 90 per cent. payable under the PPF but the lower rate payable—perhaps 65 per cent.—under the financial assistance scheme. Therefore, timing matters. Amendment No. 33 might introduce delay and that would be a worry. Any significant delay would be a cause of anxiety, especially to members of pension schemes whose companies were not financially strong.

Amendment No. 34 is in the same spirit and would shorten the period over which the initial non-risk-based levy would apply from 12 months to six. My concern is the practicality of changing the rate of the levy half way through a financial year. It could be done, but it would not assist firms in their financial planning. It would perhaps be better to do away with the concept of an initial levy and introduce the full scheme as quickly as possible.

2.15 pm

I support amendment No. 35. The risk-based levy has to be based on the underfunding in the fund, but that is all that it must include. The Bill says that it may also include insolvency risk and other risks, but that is not a requirement. What is the basis for a claim on the PPF? The first requirement will be an insolvency event, so it is bizarre that the PPF will not be required to base the risk-based levy on the risk of the very event that would trigger a claim. It is like providing car insurance without assessing the risk of the insured person having a crash. It is right to take account of insolvency risk, and amendment No. 35 would achieve that.

Another factor that should be included is size of firm. The Bill does not require the risk-based premium to take any account of the size of the firm, and that seems strange. Can the Minister advise the House of why that does not appear as a consideration? The risk of insolvency should be included from day one, and the only objection I can think of to that is how one would measure it. It is one thing to examine a large, blue chip FTSE-100 company and look at its credit rating and accounts, and reach a judgment. A lot of information is available about such firms, but in the case of a small firm with a one or two-member scheme, such as Wiggins Widgets—a mythical firm that I have used as an example in these debates—the finances would not be well known, and it would be difficult for the PPF to assess its insolvency risk.

If we were to accept amendment No. 35, it would not require the PPF board to perform an insolvency risk assessment of every employer—there are some 100,000. The PPF board would simply say that it would take account of insolvency risk as far as it was able to measure, without having to go to silly lengths for very small firms that would not have a credit rating or other information that could be used. I hope that the Minister will confirm that interpretation; if so, I certainly agree with the spirit of amendment No. 35, Amendment No. 37 provides that the minimum risk-based levy should be 75 per cent., rather than the 50 per cent. that is assumed. I recall in Committee that the Government suggested that that was the sort of number they were thinking of.

Do we leave the PPF board the flexibility to ignore the Government? After all, the Minister told us constantly in Committee that he wants the PPF to be at arm's length from the Department. It would thus have the flexibility not to go above 50 per cent. even though the Government want 75 per cent.

That is rather odd. Surely, Parliament should be giving a clear steer to arm's length organisations whose actions have implications for the economy, the health of business and the funding of pension schemes. It is not good enough for the Minister to say that the PPF board can make up its own mind; the House should give it a stronger steer. A risk-based levy of 75 per cent. might not be enough; perhaps the figure should be 100 per cent.

A recent example shows why a large risk-based element is important—I think the hon. Member for Eastbourne hinted at it when he raised the Marconi case. What about schemes where a large number of members have very small pensions? Because the premium is based partly on membership and not solely on risk, there might be a temptation to get such people to leave the scheme. If the levy is not wholly risk based, there could be behavioural consequences. Has the Minister given any thought to the consequences of a membership-based levy?

In a large pension scheme, a "legacy" could have built up of former workers, many of whom have only small entitlements—for example, because they worked for the company a long time ago, before indexation rules and when salaries were low. If the levy is not fully risk based, the employer has an incentive to get rid of people with very small pension rights. The firm will realise that it is incurring a membership-based liability for each such person, and the danger is that they could be offered a buy-out, such as a defined contribution asset—something that was actuarially equivalent at the time, but that would give them less security in the future. Scheme members would need advice about whether to accept such an offer. After consulting people who run pension funds, I understand that that could happen, so it is a serious, practical point and I hope that the Minister will give me a response.

The point might not be important if only a few people were likely to be affected, but there must be many large schemes with many members with fairly small pensions, so unless we accept the amendment and, indeed, go further and make the levy entirely risk based, we shall have to pay money for every person in the scheme for every year that they are in the scheme until they reach pension age, which would cost a lot of money. Of course, it would also cost money to get rid of those people by giving them cash equivalents. I shall not labour the point, but will the Minister tell us whether the Department has thought through the possible effects of a membership-based levy over a long period?

We should like the 50 per cent. to be increased. Parliament should give a strong steer to the PPF board. My noble Friends in another place attach great importance to the issue and they want the Government to consider it in the later stages of the Bill.

Amendment No. 38 would put a £600 million cap on the levy in the first year of the PPF. Although the figure seems rather arbitrary, one can see the point that is being made. As the figure relates only to the first year, it would not need uprating. However, I understood that in the first year the levy would raise only about £300 million, or even less, so I am puzzled by the cautiousness of the cap. As the Minister pointed out earlier, the PPF will not be paying out anything in the first year; no schemes will yet have gone into it so no liabilities will have been incurred. As there will be no pensions in payment, there are unlikely to be any nasty shocks in year one.

Amendment No. 39 relates to our earlier arguments about the transitional period. I accept that these are probing amendments so I shall not be unduly critical, but amendment No. 39 would allow a two-year transition, while under other Conservative amendments either the scheme would not start until there was a risk-based levy or there would be a six-month transition period. If the Conservatives were actually in government, which permutation would they choose? Do they have a view on which of their amendments they support? I suspect not. However, as they have done the House a service by tabling amendments on these important issues, it would be unfair to criticise them for the fact that all the provisions are mutually inconsistent.

Amendment No. 40 deals with passing on the levy to scheme members, but I am not sure why we need such provision. Surely, an employer running a scheme who has to pay a levy to the PPF can do what they like. They can make the extra payment and negotiate with their employees, so there is no need for a statutory basis for passing on the levy. Whether employers pass on the levy will depend on the relative negotiating strength of the parties involved.

I should not want employers to be able to wave a big stick and say, "Look, we've got a statutory power and we can force you to pay the money". I should prefer things to be on a negotiated basis. Pensions are a key industrial relations issue. Only today, we read that the rail unions are talking about taking strike action over pensions, so anything that would make the pensions negotiating climate more adversarial—as the amendment would do—would be regrettable.

Many of the amendments raise important points. I welcome those that would not delay the scheme but would introduce the risk-based premium earlier and at greater length. However, some of them are probably unnecessary.

Malcolm Wicks: Clauses 157 and 164 set out the provisions relating to the initial levy and the pension protection levies. The amendments are aimed at amending the structure of the current provisions and altering the factors that the PPF board may take into account when setting future pension protection levy rates and structures. For clarity, I will deal with each clause in turn setting out the proposed amendments relating to it.

Clause 157 provides for the Secretary of State to set the initial levy rate and structure, with the approval of the Treasury. The initial period is needed in order to get the PPF up and running. That is because the information required to set in place a risk-based pension protection levy from the outset is not available. Amendment No. 33 would prevent the setting up of the PPF until it is in a position to establish the basis for the risk-based pension protection levy.

The amendment could have several implications. The setting up of the PPF could be postponed, which in turn would delay the vital protection for scheme members the PPF will provide; it could require the PPF board to set in place a risk-based levy structure based on incomplete information; or it could require employers to conduct an out-of-cycle PPF-style valuation, placing additional financial burdens on sponsoring employers. Alternatively, it could result in no levy being collected in the initial period, which could have financial implications for the PPF in future. It is not clear to me which of those intentions lies behind amendment No. 33.

2.30 pm

Amendment No. 34 would reduce the length of time that the initial period could be extended from 12 to six months. If we put in place a provision that can increase the period of the initial levy to more than 12 months, we have built in a contingency. Restricting that flexibility may impact on the setting of the pension protection levies in the year that follows the initial period, because, as a result of that restriction, the board may need to implement a further, simplified levy structure for the whole year following the initial levy. In addition, allowing the initial levy to apply for a period other than one that coincides with the end of a financial year would have implications on the setting of future pension protection levies, because the pension protection levies that immediately follow the initial levy operate in respect of financial years.

Clause 158 sets out the provisions that relate to the pension protection levies, including the factors that the board can take into account when calculating those levies. Amendment No. 35 would require the board to take account of the likelihood of an insolvency event occurring in relation to a scheme when it sets the risk-based pension protection levy. Amendment No. 36, if taken in isolation, would result in the board being unable to take account of the likelihood of an insolvency event occurring in relation to a scheme. However, we have assumed that that amendment was proposed in conjunction with and to complement amendment No. 35.

When setting the risk-based pension protection levy, the PPF board will be required to take account of the level of funding within a scheme, because we consider that underfunding is the most critical factor in determining whether a scheme may require PPF assistance. However, we recognise the importance of other risk factors, such as insolvency risk or investment strategy risk, when setting the pension protection levies, but it will be for the PPF board to determine if and how those other risks can be used. Officials in my Department are continuing to work with industry representatives to establish the most appropriate options available to the board in taking account of insolvency risk.

Mr. Webb: The Minister is generous in giving way. I have never heard him put it quite as starkly before that the Department considers that the underfunding level is the critical thing and that everything else is in a sense second order. That certainly mirrors the Bill's structure. However, for example, let us compare BT, which, on certain measures, has a socking great deficit but practically no chance of making a claim on the fund, with another scheme with a fairly small deficit but a really shaky company. It is the second company that will make a claim on the PPF, so why is the insolvency risk deemed to be second order?

Malcolm Wicks: I will not mention any company, but where a company is perfectly solid and judged by the board on different criteria, probably not just one, to be very solid—to use that non-technical description—it will do well out of the risk-based levy, so there should be no concern.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): Is not a possible danger of incorporating an insolvency risk into the levy that the PPF itself would participate in disseminating commercial information that could damage the business concerned in the markets?

Malcolm Wicks: A key point is that the levy can influence the behaviour of scheme sponsors to ensure adequate funding. The PPF must try to do that in many respects. The other risk factors are obviously desirable in relation to the one that I mention, and we assume that the PPF will include them in the levy's structure. However, it would be wholly desirable if the fact that such information becomes public—I guess that it will in a sense—encourages a scheme to fund itself properly.

Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South) (Lab): It is obviously important that companies are not jeopardised because a levy is placed on them. Will my hon. Friend clarify the situation? Under the Bill, the PPF has to be mindful of the financial position, but it does not have to take that totally into account. Would it not be better if the PPF had to take account of a company's financial problems in a more structured way before it levied that company?

Malcolm Wicks: In those circumstances, the importance of the regulator will come into play. As my hon. Friend knows, as well as I do, from his service on the Standing Committee, we very much need to consider the PPF in tandem with the new regulator. The regulator's task is to act early where signs of risk arise and to try to ensure, using a range of powers from the relatively soft to the very tough, that company pension schemes come up to scratch. Obviously, in an ideal world, we would want as few companies as possible to pay the risk-based levy because we do not want too much risk to be placed on the PPF. If that came about, the levy for all companies could be relatively low, but that is probably an aspiration for the longer-term future.

Clause 160 sets out the provisions that relate to the amounts to be raised by the pension protection levies and the parameters within which the board may operate. Amendment No. 37 would require the PPF board to estimate that it would collect at least 75 per cent. of the pension protection levies via the risk-based levy. That would have an impact upon the PPF board's flexibility when setting and determining future pension protection levy rates and structures.

We consider that the Bill will restrict the PPF board adequately, while ensuring that the board has the freedom, flexibility and independence to set the most appropriate pension protection levy rates and structures in the future. However, we share with hon. Members a desire that the great majority of the levy in the transition period will be based on risk factors. As guidance to colleagues, we consider, after consulting stakeholders and other relevant bodies, that an appropriate split would be—this is a guideline—about 80:20 in favour of risk factors; but there will be flexibility and that will be a decision for the board, not for Ministers.

Mr. Webb: I shall endeavour not to intervene on the Minister again in the debate on this group of amendments, but I must have failed to make my point about what counts as risk, because the Minister's response was completely wrong. If the risk-based premium is based only on underfunding, a scheme such as BT's—a big, solid company but temporarily with a big deficit—will pay a socking great premium. He said that a solid company need have nothing to fear from a risk-based premium, but the Bill will allow the premium to be based only on underfunding risk, so such a company would be very heavily penalised.

Malcolm Wicks: I will not talk about any company in particular. When I used the word "solid", I was not talking about any company, whether solid or a bit soggy. Of course, while underfunding is absolutely crucial, other factors can be taken into account by the board. That comes back to the discussion that the hon. Gentleman hinted at earlier, but we think it important that the new PPF is at considerable arm's length from the Government. Obviously, we are accountable ultimately to the House, through the Secretary of State, but we are establishing a board that will have much expertise. People willing to serve on the board should have the appropriate flexibility, and new members of the board will want to read the reports of the considerations of the House on such matters.

Clause 161 sets out the provisions that relate to the levy ceiling in connection with the pension protection levies. The levy ceiling will be set by the Secretary of State, with the approval of the Treasury, and will restrict the PPF board from increasing the pension protection levies beyond a set amount. Under amendment No. 38, the Bill would set the levy ceiling at no more than £600 million for the first financial year following the initial period. The amendment would not have the desired effect, for the reasons that I shall now set out.

During the transitional period and the first year thereafter, provisions have been put in place to lower the levy ceiling. That is to restrict the board when setting pension protection levies during the transitional period, when the 25 per cent. yearly increase rule does not apply. The levy ceiling is therefore likely to be significantly lower in the first year after the initial period than the £600 million suggested in the amendment. In addition, it would be unusual to state a figure such as the levy ceiling in primary legislation, especially given that the Secretary of State will be required to make an order every year specifying the amount of the levy ceiling and that the Bill already provides for further provisions to modify the levy ceiling. We are confident that the provisions that we have put in place for the setting of the levy ceiling and future pension protection levies are both appropriate and sufficient. It is important to balance the needs for the PPF board to have the necessary flexibility and for the costs relating to the pension protection levies to be managed effectively.

Clause 163 sets out the provisions relating to the pension protection levies during the transitional period. The transitional period is needed because some of the information that we need to set up a risk-based pension protection levy from the outset is not available. The transitional period will allow the board to take a balanced approach to determine what information it has available and what information is necessary to implement the risk-based approach effectively. Amendment No. 39 would restrict the transitional period to two years and would have implications for the setting of future pension protection levies, because the information that the board needs to implement a risk-based pension protection levy will not be fully available from the outset. The amendment could therefore result in the board being required by the provisions of the Bill to implement a very simplified or inaccurate risk-based approach based on incomplete or out-of-date data. Alternatively, if the board decided that it needed to base its decisions on more complete information, additional financial burdens could be placed on employers, which would have to provide an out-of-cycle valuation because the board would need a completed PPF-style valuation to be able to determine accurately comprehensive risk-based pension protection levies.

The calculation, collection and recovery provisions relating to the initial levy and the pension protection levies are contained in clause 164. Amendment No. 40 would amend the clause by providing scheme trustees and managers with the power to recoup from all scheme members, whether active, pensioner or deferred members, the cost of at least the scheme factors element of the initial levy and the pension protection levies. Although we understand the intention behind the amendment, we must consider the implications. It could, for example, result in a reduction in the income of current pensioner members, or have an impact on future pension entitlements where there is no current pension in payment. Alternatively, it could allow pension scheme trustees and managers to invoice active and deferred members directly to request a contribution in respect of the pension protection levies. I am not sure that the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) wants that, and there would be a practical problem with doing so, as many schemes do not have up-to-date contact details for many deferred members. In addition, the amendment does not set a limit on the amount that can be recovered from the scheme member. Giving scheme trustees or managers such a power could result in members paying towards the risk-based element of the pension protection levies, which would be unfair because scheme members cannot influence how the scheme invests its funds or its financial state.

Because of the various implications that the proposed amendments have for the setting of the initial levy and the pension protection levy, I urge that they be withdrawn. At present, schemes would be allowed to draw the costs of the levy from current members, but that would involve a higher contribution. The scheme can make that judgment if it wishes to. However, such flexibility is altogether different from allowing via the Bill a levy to be imposed in such a way on deferred or retired members of a scheme.

2.45 pm

The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) presented another scenario, his argument being essentially that the company or pension scheme might try to shift members away from the scheme by giving them a transfer value—getting rid of them simply to avoid paying the levy. I think that that is a little far-fetched. The new full buy-out procedure for solvent employers means that no company could do that on the cheap. It would have to buy out fully the pension rights of the individuals' concerned, and, no doubt, incur many administrative and other costs in trying to do so. In addition, as we drive up standards of pensions literacy and as the trade unions continue to become more involved in pension issues, that scenario becomes even less likely to arise. None the less, we shall reflect on it.

I hope that in view of my assurances—perhaps explanations is a better word—the hon. Member for Eastbourne will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Waterson: I am grateful to the Minister for his full explanations and for his confirmation that, in certain circumstances, schemes can recover some of the levy from active members. On that basis, I am happy to beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 165

CASES WHERE FRAUD COMPENSATION PAYMENTS CAN BE MADE

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Chris Pond): I beg to move amendment No. 120, in page 110, line 27, after 'not' insert

'a prescribed scheme or a scheme'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendment No. 122.

Mr. Pond: The amendments are technical, but important none the less. They amend clauses 165 and 172 to mirror the arrangements set out in clause 113, which is about eligible schemes. They enable certain schemes to be excluded from wider PPF coverage. Together, the clauses make it possible to exclude named—I emphasise, named—occupational schemes and general types of scheme from the pension protection fund and fraud compensation umbrellas. In other words, a more selective approach to exclusion will be possible. Although it is possible to exclude from compensation coverage schemes with fewer than two members, or ones that offer only death benefits, the clauses will now allow the exclusion of named schemes that are not considered to be suitable for PPF and fraud compensation coverage—typically, defined benefit schemes that will always be able to meet their liabilities to members due to credible guarantees provided by the employer. It would be wrong to include such schemes within the PPF and fraud compensation umbrellas, and unfair to require them to pay levies.

Kevin Brennan: Will my hon. Friend explain the difference between a prescribed scheme and a scheme of a prescribed description? The amendments appear to draw a distinction between the two.

Mr. Pond: That is one of the reasons why, although technical, the amendments are very important. I am not sure that the House wants me to delay our business by dealing with that specific point now—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh, go on."] Perhaps if I meet my hon. Friend in the Tea Room after the debate, we can discuss the matter at some length, or I could set it out in writing, if that is acceptable to him. Perhaps he would prefer—[Interruption.] Oh, let us deal with it now, shall we? [Laughter.]

People will know that a prescribed scheme is, of course, a named scheme—I thought that that was obvious from what I said—whereas a scheme of a prescribed description could be a type of scheme. I hope that that clarifies the matter, but I shall happily go further in the Tea Room.

Mr. Webb: I shall not ask the Minister to go any further. However, to be serious, scheme members want their scheme to be protected against fraud. The Minister appears to be saying that a named scheme may be deemed not to be covered by fraud protection, because "credible guarantees" have been given by the sponsoring employer. However, credible assurances can be subject to fraud if someone reneges on them. Does that undermine the anti-fraud protection that the Bill is trying to provide?

Mr. Pond: No, I do not think that it does. I take these things particularly seriously because I am the Government's anti-fraud Minister. I am not, as some people have unkindly suggested, the Minister for fraud and error, both of which I am against. The measures are important, because they apply to schemes that are unlikely to require fraud compensation, as they have other forms of protection built into them. Later clauses deal with schemes with a partial Crown guarantee that are exempt from fraud and other levies as they have other back-up. For that reason, we do not expect there to be any circumstances in which the schemes would be vulnerable to fraud.

Schemes should have a collective responsibility to help to protect members from the loss of benefits resulting from fraud, which is why the Pensions Compensation Board currently imposes a levy on all schemes. It is reasonable, however, to spread the burden of the levy as widely as possible to minimise the impact. We expect the levy to be applied occasionally, as and when fraud compensation is needed.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): On the issue of fairness and compensation, is my hon. Friend satisfied that it is reasonable to demand that schemes that have already been subject to fraud should continue to pay the levy?

Mr. Pond: My hon. Friend makes a fair point, which we have considered carefully. We envisage that the levy will be applied only occasionally, and in the seven years since the Pensions Compensation Board was created only four cases of fraud have been discovered and less than £600,000 has been paid out in compensation. We need to make sure both that the levy is applied proportionately and that it provides appropriate protection against fraud. By exempting certain schemes we can build in that proportionality and protection.

Mr. Webb: There is still a slight loophole, and I should be grateful if the Minister could reassure me that it will be closed. In an intervention, I asked about the type of schemes that will be exempt from the fraud component of the PPF levy. As a quid pro quo, scheme members would be exempt from payouts for fraud. As I suggested, we do not want scheme members to become vulnerable if everything looks kosher if I might use that phrase—I probably cannot, so I shall say if everything looks fine—but a few years later, perhaps after a personnel change in which a dishonest person is appointed, there is fraud. The Minister mentioned Crown guarantees, and we would all accept that in such cases there is no reason why there should be a levy to cover a fraud levy because that eventuality is covered anyway. However, his phraseology made me think that that was a specific instance, not an exhaustive list. There are other cases in which, to use his phrase, the employer gives "credible guarantees", only for the scheme to be taken over by a less reliable employer.

Once we say that schemes fall outside the scope of the anti-fraud measures we are at the top of a slippery slope. I should therefore be grateful for a little more reassurance. The amendments make provision, as we heard in the intervention of the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan), for prescribed or named schemes. Can the Minister tell us about the scope of the provision? Will the PPF prescribe the schemes, or will that be done by statutory instrument? Prescription is usually done through regulation, so I would be grateful for clarification. Will the PPF have a delegated power to prescribe schemes, or will that be done by Parliament? I would not be confident about prescribing schemes, but my key concern is that there may be a gaping hole. Is there a long list of schemes that do not get fraud protection? In future, will workers look at the seemingly technical amendments that were agreed in the House and say, "No, it should not have done so, because they drive a coach and horse through the fraud protection that everyone wants"? Or is it a matter of nit-picking, and it will be only the odd scheme that falls outside the scope of the pension fraud protection scheme? I should therefore be grateful for a little more reassurance on the record about the scope of the measures, as I am worried that we are opening up a bigger void. I am sure that that is not the intention, but I would like to register my concern. That is not so that I can say "I told you so" in 10 years' time, but so that our constituents never experience those unfortunate circumstances.

Mr. Pond: The hon. Gentleman is right to express his concerns, so that reassurances can be given on the Floor of the House and are on the record. We have been careful not to allow the gaping holes that he mentioned to appear in the safety net or even tiny chinks of light. The schemes that we are debating are guaranteed, so scheme members cannot lose out. The hon. Gentleman asked for an example—the Chatsworth House settlement scheme is a unique scheme that provides a guarantee. We cannot legislate in general terms to exempt such schemes, but it would be unfair to include them in the levy. By definition, they already offer a guarantee to their members. We must therefore make provision for named schemes. When I was introducing the amendments, I emphasised the need for the schemes to be listed by name.

Mr. Webb: The Minister raised the distinction between named schemes and a prescribed category. Would it not be simpler to describe a category of schemes, such as those with Crown guarantee, so that we do not need separate prescriptions or regulations? Either the House would have to consider such regulations, or the PPF would have to proceed case by case. That echoes the points that I made yesterday about adopting a set of principles that apply to every case rather than having to predict in advance everything that might crop up and deal with it. Could there not have been a more general approach to the issue?

Mr. Pond: Later clauses, as I said, deal with schemes covered by partial Crown guarantee that, as a category, will be exempt. In that case, we can use a category, but in this case, we need to name individual schemes and adopt a much more targeted approach, to make sure that we do not allow unfairness to slip into the overall process.

Kevin Brennan: My hon. Friend named a particular scheme that was guaranteed. Is it a guarantee against fraud or a guarantee that pensions will be paid? Surely, every scheme is guaranteed against fraud, which is an illegal act.

David Cairns (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab): The law is the guarantee against fraud.

Mr. Pond: As my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (David Cairns) said, the law should be a guarantee against fraud. The fraud compensation scheme was set up, because, although the effort to prevent fraud in the first place offers a guarantee, once fraud has been committed, resources are not necessarily available for cash compensation. Here we are talking about a guarantee also that the pension will be paid. That is built into the scheme, which I know is the sort of reassurance that my hon. Friend would want.In reply to the hon. Member for Northavon, I should say that it is the Government, not the PPF, who will prescribe which schemes are to be exempted in this way.

It being Three o'clock, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded to put forthwith the Questions necessary for the disposal of business to be concluded at that hour, pursuant to Order [18 May].

Order for Third Reading read.

3.1 pm

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mr. Andrew Smith): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Bill—and all it brings about—is a landmark in pensions reform. I start by thanking all those who have got us this far: officials who have worked long and hard and still have the other place to look forward to, the Employer Task Force on Pensions, everyone who took part in our extensive consultation, all members of the Standing Committee and all the hon. Members who have taken part in the debate on Report over the past two and a half days. I express particular thanks to my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions, and the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond), for doing a first-rate job in steering the Bill through Committee and Report.

As I said, the Pensions Bill is a landmark Bill. With the amendments and new clauses added in Committee and on Report, it is an even better and more comprehensive Bill than it was on Second Reading. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan) yesterday described it as

"among the most progressive pieces of legislation to pass through this House"—[Official Report, 19 May 2004; Vol. 421, c. 1015.]

It is a vital step forward for security and confidence in pensions. It will transform pensions security by setting up the pension protection fund—a major social reform—to give invaluable reassurance to both members and scheme providers. It will benefit at least 13 million members by giving them the peace of mind they need when they pay into their company scheme, knowing that a fund is in place to pick up the pieces if and when companies go bust.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): Can the Secretary of State estimate how long the £400 million fund will last?

Mr. Smith: As was extensively debated yesterday, we have set the figure of £400 million on the basis that through the scheme, we will be able to provide significant help to those who have lost out. It is £400 million over 20 years. It is our judgment of the amount that is necessary to provide that help. I shall have more to say about that later in my speech.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): Can the Secretary of State clarify that? How much does he expect that to be worth to each individual pensioner on a weekly or monthly basis? What are the minimum and the maximum that he is using in his calculations?

Mr. Smith: Obviously, that will depend on a number of factors. It will depend on any additional industry contribution that is made, on the number of applications to the scheme, on the balance of different sorts of members in the scheme and on the form that the scheme takes—for example, rolling forward assets, and the extent of those assets. It is not possible at this stage to make the calculation that the hon. Gentleman requests. It will depend on those factors as the scheme is put together, as we set out yesterday, in consultation with expert groups and all stakeholders.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Further to the previous question, can my right hon. Friend confirm that the valuable and much welcomed assistance that will be given will be skewed towards older members of former pension funds, who have less time to prepare for their retirement and to compensate for the losses they have incurred?

Mr. Smith: I recognise the force of my hon. Friend's point, but I will not be drawn into sketching out outlines of the details of the scheme before the consultations with stakeholders and expert groups. These are matters to be determined. We are all mindful of the particular plight of those who paid into schemes for a long time, who are older and nearing retirement, and who have lost so much.

Gregory Barker: I am grateful for the Secretary of State's patience. If he is saying that he has done no calculations at all and has no idea how much the help will mean for individual pensioners, how can he assert that the figure is the right amount? Has it just been plucked out of the air? There must be some arithmetical basis for alighting on that specific figure; otherwise, it is pulled out of a hat.

Mr. Smith: I have already explained the basis on which we made our judgment. As we set out yesterday, before the end of June we will present a report to the House which will provide further details on the basis of the work that we have done.

Let me explain candidly to the hon. Gentleman and to the House why it would be sheer folly and would risk being misleading for me to give an estimate based on the information that I currently have. If I did that, it would be taken as a percentage guarantee. However I might seek to qualify and condition it, that is how it would be taken by many people. I have been concerned throughout to be absolutely straight with people. I would not want some idea of a level of guarantee to take root before and until we knew details of the sort I have enumerated, which must be the ultimate means of determining the level of payouts.

Mr. Waterson: The point that my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) was trying to make, I think, is that the Secretary of State has already decided what the end-point is: £400 million. He is rather like a restaurateur who says, "Here is the menu with a range of possible options, but you're not allowed to spend more than X pounds in the course of the evening." That is the reality.

Mr. Smith: The reality is that £400 million is a very substantial contribution indeed. The reason the Government are able to maintain economic stability, growth and fiscal prudence is that there are not blank cheques flying around out there. We are making £400 million available. As I said, that sum is based on our judgment not only of what is affordable, but of what will provide significant help to those who have lost out—

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Smith: I intended to deal with these matters later in my speech. If I may make a little more progress, I shall be happy to take further interventions later.

It is important that we recognise the step forward that the Bill represents in placing a proactive and tough pensions regulator in place, helping to ensure that tragedies of the sort that we have witnessed do not happen in future. The pensions regulator will have the powers needed to step in and tackle fraud and maladministration. As the House knows, the Bill represents a step forward in many other respects. It extends TUPE so that workers no longer lose all their pension rights just because their firm is taken over. It will ensure consultation before schemes are changed, which is long overdue.

Provisions in the Bill will put an end to the practice of requiring scheme members to purchase an annuity with small pension pots. That is called trivial commutation, but it is not a trivial matter for those affected. Measures in the Bill will more than double the limit, so that people can take all their pension as a lump sum up to £15,000. That will help thousands of people each year.

The Bill will also provide security for a more mobile work force by enabling people in short-stay jobs for the first time to take the full pension that they have built up with them to another scheme. Both of those measures will particularly affect women, and I am sure that the House welcomes our commitment, which was suggested by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird), whom I am pleased to see in her place, to publish a report on women and pensions next year.

Alongside greater protection, it is essential that we take action to make it easier for employers to run schemes. We have taken a hard-headed look at whether pensions legislation is well targeted, proportionate and effective. The Bill will remove the barriers of the old section 67 provisions and free firms to recast benefits to suit them best.

On indexation, it was clear to me that regulation had become disproportionate. We were effectively forcing everybody providing a pension to buy a high level of inflation insurance, which was becoming so expensive that some providers were choosing to pull out of pension provision altogether. We have not ducked tough choices to keep pension provision affordable, and I have no doubt that the person in the street would sooner have a bit less inflation protection and a lot more confidence that they will get their pension in retirement.

The Bill will also drive forward a range of simplification measures to streamline the requirements on member-nominated trustees, dispute resolution procedures and reporting arrangements, particularly in relation to late payments, and remove the requirement for schemes to provide additional voluntary contributions. We are also replacing the one-size-fits-all approach of the minimum funding requirement with funding arrangements that will allow schemes to adopt funding strategies suited to their particular circumstances.

We are determined to put people in control of planning for their retirement. The Bill makes possible huge steps forward in retirement planning, with better information on pension options and workplace advice, and it provides for the development of the retirement planner. The roll-out of both combined pension forecasts and individual state forecasts, of which there will be about 15 million by 2006, will enable people to make better informed choices for their retirement. The Bill will also open up new choices for retirement, by giving a worthwhile return to those who defer taking their state pension. For the first time, lump sums will no longer be the preserve of those with good occupational pensions. The Pensions Bill is substantial. It will bolster security for scheme members while making things easier, simpler and more flexible for pension providers, and it goes together with other important steps that the Government are taking.

By replacing the current eight taxation regimes with one, we are taking a radical simplification step to support saving. By enabling people to draw down their pension while carrying on in employment, we are eroding the cliff edge between work and retirement. By outlawing age discrimination and opening up training opportunities for older people—the Bill also contains improved pension deferral provisions—we are making it easier for those who choose to do so to carry on working, while keeping the state pensionable age at 65 so that no one is forced to do so. By spending an extra £10 billion each year on pensioners we are tackling pensioner poverty and rewarding those with modest savings.

Taken with all those measures, the Bill is another huge step forward. It will renew the pensions partnership in this country and will deliver real progress on simplicity, security and choice in pensions. What is more, this Bill will bring significant help and boost confidence in pensions, through the pre-PPF scheme we debated yesterday.

We have listened to all those workers, trade unionists and hon. Members who have been to see me and my ministerial colleagues to argue the compelling case for those who have lost pensions through no fault of their own when their firm went bust—such people often lose their job at the same time. I have said throughout that we were examining closely whether something could be done to alleviate their plight. Nobody could fail to be deeply moved by the personal histories of those who were initially compelled as a condition of employment to join their company scheme and were given a pension promise, only to lose it and their job at the same time when their company went bust.

I pay tribute to the campaigners, their trade unions and all those hon. Members who have put their cases in an energetic and constructive way. They have truly done justice to their cause.

Mr. Webb: Among those campaigners, whom the right hon. Gentleman rightly praises, are many workers who have lost their company pension rights but whose employers are solvent. When they heard Friday's announcement, they hoped that they were to obtain justice. Yesterday, the Minister for Pensions said that if the employer is solvent it is the employer's problem, but that is not the case in law. Those people have lost out and have no redress. How many of the 60,000 people—the Secretary of State said in the House that 60,000 is about the right number—were employed by solvent employers and will get nothing from the scheme?

Mr. Smith: We have also acted on cases in which employers are solvent. On 11 June, I stated that full buy-out would be required after that date, which not only improved protection for the future but addressed the Maersk workers' cases. The Maersk workers were not covered because their cases predated the statement, but the company came into line with the spirit of the Government's intention, and other companies would be right to do the same.

When we set up the scheme, most of the arguments for it concerned companies that had gone bust, which the scheme is intended to cover.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): Yesterday, the Minister for Pensions gave me heart when he emphasised that the principle of fairness will underlie how the details are drawn up:

"we are not about using technicalities or legalese to define people out of a proper assistance programme."—[Official Report, 19 May 2004; Vol. 421, c. 1034.]

I ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to bear in mind that a number of the pension funds and firms involved have been passed like a parcel from owner to owner, and the precise point at which they are solvent or insolvent is not an exact science. My constituents at Kalamazoo, as well as Cheney, Warwick and Debenholt pensioners, will be looking for that kind of fairness and flexibility.

Mr. Smith: I listened to my hon. Friend carefully and pay tribute to him—I am sure that his constituents also do so—for his energetic representation of the Kalamazoo workers in his constituency, whose case he has put vigorously to Ministers. I am happy to repeat the criteria set out by my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions. The House will have noted carefully that the terms of the amendment were open, with questions of eligibility and periods of coverage yet to be prescribed. Throughout this process, however, I have been careful not to raise false hope, and I will not start now. We will examine the matter carefully, and all stakeholders, including workers and hon. Members, will have an opportunity to feed their views into the process by which we collectively determine how the scheme will operate. As my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions said yesterday, we will pay clear regard to principles of fairness.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): I appreciate that my right hon. Friend has listened to all kinds of organisations on the pensions problem. I welcome the Bill, which I know has its limits. Will he tell us more about the consultation and the criteria that will be used? Does he hope to develop the criteria during the consultation?

Mr. Smith: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend, who has also been to see me more than once in campaigning on behalf of his constituents. We will, of course, take account of representations as we develop the criteria through the consultation process.

Mr. Tynan: I have listened intently to the Minister for Pensions. Many people who have lost their pensions will read with interest yesterday's contributions. It would be a tragedy if individuals were left out of gaining payment in lieu of their lost pensions, which could become a focal point for disquiet. I hope that my right hon. Friend accepts that we must carefully consider all 60,000 people who have lost their pensions.

Mr. Smith: I thank my hon. Friend for his remarks and pay tribute to his service on the Committee. He has made a great contribution. Yes, of course we will look very carefully at that issue in the spirit in which he raises it. I have to say, however, that when the case was being made to me and to the Government that a scheme was required and action was imperative, hon. Members accepted that one of the difficulties was that whatever that action might be, there will always be the problem of where to draw the boundary. Wherever it is drawn, there is a risk that someone, possibly with a case deserving of sympathy, will fall on the wrong side of it. I have gone through this process with my eyes open, as, I hope, have other hon. Members. We look at every case carefully, but we cannot give an unlimited undertaking, whatever the circumstances, to anybody who has been hard done by in terms of the way that their pension has turned out.

As I have said all along, I have been very conscious of the need to look workers in the eye and the need for them to know that I have been straight with them all the way through. We have been straight, and we will continue to be so. Although there is no legal liability and no precedent set, I have been conscious all along that if the Government could do something to help these people, it would be the right thing to do. We have announced £400 million over 20 years to help to address the serious losses that some now face, with encouragement to industry to offer further support. Furthermore, we have set out practical steps, including involving our partners and industry experts in developing the scheme, consulting on draft regulations by the end of November and having the scheme in place by next spring, with payments to follow as soon as practicable thereafter.

David Taylor: My right hon. Friend has told the House on several occasions that later this summer he will provide figures and analyses that show how the scheme might work. Will those figures include the net savings that are anticipated in relation to the means-tested benefits that will not be payable because of the welcome support that the Government are giving?

Mr. Smith: I will carefully examine whether that can be included in the report. I am sure that it will be a consideration that is brought to bear by people who take the figures to make estimates.

I want to be absolutely straight about this. The money will not cover everyone who feels aggrieved, nor will it give to those whom it does help everything that they might want, but it will provide significant help to those who have lost out so badly.

I am proud that a Labour Government are taking action that many said was not possible. I honestly do not think that help on this scale would have been forthcoming under any other Government. The crucial thing is that thousands of people who thought that they had lost their pensions will now receive help. The measures in the Bill, such as the pension protection fund, will give extra protection for the future to more than 13 million members of final salary schemes.

The Bill is a big step forward for security and choice and for confidence in pensions. I commend it to the House.

3.23 pm

Mr. Waterson: This has been a long and hard road for those of us who served on the Standing Committee, which had some 22 sittings—[Interruption.] I see that the tension is getting to the Secretary of State, as well. I thank all hon. Members concerned, who, on the whole, kept their senses of humour—those who had them in the first place, that is. I exclude the Minister from that, of course, although I believe that he is still going to the evening classes.

I thank the officials who desperately tried to assist Ministers in maintaining the pretence that there was some sort of order and organising genius behind the Bill, which at times seemed to acquire a life of its own. I thank all those who advised us—the voices from outside who were able to send us draft amendments, briefings and comments—and all those who would have liked to do so if so much had not happened in a rush at the end of the proceedings.

Without in any sense denigrating the efforts of other members of the Committee, I particularly thank my hon. Friends the Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) and for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) for their sterling efforts. To use a contemporary cinematic expression, they both worked liked Trojans.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): We got defeated.

Mr. Waterson: We did get defeated, although I am afraid that there was no wooden horse, just a lot of wooden jokes.

This is a very large Bill, but it does not give much away. Having spent 22 sittings trying to peer behind the verbiage, enormous amounts of detail still remain for regulations, codes of practice and so on. At times, we seemed almost to have reversed roles, with the Government frantically tabling amendments and new clauses to their own Bill, which the Minister, with his gift for understatement, once memorably described as "work in progress".

I turn first to the part of the Bill that deals with the state retirement pension. Earlier this week, I had the privilege of attending the pensioners' parliament in Blackpool, and a very special event it was. The Minister, having bottled out of turning up, had the temerity to claim that my duties should have kept me in the House. However, as I said to the pensioners' parliament, I am the shadow Pensions Minister, I want to be the Pensions Minister, and if I were the Pensions Minister I would be in Blackpool for that occasion, not in the House of Commons. The Department for Work and Pensions has a large ministerial team, and the Minister could well have made the effort. Once we had pointed out the clash of dates, it was always open to the Government to schedule Report for a different day, but they did not take that opportunity. That shows where their priorities lie.

I should tell the Minister, before I share with him some other thoughts from the pensioners' parliament, that they were deeply unimpressed with the Age-Related Payments Bill, which we have the pleasure of debating in Committee next week—[Interruption.] The Secretary of State is taking on the role played in Committee by the Minister's PPS, the hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (David Cairns), which was to shout abuse from a sedentary position—or perhaps he was saying his rosary; I could not quite make it out.

It will not have escaped people's attention, particularly those in the pensioners' parliament, that the Government have been careful to engineer the situation so that we did not have the opportunity to debate restoring the earnings link for the state retirement pension. That suited the Government down to the ground, because it is definitely not part of their pensions policy. To be fair, it suited the Liberal Democrats, too, because their policy is under review, whatever that means. That is a great shame. We spent a lot of time discussing some highly technical amendments, perhaps to a greater extent than their merits deserved. There will be an opportunity to vote on restoring the earnings link at the next general election.

Let me explain in my consideration of the provisions that deal with the state pension why restoring the earnings link is so important.

Mr. Andrew Smith: If restoring the link is so important, will the hon. Gentleman give a commitment to extending it beyond four years?

Mr. Waterson: It is a bit of a cheek when Ministers make such interventions. I invariably ask them in return when the Government will tell us whether the pension credit will be increased in the next Parliament, should they, by happenstance, be re-elected. When will they give a commitment to increase it in line with either earnings or prices? The answer is currently that they will not, but we might hear more about that in July.

I want to consider means-testing and the importance of the relationship between occupational pensions, which are largely but not entirely the concern of the Pensions Bill, and the state retirement pension. The latter should be a decent and sufficient platform on which people can build provision for their retirement. Under the Government, savings have fallen by roughly half. Is it any wonder given that people, especially young people, read bad news stories almost every day about pensions? In the long-term, that could prove to be the worst part of the pensions crisis that we face.

At the moment, 59 per cent. of pensioners are subject to means-testing. On the Government's projections, that figure will increase to 82 per cent. by the middle of the century. That is an extraordinary figure, which means that we are going entirely in the wrong direction. I shall not embarrass the Minister again by trotting out his views on means-testing when he did not bear the burdens of office.

Malcolm Wicks: Go on.

Mr. Waterson: I shall if the Minister presses me, although we can agree that matters should not progress in the way that I have described in the 21st century. Despite spending some £47 million of taxpayers' money on advertising and publicity for the pension credit, the take-up remains little more than 50 per cent. The Government's working assumption is that 1.4 million of the poorest pensioners will never get around to claiming it.

Mr. Tynan: In the unlikely event of the hon. Gentleman being in government, would he guarantee to pensioners in Hamilton, South that they would not lose any of the money that they currently receive under the pension credit if the Conservatives restored the earnings link to pensions?

Mr. Waterson: I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman's role in Committee. I give him an absolute assurance on the point that he makes. I shall shortly put it in context. He referred to my being in government. Two things have to happen: the Conservative party has to win an election and the new Prime Minister has to recognise my talents. I do not want to be too hypothetical.

Richard Burden: I fully recognise the hon. Gentleman's talents, but the first criterion of the Conservative party convincing the electorate might be more difficult to achieve. Let me revert to the question that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State asked. The hon. Gentleman bases his arguments about means-testing on what will happen in several years' time. Given that the earnings link is not a figure but a formula, why cannot he project beyond four years?

Mr. Waterson: We shall enter the next election campaign on promises that are based on a Parliament. We would hope and intend to continue with the same formula. An amendment that we tabled referred to whichever was higher: earnings or prices, because we do not know what the future holds.

To revert to the subject of means-testing, there has been a collapse in savings.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): The biggest means test is the income tax system. Do Conservative Front Benchers now suggest that that should not be means-tested? Or is means-testing considered good when the Government are taking money from somebody but bad when they are giving people money?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. I remind hon. Members that we are debating the Bill's contents, that many Members are trying to catch my eye and that the debate is time limited. Although interventions are understandable, they take time out of the debate. Those who wish to catch my eye might think twice before they intervene.

Mr. Waterson: On the basis of your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall not rise to the previous intervention. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] All right then, I shall—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would be grateful if the hon. Gentleman did not, because it is definitely outside the terms of the Bill.

Mr. Waterson: Then I will not, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am just too easily provoked.

I should like to pull together the points that I was making on means-testing. It is too complex, too intrusive and too demeaning. The high marginal rates of withdrawal are difficult to defend, and our proposal is to reverse the level of means-testing and restore dignity to pensioners. No pensioner will lose under our proposals, to answer the question of the hon. Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan), and most will gain. For the record, we have no plans to remove the Christmas bonus or the winter fuel payment, and we are not—I repeat, not—scrapping the pension credit. We shall merely let it wither on the vine as the level of the state pension rises. All these proposals have been very carefully costed.

Gregory Barker: Before my hon. Friend leaves the issue of the Government's favourite policy of more and more means-testing, will he tell me whether he shares my surprise that the Bill contains nothing that would make their means-testing policies more effective? The most damning thing that can be said about the Government's means-testing feast is that it is singularly ineffective, because so many people slip out of the system and do not take up the means-tested benefits to which they are entitled. That is why it is wrong, and that is why it must go.

Mr. Waterson: My hon. Friend makes my point better than I did.

One thing that we know about the state retirement pension is that the take-up rate is more or less 100 per cent. Our provisions would therefore be a way of ensuring that every pensioner had a decent state retirement pension and that the poorest pensioners would be helped. It is paradoxical that it is often the very poorest people who do not get around to claiming means-tested benefits such as council tax benefit, for example, despite the sterling efforts of the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond).

There is a significant read-across between that argument and the question of occupational pensions. As the system of means-tested benefits for pensioners becomes ever more complex and confusing, how are pensioners or would-be pensioners to divine whether they are doing the right thing in saving money for their retirement? More than once we have put to Ministers a figure produced for us by independent actuaries showing the amount that an average couple would have to set aside in their lifetime—over and above the equity in their house—to be sure of not being subject to means-testing when they retired. That figure is £180,000. It has been comprehensively rubbished by the Secretary of State and other Ministers, but it is important for the Government to come up with their own figure. It is important not just from the point of view of future pensioners, who have to make a judgment as to whether they are wasting their time saving money for their retirement—that could well be an explanation for the collapse of the savings culture since this Government came to power—but from the point of view of the industry. How is the industry to be aware of whether it is mis-selling products to people if no one knows whether those people will get a net benefit from them?

Nowhere has this argument been better put than in the briefing produced for this debate by Age Concern, which states:

"To tackle pensioner poverty in the long-term, pension policy must be built around a higher and more inclusive basic state pension. This Government must move away from means-testing: it is costly, complex and too many pensioners miss out on their entitlement. Instead of putting money into pensioners' pockets once they are in poverty, the Government must address the causes of that poverty."

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): Can we hear the Conservatives' proposals for making the basic state pension more inclusive, in relation to women in particular?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not think that that is part of the content of the Bill before the House.

Mr. Waterson: I think that the answer is no. In passing, however, may I pay tribute to the sterling efforts of the hon. and learned Lady in raising those issues in Committee? If she has not squeezed an annual report on women's pensions out of the Minister, she can at least expect one report some time next year.

The Bill is riven by the law of unintended consequences. A problem that we faced in Committee was that an awful lot of very important issues came up only at the last minute. One example, to which the Secretary of State has quite reasonably referred, was the section 67 issue. When I first started chatting to people in the industry, when the Bill was merely a twinkle in some parliamentary draftsman's eye, they all said that the most important issue was simplification, because it is clearly easier to shut down a scheme than it is to make a minor amendment to it. Typically, the Government produced amendments or new clauses right at the end of the Committee stage—proposals that ran to pages and pages—in an attempt to simplify that part of the previous legislation.

Another example, which has been highlighted in the business press this week, is to be found in the anti-avoidance measures. Early on, people were saying that in many ways the key to this Bill will be the anti-avoidance provisions, which are sometimes called the moral hazard provisions, although anti-avoidance is more appropriate in this regard. Those are measures to ensure that badly disposed people and companies will not find a way round the provisions. We debated that quite a lot in the latter part of the Committee stage, and earlier on Report. I have no difficulty at all with anti-avoidance provisions: when the House passes a law on whatever subject, it is absolutely right that we try to limit the options for people to get round it. By definition, however, such provisions should be properly consulted on, at length, with some of the very people who might be paid large fees to find a way round the legislation in the first place.

Among the issues that have been raised by Messrs Cameron McKenna, who are highly respected lawyers in this field, are the financial support directions, which we have had precious little opportunity to consider, let alone debate. The regulator may decide that an employer is either a service company or insufficiently resourced, and may be required to make payments to the pension scheme. There are wide-ranging powers to draw in other related people and companies. As Mr. Nigel Moore of Cameron McKenna says:

"These reforms are potentially very wide ranging and implications go beyond simple anti-avoidance activity... For trustees, the financial support provisions are very significant and are likely to lead to trustees seeking support from group companies who are not currently employers under the pension scheme, failing which they could apply to the regulator to issue a financial support direction."

I believe that the Secretary of State has received a letter from the venture capital industry expressing real concerns about whether in future there will be takeovers and so on. I saw his rather blustering response reported in The Times—I am sure that it did not do it justice. The reality, however, is that there may be situations—on the basis of the law of unintended consequences—in which another company that has the potential to take over a struggling company and keep it going, thereby keeping the pension scheme going, will be deterred from doing so by the provisions. That is one of the clear messages in the British Venture Capital Association's comments to the Secretary of State. There are other examples.

Mr. Fallon: What my hon. Friend says applies even more widely. Suppose a company is in difficulty and another wishes to come to its aid, take it over and put funding into it, and neither has a pension fund that is in difficulty. In circumstances where there is a third associated subsidiary company in the group, the directors and investors of the second company will be personally liable if that third company runs into difficulties with its pension fund.

Mr. Waterson: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. Those are the kind of issues that one would have hoped would be hammered out at an early stage, before the Bill was even published. One wonders what the Government have been doing in the past couple of years, as the pensions crisis has mounted.

Let me turn to the question of the assistance package—that seems to be the term that has stuck on both sides of the House—for the 60,000 people who have already lost pension rights. I had the impression towards the end of the Secretary of State's speech that he was throttling back a little on the rhetoric, as he finally alighted on the phrase, "significant help". What that significant help will turn out to be is the real issue that we must address. Understandably, this entire Bill—the good parts and the bad—has from the beginning been overshadowed by the plight of those 60,000 people. We heard some details of that package yesterday, but there is much that remains to be seen. In fairness, the Secretary of State made that clear. One or two hon. Members described the scheme yesterday as a breakthrough, and I hope that it is. There was even a reference to "teutonic plates", which I think was intended to be a reference to tectonic plates. That is of course the sort of term that the Deputy Prime Minister uses as the small change of conversation.

I pay tribute to Members who have represented their constituents so valiantly. It is invidious to single anyone out, but I mention in particular the hon. Members for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan) and for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt) and the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who has a distinguished track record. The trade unions, especially the steel union, have played a significant role. I also pay tribute to the Pensions Action Group—I believe that Mr. Andrew Parr is its doughty webmaster—and various groups such as Kalamazoo whose representatives have been to see many of us over a long period. Then there is the formidable Dr. Ros Altmann, whom we have all come to know as part of the process. Last but by no means least, there is my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), who seems to have been—if I may mix my metaphors—the final catalyst that made the tectonic plates start shifting.

We know from a no less authoritative source than The Times that after Prime Minister's questions a week ago, the Prime Minister stormed out and demanded to know why there had been so little progress on this issue. It seems fairly clear that at one point the DWP was taken out of the loop and the Prime Minister intervened directly with the Chancellor.

Let us be in no doubt that this package is nothing to do with principle; it is all about politics. It is another U-turn, negotiated at the very last minute by a Government who were staring defeat in the House of Commons in the face. A cross-party campaign had been welded together that would have defeated the Government had they not done something. They have done something, but is it enough?

The Secretary of State made a virtue of the fact that many of the details were simply not yet there, and said that new clause 34, which we debated yesterday, was very wide and general. The one detail that is absolutely clear and set in stone is the £400 million figure. The Government seem to have begun with the answer, and are now going to work out how to get there. It is no earthly good their saying that they are gathering data, as the Minister said yesterday. Why did they not start the process ages ago?

I remember that some months ago, at Question Time, Ministers refused a request from the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey for an independent inquiry into the size of the problem. Eventually—and only after pressure from Conservative Members—the Secretary of State adopted the figure of 60,000. The work could and should have been done only by the Government. Why was it left to Dr. Altmann to produce her figures? They may be right and they may be wrong; I am not in a position to judge. Conservative Members simply do not have resources of that kind. But why have the Government so recently signed up to the notion that they should be in the business of finding out the scale of the problem? [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think we have had enough of these continuous sedentary interventions.

Gregory Barker: My hon. Friend has considerably more experience in this place than I have. Can he think of another instance in which a Government of either colour have come up with such a neat, round-figure solution as the £400 million in answer to such an extraordinarily complex and difficult question, without even knowing at the outset what the question is?

Mr. Waterson: My hon. Friend makes the central point. How was it possible to produce a figure without knowing the extent of the problem? The 60,000 figure has been bandied around for some time. It will presumably go up rather than down as other people get into pensions difficulties. But no matter what actuarial tables are used, dividing £400 million by 60,000 over 20 years does not produce a very satisfactory set of figures.

[Mr. Waterson]

That is why we seem to be talking about assistance, not compensation. Even the hon. Member for Cardiff, West yesterday adopted the word "assistance", and the Minister for Pensions, too, has used it. We are talking not about full compensation, or perhaps anything like it, but about something to help the people affected. It will be more than tea and sympathy but less than compensation.

Why are solvent wind-ups not included? That point was made by the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb). I appreciate the Government's formal position, and as a lawyer, I understand why they have to have that kind of ex gratia arrangement. I shall come back to that in a moment. However, once we concede the moral case and decide to go beyond the legalities, how is the moral case of the pensioners who have lost out because of insolvent wind-ups any different in reality from that of those who have lost just as much, or possibly more, in solvent wind-ups? How can we make that distinction?

I mentioned the case in the European Court. It is rather odd, with the Government as the guardian of the taxpayers' interests, that as part of the deal that has been put together at short notice—not in the car park of the Loch Fyne oyster bar, but no doubt somewhere similar—no one thought to make it a term of everyone's signing up to the deal that that court case would be withdrawn. My understanding is that the unions think that they have a good case, and that they expect to win. Might the Government not therefore end up in a situation in which, having put together this package with the best of intentions—although we still have to hear much of the detail—they then find that there is a judgment against them for far more money in the European Court?

Another puzzling loose end to the package is the airy-fairy talk about contributions from industry and the pensions industry—about rattling the begging bowl to them to top up the amount. As the right hon. Member for Birkenhead, who obviously spends more time in the real world than some of the Ministers, said, why should industry do that? What possible argument is there for it to pay out money, particularly when it is gearing up to face the PPF and the levy?

The great unsolved mystery is the question of unclaimed assets. For month after month, Ministers' line and the Treasury line—of course, as I have said before, the DWP is a wholly owned subsidiary of the Treasury—has been that the fact that those assets are not claimed does not necessarily mean that they do not belong to someone. Suddenly, in the small print of the Red Book, those unclaimed assets, which were apparently previously unavailable for this purpose, are available to hand out to charities. That is very curious, and our line, as my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) said yesterday, is that if there is a funding gap beyond the £400 million, that will be the moment to call on the unclaimed assets. Our preference, as the House knows, would be to start with the unclaimed assets from the beginning and to have a parallel fund to the PPF, under the same administration, which would be endowed not with retrospective use of the levy, because we accept the principle on that, but with the unclaimed assets.

That brings me to another curious question: why not entrust the administration of that separate scheme to the PPF itself? It sounds as if the time scale for that will be roughly the same as that for the PPF's coming into force, so why not just use the same people? That might be one option that is being considered, but it would certainly make sense to us.

I shall come in a moment to discuss compensation under the PPF, but one thing that is clear is that whatever compensation the 60,000—or some of them—will get will be significantly less than that which they would have received under the PPF arrangements. As I said, we have had very little detail. We will receive more, to which we look forward, but the Government still have to square the circle on how the £400 million will go round.

Finally—which with politicians generally means that they are roughly halfway through their remarks—I shall deal with the PPF itself, which will be the Bill's long-term legacy. Indeed, it is fair to say that it is the Bill's centrepiece. The Minister said in various speeches on Report that the Government have learned lessons from the American Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, which, I should remind him, has a current deficit well in excess of $11 billion. I have visited the United States to meet people such as Steve Kandarian—as has the Minister—although I need not have bothered, as he came to London to give a lecture only a couple of weeks ago. He has given up the burden of running the PBGC, and the advice that he gave in Washington and in his London lecture was based on the PBGC's 30-year track record. First, one must get things right at the outset; otherwise, the political pressures against making significant changes are too great later on.

Secondly, one must have a proper risk-based levy at the outset. Of course, although the PBGC was set up to deal with the collapse of the Studebaker car company, none of its workers ever received any compensation and it was several years before benefits were paid out. However, we now know—the Minister let the information slip in Committee—that it could be 2009 or 2010 before the full risk-based levy is up and running for all companies. That is extraordinary. It will lead to all the additional problems of moral hazard and to the good subsidising the bad, and it will make nonsense of the early years of the PPF. We have long taken the view that the PPF will be highly vulnerable in its early stages. It is widely believed throughout the industry that its estimated £300 million cost is understated, and there is plenty of anecdotal evidence of schemes waiting to collapse into the welcoming arms of the PPF once it is up and running. Indeed, it could well face some significant claims in its early days.

An interesting side issue is the PPF's investment strategy—

Mr. Andrew Smith: The hon. Gentleman speculates that it will be 2009 before the levy is up and running for all companies, but he is able to arrive at that position only by virtue of the allowances that we have made in respect of triennial valuations. In terms of minimising the very regulatory burdens on business about which he would otherwise be complaining, it makes sense to allow some who have a valuation at the end of the period in question to have a valuation at the time. This is a sensible way to introduce the provision. It minimises the extra cost and regulatory burden on businesses and their schemes.

Mr. Waterson: With respect, the Secretary of State is explaining why we have this delay, rather than whether it is a good thing. [Interruption.] The Minister for Pensions asks what we think, and I shall come to that in a moment. I understand the point about the triennial cycle. In Committee, we suggested a stop-gap approach—I do not expect the Minister to remember; none of us has a memory that good—based on the recommendations of actuaries. As a temporary measure, one could rely on the old minimum funding requirement system. But what is clear is that it will be extremely bad news if the risk-based levy is not up and running by day one, or very close to it.

One of the unanswered questions in Committee was whether the PPF constitutes an insurance scheme or a pension fund. The Minister has memorably said that it is neither, but the answer makes an important difference to its investment strategy. Mr. Kandarian touched on this issue in his lecture, which the Minister unfortunately missed as he had other things to deal with. Of course, before leaving the PBGC, Mr. Kandarian changed its investment strategy in respect of equities and bonds. He likened the situation to a fund being set up to insure owners of Atlantic coast seafront properties against hurricanes and floods, only for the fund itself to invest its assets in such properties. There is a real danger in this regard, and we fail to listen to Mr. Kandarian at our peril.

The central issue is what people out there believe they will receive under the legislation. There is a danger of them running away with the idea that they are being given a full safety net or a full guarantee, whereas the reality is very different. If the Bill is a lifeboat, it is, for several reasons, a leaking lifeboat.

The first is the cap that is built into the Bill. Another is the 90 per cent. rate for people who are not retired, which we debated earlier today and yesterday. Another is indexation and the 1997 cut-off date. Organisations such as Age Concern have expressed concern that some pensioners might receive only 70 or 80 per cent. of what they had expected. There is also the Government's retained power to reduce benefits in what the Minister calls "extreme circumstances". As I said yesterday, extreme circumstances are likely to be when the fund does not have enough money. Finally, there is the Government's unwillingness to stand behind the PPF. For the average punter, the Government's willingness to do so would be the critical factor for establishing confidence in an occupational pension scheme.

Mr. Smith: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that a Conservative Government would stand behind the PPF? He has been telling us all how bad the Bill is, so is he going to repeat Conservative voting on Second Reading by voting against it on Third Reading?

Mr. Waterson: Well, we did not vote against the Bill on Second Reading and I will come on to Third Reading in a moment. [Interruption.] I am not in a position to commit the next Conservative Government to standing behind the PPF, but the Government should not have dismissed that option so lightly. I wonder whether Ministers met the same people and heard the same things as I did when I was in Washington. I did not meet a single person who dissented from the view that, if it came to it, the Federal Government would have to stand behind the PPF.

Our concern is that we want the Bill to work properly because we will have to inherit the problems that are built into it. The Minister for Pensions was right when, in a moment of revealing candour yesterday, he talked about rough justice. That is exactly what we are talking about. Clearly, the Bill does not necessarily provide full compensation—or anything like it.

Will the Bill achieve its central aim, which must be to restore confidence in the pension system? That is the cross-party aspiration. The Association of Consulting Actuaries has conducted a survey of employers since the Bill was published. It found that the majority of firms felt that the measures would decrease occupational pension scheme coverage. Fewer than one in 10 firms felt that the measure would improve pension coverage. About 64 per cent. thought that £15 for the levy per defined benefit scheme member would be too much; and more than three-quarters said that the new knowledge and understanding requirement placed on trustees would deter individuals from wishing to be trustees. Not much encouraging news there.

Only rarely do Governments have the opportunity to amend pensions law. I should know, because I served in Committee on the Pensions Act 1995. Faced with an unprecedented pensions crisis and a halving of savings in this country, the prsent Government have simply not risen to the challenge. They have produced legislation that is confused, complex and bureaucratic. They also failed to tackle the problem of the 60,000 people who have lost pensions—a problem crying out to be dealt with—until they were forced to in a panic through a last-minute assistance scheme. The Government have failed to do a single thing to encourage new defined benefit schemes or to keep existing ones open. Nothing in this flawed Bill will restore public confidence in the pensions system. In short, they have blown it.

We will not vote against the Bill on Third Reading any more than we voted against it on Second Reading. However, we hope that their lordships will improve the measure beyond recognition.

4.4 pm

Mr. Tynan: First, I am grateful for the opportunity to speak today. I was going to make this speech yesterday, but I have managed to hold on to it until today. I was very happy about new clause 34 yesterday, but I am concerned about the nuts and bolts of it. The proposals put before the House yesterday still cause me concern, as I made clear in an intervention earlier.

This is a very serious matter, and the Bill allows us to make real progress on it. Six of my constituents have lost their pensions, as I wanted to put on the record yesterday. Three of them—James Gilmour, Robert Heggison and a Mr. Sam Stevenson—worked at Motherwell Bridge Holdings, a firm which had lasted for 100 years. The firm went into receivership and was then recreated as a new company. My constituents lost their pensions as a result of that revolving-door receivership. I am worried that they will get nothing from the proposed fund.

[Mr. Tynan]

Two other constituents, Mr. Japp and Mr. Kenneth Barrie, worked for Melville Dundas in Hamilton, and I do not expect that they will face any problems. However, Mr. Colin Preston worked for the Bradstock company, and he wrote to me about the difficulties that could arise with his pension.

I welcome this important Bill. My hon. Friends on the Front Bench and others put in much hard work in Standing Committee, for which I am grateful. Much had to be done, and an enormous number of amendments were tabled. The Bill has been turned into something that will make a real difference to the people of this country.

The Bill is badly needed, because people had lost confidence in the pensions industry. I hope that the Bill will restore their confidence, but as I said, there remains one tiny element that requires attention.

I turn now to the pension credit and means testing. I read a speech—I think that it was made by the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson)—in which it was stated that people were being driven into poverty by means testing. However, my understanding is that means testing, as it is structured at present, lifts people out of poverty. It is therefore difficult to understand the claim made in the speech. The pension credit has helped pensioners enormously, and the Bill is another piece in the jigsaw puzzle.

John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland) (Lab): Would my hon. Friend be surprised to hear that 4,978 constituents of the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) have been made in excess of £39.11 a week better off by the pension credit?

Mr. Tynan: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's constituents will look very closely at the Opposition's policy, especially if they endanger the real benefits accruing from the pension credit.

I hope that next year's Pensions Commission report will be the final piece of the puzzle, and that it will recommend some form of compulsion. Amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson) and me were not reached in the debate yesterday, but I hope that the proposals that they contain will be included in any future Bill.

This Bill has many excellent attributes. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State deserves congratulations on introducing new clause 34 yesterday. He and my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions, as well as the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond), tabled many amendments in Standing Committee, and they did so with good humour. Many hon. Members will agree that new clause 34 was the provision that we were all waiting for.

I still have concerns, however. In my earlier intervention I said that people will examine closely what was said in yesterday's debate, and that they will look very carefully at the responses from Ministers. I mean no disrespect to ASW workers, but if they receive payments from the fund when other workers do not, I can see that a campaign will build up that will destroy the good work that has been done. We must be mindful of that.

I did not get the opportunity to speak yesterday, but I want to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan), who has done an enormous amount of work on this matter. I also wish to congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Mr. Wyatt) and for Ayr (Sandra Osborne). The latter made an excellent contribution yesterday and she has fought doggedly for the people whom she represents.

No credit goes to the Opposition, however. The hon. Member for Eastbourne said today that this was a political issue. It should not be a political issue. The Government introduced the scheme because it is necessary, and it is unacceptable to play politics with people's pensions. People will see through the ploys of the official Opposition, who have not contributed in the right spirit to the Bill.

I sound a note of caution, because there are still many questions about the financial assistance scheme and what it will mean for the 60,000 who have lost their pensions. I look forward to seeing the draft regulations well before Royal Assent. Ministers have said that we should not hold out false hope, and I hope that that has not happened. Regardless of our opinion, individuals hear about a new scheme with £400 million of funds and they think that they will get a share of it. If they do not get that share, they will be disappointed.

The Bill has much more in it than the financial assistance scheme. We spent only one sitting out of 22 discussing that issue in Committee. We can welcome much else in the Bill, including the new regulator, the new TUPE arrangements, the consultation provisions and the PPF. Much depends on implementation. The Government need to consider how various aspects of the Bill will work in practice, including the consequence of the introduction of the levy and the savings from the streamlining of pensions administration. Employers need to recognise that pensions are part of pay and they need to provide pension schemes for their staff, just as they now need to pay the minimum wage.

The Bill is welcome and it will make a difference. I thank my hon. Friend the Minister and his colleagues and civil servants for all their hard work. I also thank Opposition Members—especially the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne), in spite of what I have said—for making the Committee stage enlightening and enjoyable. No one can accuse the Government of not acting on the issue of pensions. I look forward to seeing the changes from next April, when the regulator and the PPF come into force. I also look forward to many of my constituents now having a better life.

4.12 pm

Mr. Webb: It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan), who was one of the Labour Members who served in Committee. Those Labour Members were of uncharacteristically high quality—I shall leave it to them to work out whether that is a compliment or not. Certainly, they were knowledgeable about pensions and participated in the debate. They were not just lobby fodder, which is always a good thing, and they wrung one or two concessions out of the Government. For example, the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) ensured that the report on women's pensions would be published next year. The hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan) also worked hard.

It was good to be on a Committee in which all members participated fully, including my hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Paul Holmes) and the hon. Member for East Carmarthen and Dinefwr (Adam Price). We were grateful to the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) and his colleague, who ensured that the views of all the outside organisations were brought to the Committee's attention. We also appreciated the Ministers' contributions.

It was a little harsh to suggest that the Minister for Pensions lacks a sense of humour: he certainly needed one at times. I also thank him for engaging with the specific points that were raised. Although his answers were on occasion less than wholly convincing, at least he tried to address the points made, which made it feel a little more worth while going through 22 sittings knowing that every amendment one tabled would not be accepted. We are grateful to the Minister for Pensions for that, and we also appreciated the able assistance of the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, who will now be known as the Minister for fraud and error.

We should also thank the officials. The original explanatory notes on a Bill are often paraphrases of the clauses and do not explain anything. However, the Government wrote this Bill as they went along, and the explanatory notes were often very useful. It may be the same people who write both sets of notes—it is a mystery to me—but the later explanatory notes gave more clue of what was going on than the original explanatory notes. I am not suggesting that the Government should write Bills as they go along, but we were grateful for those briefings.

With my usual prescience I described the Bill, on the eve of its publication, as half-baked, but I think I was guilty of exaggeration. It has grown substantially since Second Reading; it will get even thicker once the pages and pages of new clauses and amendments on Report have been added, and it ain't finished yet. We understand that their lordships will be given even more new clauses that the Government have not yet had the chance to write. In Committee, I likened that process to the moment when Wallace and Gromit were careering along in a train, furiously laying more and more track in front of them. Sometimes, the Bill felt like that. In the long run it does not make for good legislation. It would be nice to think that the Government have got away with it and have not unwittingly put gaping holes into the Bill at the last minute, but given the length of the Bill, there is a danger that we have allowed through some provisions that will have the unintended consequences of which the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) spoke, and that would be regrettable.

There is much to welcome in the Bill. Mr. Alan Pickering called for a new kind of regulator—not a regulator who waits for people to complain, but one who goes out looking for trouble, like the Lone Ranger, and tries to do something about it, or who tries to prevent trouble in the first place. A proactive regulator is certainly a step in the right direction.

The Bill has some slightly worrying parallels with the Pensions Act 1995. No doubt when the House was debating that Bill's Third Reading, some Members said, "It's great, we've created a new pensions regulator called OPRA which will be the answer to all our problems"; yet nine years later, here we are abolishing OPRA. At that time, no doubt Members said, "It's great, we've put in a minimum funding requirement to protect pension funds". Now, eight or nine years later, we are having to pick up the pieces of a measure that was not properly scrutinised. It did not set minimum funding at an adequate level, so people fell through the net. The 1995 Act introduced protection against fraud. The Bill introduces new protection. I hope that in another decade we shall not have to undo the problems caused by the Bill.

The extension of TUPE to cover pensions is welcome. Pensions should be part of the overall package. However, the political debate on the Bill has focused on the pension protection fund, and I shall touch on that later.

There was a missed opportunity in the Bill: the provisions on state pensions were very thin. Governments do not often legislate on pensions, and although the legislative book was open the Government missed the chance to do something substantive, especially on women's pensions. One of the groups of amendments that we did not reach was our set of proposals on women's pensions; I was especially disappointed that we could not discuss our provisions for women whose contribution record was less than 25 per cent. The hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) raised the issue of annuities, and much could be done about the state regime. There will be a report next year, which is all very well, but the problems on women's pensions were listed in the Green Paper and we are still no nearer tackling them. That is a missed opportunity.

Gregory Barker: The hon. Gentleman is right: the Bill is a missed opportunity in respect of the state pension. Can he confirm whether it is Liberal policy to restore the earnings link?

Mr. Webb: Unfortunately, we had no chance to debate that issue during our proceedings. However, as my colleague who speaks for older people has pointed out, we think it is so important that we are dedicating a major section of our autumn conference to the launch of our policy, so the hon. Gentleman can look forward to finding out the details at that stage.

The key point of the Bill is the pension protection fund. I shall not rehearse the concerns that we expressed earlier, but my noble Friends are particularly worried by the failure to introduce a risk-based premium early on. That could penalise well run schemes at the expense of the cowboys, and we are especially concerned about that feature of the scheme.

On Second Reading, the key omission was something for the 60,000 workers. I hope that the Secretary of State can give me a better answer than he did to an intervention on that point. When asked about that number, he said that, yes, 60,000 was the right sort of number. However, when he confirmed that figure, what did he think the question was? Sixty thousand people who did what? I presume that 60,000 is the number of people who have lost their pensions because underfunded pension schemes have closed or been wound up, but no one was then talking about excluding solvent employers.

I am pretty sure that the 60,000 figure, which comes from the pensions action group, has throughout included members of solvent schemes. If they are included in the 60,000 and the Government plan to exclude them under the Bill, how many of them will not receive compensation? If the pre-1997 wind-ups are taken into account, how many will be excluded? The danger is that the figure will be perhaps 10,000 or 15,000. We do not know the figure, but I hope that the ministerial report will tell us at the end of June how many of those 60,000 people will be excluded under the Government's provisions.

The Minister said yesterday that solvent employers should be held responsible for the underfunding of their schemes. However, solvent employers were allowed to close pension schemes under the old law that satisfied only the minimum funding requirement. The MFR did not provide full buy-out, so those people received less of a pension than they expected. As the hon. Member for Hamilton, South said, why is their moral claim to the pension that they expected any weaker because of the circumstances that led to the loss of their pension? It is not their fault that a solvent employer caused their pension to close, rather than it closing because their employer went out of business. Are we saying that it would be better for them if their employer had gone out of business than if it had remained solvent? According to the Government's logic, those people are somehow less deserving because their firm is still operating.

If the Government are right and they want to do something for those people and chase the solvent employers to recover the deficit in the schemes, that would be a satisfactory answer, but they may simply say, "Well, it's tough." The Government seem to be saying, "We sympathise, but a line must be drawn somewhere. It's tough." That would be wholly unacceptable.

Gregory Barker: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Webb: No. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, but I will not give way, because a lot of hon. Members want to contribute.

I hope that the Government will give further thought to the position of those people. Large numbers of employees of solvent employers are profoundly bitter that, after campaigning alongside their colleagues from insolvent employers, they will get nothing. I wonder whether the Minister will tell us in responding to the debate about the Government's strategy for those people, whose moral case is just as good.

The Bill inevitably misses an opportunity with state pensions. Clearly, we need action on women's pensions in particular, and the Bill says practically nothing about them.

We have supported the principle of the Bill throughout. We voted for the Bill on Second Reading—we did not decline to do so, unlike some—because we want people's pensions to be protected. That is why I will ask all my colleagues, who are scattered around the parliamentary estate, to come in and vote for the Bill on Third Reading when the moment comes. That is what we should do, but there are concerns about the way that the PPF will work, particularly in penalising good schemes if the risk-based premium is not dealt with early. We remain very concerned that the financial assistance scheme—albeit a small step in the right direction—will create new injustices, and it would be better to get it right first time during the consultation phase than to draw lines that create unfair and arbitrary distinctions.

4.23 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): I cannot remember the last time when, in effect, we said goodbye to a Bill to send it to the Lords that was such good news both for our supporters and for the country in general. I would not want that fact to go amiss, but to be personal about those on the Treasury Bench, while that is good news for the country, it is a good day for the Ministers who have seen the Bill through. Their names are attached to the Bill, and I am sure that they will look back in future years to the significance of their contribution to the development of safe pensions in this country.

Ministers have worked hard, and so, too, has the Bill team. Any Bill puts a fair amount of pressure on civil servants, but if it becomes akin to a roller towel—seemingly endless—their work is made trebly difficult. I am sure that over the drinks this evening, the Secretary of State will convey the thanks of the House for the extraordinary effort that the Bill team has made.

Three red lights are beginning to be seen in the Bill. Two years ago, several Labour Members tried to introduce a modest pensions Bill, which might have played a small role in shaping the Government's proposals. One of our ideas was to have a much fairer winding-up order, so that the formula would reflect significant contributions that people had made over the years. The most worrying—to me—piece of information that emerged from the debate was the industry's claim that membership records were such that it would be unable to give the Government people's contract years so that their eligibility under a years-based contribution formula could be worked out. If that is typical of the whole industry, a mega-problem looms in relation to the records that govern people's eligibility for occupational pensions.

The second red light has been mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan). I suppose that I am the only Labour Member who is not especially happy that £400 million of taxpayers' money has been found to fund compensation—help, assistance, whatever one wants to call it—under new clause 34. In retirement our nation is divided into two groups: the most privileged, who have occupational pensions, and—generally speaking—the rest. The Government, for reasons best known to themselves, have decided to put in a further £400 million of taxpayers' money to the sector that already draws most taxpayers' assistance and those pensioners who—generally speaking—are most well placed to face retirement. However, like other hon. Members, I believe that the fund will not be adequate. We want the Treasury not to put its hand deeper into our tax-paying constituents' pockets, but to look to unclaimed assets to make good any shortfall.

My hon. Friend also mentioned the third and final red light: eligibility. Before the Government let the guillotine fall on the eligibility date, which will determine who is in the scheme and who is not, will they prepare for the House a detailed note on how many people they think would be brought within the scheme for each year that the eligibility date was moved back? I believe that the number of people in addition to the 60,000 who would be brought in from past years is quite small. The danger in relation to new clause 34 comes from employers who might find a way to dump their pension liabilities on to the scheme, not from those who have already done so.

Gregory Barker: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Field: No, because many others want to speak.

Those are my three red lights. I end with a question: what does it say about our procedure for consulting on, drafting and introducing Bills in Parliament when perhaps the most popular part of the Bill did not appear on the printed page at Second Reading? There must be lessons in that to be learned by a Government who, rightly, say that they listen.

4.29 pm

Mr. Fallon: As I made clear to the House on Tuesday, I have substantial reservations about the Bill, including the £400 million size of the fund, on which the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) signalled a red light. There does not appear to be a rational explanation for that figure. The Secretary of State again suggested that £400 million would be enough to last 20 years, but I very much doubt that. I am happy to wager with him, but I do not think that it will last two years, given the scale of the problem and the speed with which cases could be submitted. Either the levy will be accelerated, advanced or intensified, or the Government must come back to the House, or the Secretary of State must go back to the Treasury, for an additional sum. If that is the case, it would be more honest to admit it now, or at least substantiate the choice of the figure of £400 million. I certainly caution shadow spokesmen against suggesting that the Government should back the fund, as that would be a contingent liability, about which we complain but which ought to be properly scored, if accepted, in the Red Book. That contingent liability would quickly turn into a real one.

I do not think that £400 million will be adequate. To his credit, the Secretary of State said that it was not tea and sympathy but, equally, it was not compensation. It was a sum that he had set aside for a predicted number of cases—the kindest way of putting it is that it was his best stab. The sum will not, in fact, be adequate, and the fund's address will become one of the better known addresses in our city.

Gregory Barker: Does my hon. Friend share my view that the Minister is in a predicament partly because he was not party to the decisions that produced the figure in the first place? It was not calculated in a great arithmetical exercise by his Department and civil servants, but was dreamt up in a private meeting following much arm-twisting between the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Fallon: My hon. Friend is right. If the figure was a proper one, it would be included in the Bill, and there would be a memorandum explaining, analysing and justifying it to the House. However, it was not, and was clearly cobbled together at the last moment.

Mr. Andrew Smith: Will the hon. Gentleman accept from me that the premise of the intervention by his hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) was inaccurate and untrue?

Mr. Fallon: I am not sure that I want to go down that route, as I have no way of knowing whether it was inaccurate or untrue. Certainly, the figure of £400 million seemed to emerge at rather a late stage, and is easily divisible by the figure 20. Leaving that aside, however, my next major reservation, which I voiced in the House on Tuesday, is an unfashionable one. Everyone in the House wishes the Government well in tackling well-publicised and obvious abuses, but it is worth pointing out that the powers that they are taking, particularly in clauses 35 to 46, are extremely draconian and are likely to damage business and investment in it.

I shall give the House three brief examples of how wide the regulator's powers are. Under clause 39, it is for the regulator to decide whether or not an employer "is insufficiently resourced". Various definitions of that phrase are given in clause 40, but it is for the regulator to decide whether an employer is insufficiently resourced, and whether somebody else—it does not have to be a director, and could be a shareholder, an investor or an associate of the director—could make up the deficit. That is far too flimsy a basis on which the regulator can take action. The liabilities are described in an incredibly vague way. In clause 41, the employer's pension liabilities are defined as "the liabilities for any amounts payable . . . and . . . the liabilities for any debt which is or may become due . . . or otherwise."

I do not know what "or otherwise" means. It could mean almost anything.

Thirdly, as we discussed briefly on Tuesday evening, the powers given to the regulator to pursue people for their personal assets are incredibly wide ranging. The regulator can seize the assets—the personal assets, the homes and the wealth—of directors, of shareholders, of investors, of associates and even of friends of the directors of the particular company. That is simply a matter for the regulator to decide. It is left to his opinion. It was the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan), I think, who said there need not be an appeal provision because that can be judicially reviewed. He and I disagree about that.

I think the power is too wide and it should be limited in the Bill and subject to some kind of appeal mechanism. If it is not, the effect of the clauses will be damaging in two respects. First, we can predict that on the day the Act comes into force, a large number of companies will be placed in receivership. If the Secretary of State does not believe that, I must ask him whether he really thinks that directors, shareholders, investors and even associates of directors will put at risk their own homes and assets, rather than put companies immediately into receivership if they are concerned about potential pension fund liabilities. That is a profound mistake.

Secondly, if that is true, it follows necessarily that exactly the kind of people whom we are encouraging to invest in our companies will be less likely to do so. In an intervention, I gave the example where an investor from company B may be deciding to invest in company A. Neither of those companies has any connection with a pension fund, but it transpires that company A is associated with company C, which happens to have some potential difficulty with its pension fund. That, of course, will discourage precisely the kind of business investment that everybody wants.

I am not entirely convinced that the Secretary of State intends it, but I assure him that those are likely to be the effects. In his defence, I suppose it can be said that the provisions that I am describing—clause 35 onwards—have been rushed. They were added to the Bill at a very late stage, right at the end of the Standing Committee proceedings. They were only briefly considered by the House and even then, all bundled together, on Tuesday evening. That is a bad way to legislate, and I suggest to the House that those clauses need re-examining in another place.

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North) (Lab): For many years, I had the dubious privilege of serving on the Committee that considered every social security Bill that went though the House. Not one of them gave me the pleasure that this Bill has. Sadly, I did not serve on the Standing Committee considering it. For the one time there is good news around, I was excluded. There is probably a message for me in that.

We need to understand that in every workplace in the country over the past four or five years, the biggest single issue has been security—security of employment and security of pension. When we look back at a decade of financial scandals that go wider than pensions—for example, BCCI, Barings bank, Equitable Life—there is a general suspicion out there, rightly, that the whole financial world is a nest of vipers ready to rob people of their money and escape to sunnier climes.

There may be imperfections in the Bill that still need ironing out, but its provisions restore people's peace of mind like nothing has in the past 50 years. The Bill will also reinforce the confidence of people engaging in the savings habit. We know that the savings ratio goes up and down, and there are debates about what it should be. The Bill will give people confidence in the general financial services sector and encourage them to place their money in savings again. We need to understand that.

I want to restrict my remarks to clause 224, which concerns the requirement for knowledge and understanding by individual trustees. In 1986, I was appointed chairman of the west Yorkshire superannuation fund, which had 45,000 contributors, thousands of beneficiaries and £2.5 billion-worth of assets. I had no qualifications to hold that position, had received no training and had never been a trustee of a pension scheme, but because of the political circumstances in west Yorkshire at the time, I was made chairman of that august organisation. I am happy to say that when I left four years later, the fund had nearly £4 billion in assets, so perhaps I did not do such a bad job.

The way in which member trustees are chosen requires serious consideration—for example, men are chosen too often. Far too often, Joe, for example, who has worked for an organisation for 40 years, who is a good egg, who buys his round down at the pub and who is popular, is chosen. That is not good enough. Whenever somebody takes out a financial services product, they must consult an independent financial adviser. On mortgages, for example, three levels of service are available, from execution only to full advice. However, pensions affect people for between one third and one quarter of their lives, but people do not know whose hands their pensions are in. Trustees of pension funds are often rank amateurs, and, although I do not intend to disparage any individual who is a trustee, we must do better.

Clause 224(4) states:

"An individual to whom this section applies must have knowledge and understanding of the law relating to pensions and trusts".

The Library contains about 47 yd of books on the law relating to trusts, never mind pensions. The wonderful Child Poverty Action Group handbook contains 700 pages on pension law, but that is a brief summary. We must move to a situation in which courses, which lead to an NVQ2 or NVQ3, are run in centres around the country to a set curriculum, proving that people understand the matter. Most occupational pension funds exist in organisations where trade unions are recognised, and it would be magnificent to use the union learning fund and the union modernisation fund to provide training and education so that member trustees have the understanding to challenge the experts.

In every single scheme that has gone down, the money was there at one time, but then it was gone. In those circumstances, where were the auditors and the actuaries on the minimum funding requirement, and who was signing off statements? Frankly, member trustees have been deceived, duped and misled. I should not say anything else because legal cases may occur, but we must give member trustees the tools to do the job. It is not sufficient simply to put a clause in a Bill, and I would like training to be provided.

We have all received copious briefing notes about the situation from the TUC over many months. The TUC needs to put up, because it has a responsibility in the matter, as members of trade unions are suffering as a result of how things were done in the past. Trade unions must be honest enough to say, "We want the highest quality member representatives as trustees that we can get, and we will play our part in doing that." I feel very strongly about that, and I hope that my friend the Minister, who has been with me in the trenches over many years, will take my suggestion forward.

Over the course of many months, the Secretary of State and the Minister have consulted, questioned, discussed and debated with Members of this House—I think on both sides, but certainly on the Labour Benches—to try to find ways to get out of the mess that we were in. I thank them for the openness, frankness and candour of those discussions, because the Bill that we have today is the better for it.

4.45 pm

Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): I am pleased to be called to speak in the Third Reading debate on this very important Bill.

The Bill is welcome in general terms. Its innovations include the pension protection fund, which I am pleased to see come to fruition, although it is somewhat overdue. The creation of the office of the pensions regulator is welcome, but I hope that its regulation will work better than has often been the case in the recent past. I hope that those measures will go some way towards restoring confidence in the pensions sector, which has sunk to an all-time low in recent years.

The report on women and pensions is a step in the right direction, and I congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) on wresting that concession from the Government. However, I agree with the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) that the Bill is a missed opportunity in that it fails to make substantive progress in that important area.

I welcome the Government amendments that were tabled, albeit at the eleventh hour, on the key issue of compensation for workers who, through no fault of their own, have lost out on their occupational pensions. During yesterday's constructive debate, Members on both sides of the House acknowledged that it was a good day for politics—leaving aside the dreadful events of the afternoon—because it showed that the Government were actually listening to the people whom they are there to serve, which has become extremely unusual.

It was helpful to receive some clarification on the likely timetable for the roll-out of the proposals. I am glad that we secured the confirmation that they will be dealt with by the affirmative resolution procedure, which will allow each hon. Member to vote on the detail of the proposals in accordance with the statements that they have already made.

I very much regret that during yesterday's debate the Minister resisted all attempts to extract details of the likely level of compensation that workers may expect to receive. Many of them have waited years for action and justifiably want to know, in light of the proposals put forward last Friday, what percentage of their lost pension they may expect to receive. We were not given any meaningful information on that; nor were we given any reasonable explanation of how the £400 million figure was arrived at. With all due respect to the Secretary of State, neither did we get that information today. I fear that down the line many workers may find that the payout that they receive is much less than that for which they are now hoping. We await the specific proposals that the Government are to bring forward by the autumn.

The Minister and the Secretary of State should be aware that they must come up with the goods. They promised yesterday and today that the proposals would result in "significant help." I appreciate that the new Labour Government have frequently stretched the English language—the Minister of State for the armed forces gave an interesting definition of "report" in a recent Adjournment debate—but "significant" means just that to every normal thinking person. The Government have promised significant help and they must deliver. Any failure to respond to the workers' legitimate case will be rightly regarded as entirely cynical.

Apart from the important issue of women and pensions, the Bill represents a missed opportunity on another key matter. It fails to provide for restoring the link between pensions and earnings. The Tories first broke that link, but, like many other policies, new Labour took it up enthusiastically when it was elected in 1997. It has left many pensioners in poverty and that is unacceptable in an enlightened 21st century. Instead of a clear commitment to providing a decent, basic state pension, we have an approach based on means-testing that is unduly complex, costly to administer and acts as a disincentive to save. It is therefore a pity that the Government have not seen fit to take the opportunity of the Bill to tackle pensioner poverty head on. That will neither go unnoticed nor be forgiven by pensioners in Scotland and elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

I am conscious that other hon. Members wish to speak, so I conclude by saying that, leaving the matters of concern to one side, the Bill is generally welcome and I am happy to lend my party's support to it on Third Reading.

4.52 pm

Kevin Brennan: I join in the welcome for the Bill. I particularly welcome the changes that were made yesterday through the incorporation of new clause 24 and assistance for those who have potentially lost their pensions as a result of insolvency. I echo the comments of other hon. Members who have spoken about the need to ensure that, in working out the detail of the package, the assistance for those workers is substantial. That was the word I used yesterday, and "significant" has been used today. It is vital that that happens and I believe that it is the Government's intention. We look forward to seeing the detail as it emerges but I fully understand that it is impossible for it to emerge now.

I have probably said far too much about the subject in the past couple of years, so I thought that on Third Reading I would simply do the honours and pay tribute to a few hon. Members who have been particularly active. The newspapers recently described the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) as the Tories' youthful Tony Blair. They appeared to believe that the hon. Gentleman was younger than he is and gave the impression that his pensions expertise was remarkable since his only recent dealings with finance had been with his pocket money. That is not so: he has acquired much expertise.

The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson), who detained us for rather a long time this afternoon, has brought his wit to most of our proceedings. After his comments today, he may become known as the hon. Member for Wither-on-the-Vine. The hon. Gentleman thanked people from outside who had helped with the Bill, and has the admirable quality of being able to present the views of those outside without venturing an opinion of his own.

The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) is sadly not in his place. I accidentally got hold of some of his notes, including a couple of the "what ifs?" that he did not ask about, the first of which was, "What if a great flood were to cover the earth and sweep away all pensioners' records?", and the second of which was, "What if a large comet were to land and destroy the pension protection fund headquarters?" I think perhaps the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) might have given him that particular "what if?".

I should like to thank my very good hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (David Cairns), who was sneakily running caption competitions for the paintings in the Committee Room, but should be mentioned none the less.

I also thank my hon. Friends the Members for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) and for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson). As Wellington might have said, "I don't know what they do to the enemy, but they certainly scare the life out of me." They held the Government properly to account with the many amendments that they tabled, and in doing so made sure that the rights of workers were being championed in Committee.

I could not end without mentioning my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions. He has the features and demeanour of an urbane Roman governor in a sleepy outpost of empire. That is not a very good description of the Department for Work and Pensions, which is not a sleepy outpost but an absolutely vital Department at the heart of the Government—and a very successful one, as we have seen during our deliberations on the Bill.

I was interested to hear my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) developing his own line in stand-up comedy here in the Chamber last night. Apparently it is not true that he is going to combine his skills as a pensions expert with his new-found comic talents to star in a new British comedy film called "Love Actuary". [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] That was pretty bad, was it not? Enough of this.

Finally, I should like seriously to thank the Secretary of State for his efforts on the Bill, and his Bill team, who have rightly been mentioned and who have had to work extremely hard. In my view my right hon. Friend is a thoroughly decent man. The fact that this is one of the most progressive—if not the most progressive—pieces of legislation that we have seen for some time is entirely due to his thoroughly decent instincts. Those instincts were in evidence when he met the many workers from around the country—not only from Allied Steel and Wire but from many other companies—who impressed him with their human stories. He then had the imagination to see beyond the standard bureaucratic answer that it was "not on", or impossible to act retrospectively. He saw beyond that to the human reality of the situation facing those people, and I believe that that is a major reason why the Bill now contains provisions to help them.

We have conducted our proceedings with good spirit, and I pay tribute to every party represented. Members on both sides have attempted to scrutinise the Bill in good spirit most of the time. We have done our job, and it is now up to the other place to finish off the details. I believe that we shall be able to look back on these proceedings not in anger but with pride in the years to come, and I commend the Bill to the House.

4.58 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): The Government cannot solve every problem in society, but where there are clear examples of personal tragedy and the ability exists for the Government to do something about them, they have a clear duty to do so. This Government have faced up to that duty. The provisions that are being introduced to deal with insolvent employers are to be welcomed, although only as a first step. Many other steps will need to be taken to address this problem as time goes on. It is, however, a major step in the right direction, in terms of the principle that has been adopted. It will not solve all the problems of those who have lost out when a firm has become insolvent, but at least it is a start. Many other questions about the extent of compensation or assistance are bound to arise.

The Government have put forward £400 million over 20 years to help to address the serious losses that some people now face. I fear that that will not nearly be enough, but I welcome the fact that the legislation, the figures and the amounts will be reviewed every three years.

No one can deny the financial disaster faced by those who have paid into company pensions for decades to look after themselves and their families in old age only to find that the money has gone and their retirement has been ruined, and that the security for which they paid during their working lives has been wiped out through no fault of their own. In Northern Ireland, we have many examples of that personal economic disaster. My party colleagues in Northern Ireland, along with many others all over the United Kingdom, have campaigned on behalf of those who have lost out. The case of Richardsons Fertilizers in Northern Ireland in particular, and the need for action, has been highlighted. My hon. Friends the Members for Belfast, North (Mr. Dodds) and for Strangford (Mrs. Robinson) have been particularly active on that issue, as some of those most affected have been from their constituencies.

There is also a serious concern about the loophole in the case of companies that do not declare insolvency but decide to uproot and move to other parts of the world, leaving a deficit in the pension scheme. I was pleased to hear yesterday that the Minister gave an undertaking that an Order in Council would be introduced to ensure that this Bill would apply to Northern Ireland. The people of Northern Ireland welcome that. It is right that the people of Northern Ireland should receive the same compensation, at the same time, as everyone else in the United Kingdom.

That case not only highlights the fact that the same provisions should exist in relation to pensions throughout the United Kingdom, but strengthens the argument that the same legislation should extend right across the UK. Even were devolution up and running in Northern Ireland, the ability of Northern Ireland to legislate on matters such as pensions and benefits is really just theoretical, because we must bow to the parity argument. It may be wise to consider the issue of pensions and benefits in the same way as income tax, and have one set of legislation for the entire United Kingdom.

There are few examples today of Governments reacting to pressure or campaigns, but this has been an exception. All those, including Labour Members, members of various other parties and ordinary people, who have fought a good fight in this case have been at least partially rewarded. These provisions are to be welcomed, but the battle to protect those who have lost out through no fault of their own will have to continue, and I am sure that the Government recognise that.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I call John Robertson.

5.3 pm

John Robertson: I was not ready for that, Mr. Deputy Speaker—[Laughter.] Perhaps I should explain some of the laughter, Sir. Having sat here for all of Tuesday, and having lost half my amendments towards the end of the day, and having come in yesterday to see that there was no chance of getting in, today would appear to have been another chance lost. Obviously, you have seen the error of my ways and picked me, and I am grateful for it.

I would like to use this opportunity to take a brief overview of the Bill as amended, to consider how we got here and what lessons have been learned. In many ways, the progress of the Pensions Bill has shown the House of Commons at its best.

First, the substance of the Bill is important in rebutting the arguments of those who say that politics cannot make a difference. Few issues are of greater long-term importance to us than how we will support ourselves when we are too old to work. For that reason, the risk of workers contributing to their pension, sometimes for 40 years, only to see it vanish overnight, is rightly viewed with horror and fear by most people. The Pensions Bill ends that scandal. It makes a difference.

Secondly, the work done by Ministers, Labour Back Benchers and the Opposition has at times been fruitful. It has even been quite funny on some occasions. Like many hon. Members, on Second Reading I welcomed both the principles behind the Bill and the measures introduced. Again like many other Members, I asked the Minister to offer help to people who had already lost most of, in some cases all of, their final salary pensions when their employers had gone bust. Our arguments were pressed further in Committee, and were the subject of subsequent Government amendments. Opposition and Back-Bench Members played their part, and we can all have a sense of shared ownership of the Bill's final content.

I hope, as the Minister hoped yesterday, that a degree of consensus has been engendered that will enable all Members to support the Bill as it stands. My only concerns relate to the way in which the Report stage was conducted. Owing to the sheer number of Government amendments, there was not enough time for us to consider many of those tabled by Opposition and Back-Bench Members. The other day my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) and I tabled several amendments that were reached with minutes to spare before 7 pm. That meant that important issues such as implementation of the Government's commitment to extending the protection afforded by the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 could not be afforded the discussion that they deserved.

The TUC, Amicus, Connect and other unions want to ensure that no pension scheme member faces inadequate pension protection as a result of a TUPE transfer. That is why we tabled an amendment to clause 229 with the simple requirement that the receiving employer provide benefits broadly comparable, or of broadly equal value, to the benefits provided by the original scheme. Sadly, the amendment was negatived, but it is important for us not to lose sight of all that has been achieved. Clauses 228 and 229, for instance, introduce a minimum level of pension protection where a business transfer occurs and the TUPE regulations apply. In declining to accept my amendment, my hon. Friend the Minister asked me to acknowledge the progress that had been made, and I am more than happy to do so.

On Second Reading, I described the Bill as the antithesis of laissez-faire Thatcherism. It sets out clearly the Government's responsibility to their citizens. In arguing for more support for pensioners, the hon. Members for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) and for Tatton (Mr. Osborne) have happily jettisoned the ideology that we owe no duty to those of our fellow men and women in need. Lady Thatcher must be seething in the other place at that ideological inconsistency, but if it is any consolation to those hon. Members, I welcome their change of heart.

I was rather saddened when the hon. Member for Eastbourne said he would not stand behind the PPF in the future. The Opposition parties seem to be taking a Scrooge-like attitude on Third Reading. Hopefully, when Christmas day comes along they, like Scrooge, will look out of the window and say "We were only kidding: go and get that big goose".

Mr. Waterson: We are a bit far away from Christmas—but let me correct one statement in the hon. Gentleman's otherwise useful speech. I did not say that we would not stand behind the PPF; I said that I was not currently in a position to commit my party. Nevertheless, I think it unconvincing for the Government to present a PPF that has no backing from the Government. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman agrees with that.

John Robertson: In many ways, that makes my case. I believe that on Second Reading, in Committee, on Report and on Third Reading, we have produced a Bill that no other Government have even thought about. In years gone by—and the Tories had 18 years in office—no one thought about the people who had lost their pensions. This Government have produced a Bill that has never been produced before—albeit because many other Members have pushed them into it, but I think that that is how government should work. Governments must listen to the people. I think that it is childish of Opposition Members to attack the Government for trying to do the best job that they can. It is easy to say that the legislation will not work, but let us have a look at it in 10 years' time, and then turn round and say whether it did or did not work. We can then have the arguments about what was right and what was wrong, and whether these measures were the best that could be put together at the time.

We have all worked well to achieve a Bill on which there is now wide consensus. As amended, the Pensions Bill will help those who have lost their pensions and, most importantly for the pensions industry, boost confidence in pensions and set a long-term framework for future protection. It is my belief that if we can instil confidence in people's having pensions, the PPF will not be required. It is most important that all Members side with the Government on the Bill. I shall be very disappointed if there is a vote on Third Reading, and if there is, I can only say to the Members who call it that they do not really care about the people who need help most.

[John Robertson]

5.11 pm

Gregory Barker: I shall begin—[Interruption.] I was going to begin with some uncharacteristic generosity towards Labour Members, but perhaps I should move on.

I was going to say that it was a real privilege to serve on the Pensions Bill Committee. Although my part there was largely a non-speaking role behind the scenes, I was nevertheless able to observe a large number of high-quality, thoughtful interventions and speeches from both sides. Although the point of view on the two sides may have been profoundly different, most Members who spoke were motivated by a genuine concern to do their best for pensioners and for their constituents. It was clear that those Members had not just been allocated to a Committee, but were expressing concerns and articulating worries on a campaign and on issues that they had followed for many years. I certainly came out of the Committee a great deal wiser than I went in, having learned from Members on both sides. The public would have been pleased to see their legislators, who often get a bad press, acting responsibly.

I must single out for praise, however, my own Front-Bench team. I do so because they were a very real match for a high-quality ministerial team on the other side, but with a fraction of the resources—

David Cairns: And the talent.

Gregory Barker: The hon. Gentleman is wasted in his present job; he really should go into vaudeville.

The key point, which people often do not realise, is the small resource that is available to the Opposition. A torrent of amendments and new clauses kept coming all the way through the Committee stage—they involved a great deal of complex information and required overnight study—yet my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) was able to get right to the nub of some difficult issues, which I do not pretend fully to understand. Often, only after he had sat down was I able to get my mind round them. He did that with a fraction of the support staff that Ministers had.

The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) referred to Wallace and Gromit, and I can see that parallel clearly. As we were presented with more and more amendments and new clauses, it very much felt as if someone were laying new track in front of an out-of-control railway engine. I must say, however, that I felt rather more like I occasionally do when I am helping my eight-year-old son with his maths homework, and I am just one page ahead of him. I sometimes got the feeling that that was how the Minister felt, too, as he spoke rather more slowly and looked eagerly towards the Box.

No issue has given us greater cause to worry that the Government did not know what was coming next than that of new clause 24 and the £400 million-worth of compensation. To all intents and purposes, that figure could have been arrived at by Wallace and Gromit or plucked out of my son's maths textbook. The Minister has offered no intellectual rationale for it. He has not given us the benefit of any papers, or presented a thought-through argument as to why £400 million is the right figure, rather than £350 million, £500 million, £450 million or £426 million. No intellectual case has been made.

All the Government have said is that £400 million is a big sum. Well, we are dealing with big sums in the pensions field, and all figures are relative. In the national health budget, £400 million is a drop in the ocean, yet to an individual it is a huge sum; indeed, it is more than most people can even comprehend. Probably only the very largest of Labour donors, such as Bernie Ecclestone and the others who frequently put their hand in their pocket for the people's party, could really get their minds around £400 million. So I look forward to seeing the papers—perhaps we will see them in the Minister's memoirs—that show how the Government arrived at this extraordinarily round and convenient figure.

What does £400 million actually mean? I understand that the Minister does not want to get drawn into discussing this issue, that there is no guarantee, and that he cannot give precise details; indeed, I would not expect him to say anything that might give people a misguided idea of what to expect. However, it is extraordinary that he should be unable to provide any range in terms of what that figure means. The reality is that £20 million a year for the 60,000 people in question—that is what the £400 million amounts to—equates to some £330 per claimant, on average. There are obvious ways in which that money could be graded, and it is clear that some people will claim and others will not, but the figure that we are working with is £330 per individual. [Interruption.] The Minister furrows his brow, but that is the calculation, and there are only so many ways in which one can stretch or condense that money. We are not convinced that the Government have done their calculations.

It is all very well having a knockabout debate in which numbers are bandied about, but we must not forget that behind the figures lies very real personal tragedy. Indeed, all Members will have received correspondence from many constituents who have been ruined, and whose old age has been devastated by the loss of a pension. For many people, such a pension was their only other meaningful form of savings, yet they have been wiped out. We remain particularly and profoundly concerned about victims of situations in which pension funds have been wound up, yet the parent company has not become insolvent, remains in operation—perhaps abroad—and has effectively robbed such people of their life-savings.

A constituent of mine, from Burwash Common, is surely typical of many constituents throughout the country. He will feel very let down, and he will want to know what more the Government can do. Tea and sympathy is not enough for people in his predicament. He wrote to tell me:

"The money we contributed for our pension has, by law, been stolen and used to pay the pensions of others."

He argued forcefully:

"Nobody warned us of the risks we were taking, not the DWP, not OPRA, OPAS, NAPF, in fact, they encouraged us to join. Many people had to join their pension scheme; it was a condition of employment. The Inland Revenue prohibited belonging to a private scheme as well as an occupational scheme."

In my constituent's case, the "parent company . . . Ballast Nedam, continues to trade in Holland"— and quite successfully. Nothing in the Bill goes anywhere near addressing the plight of the large body of pensioners throughout the country who have suffered. We certainly want to see more action taken to help them.

I realise that other hon. Members want to contribute, so I shall draw my remarks to a conclusion. I am sorry that we were unable to debate this afternoon the restoration of the earnings link. I believe that the Government's promotion of a means-test culture is disgraceful. It is no wonder that we have seen a collapse in responsible saving, with 59 per cent. of pensioners now on means tests. By the Government's own admission, that is going to rise to 82 per cent.

When we return to Government, we will restore the link to earnings. In the 21st century, that is a great policy because it is simple. It is a wonderful example of where both morality and efficiency march hand in hand. It is a simple policy that people can understand, which will bring back stability and predictability into a volatile sector. So many of our constituents' lives lack the personal sense of security that they crave. They are looking to Government—of whichever colour—to do something about it.

Although the Bill takes many good steps forward in addressing the uncertainty of old age, it does not go far enough. It certainly does not take the steps that Conservatives would: it does nothing to address the decline of the savings culture; it does nothing to address the collapse in the household savings ratio; it certainly does not provide a guarantee. I saw pictures on the news last week of workers celebrating as if all their problems were over. I believe that in a few months' or years' time, that will seem precipitate, because they will work out how little they have benefited. There is a real danger that in over-egging the provisions, the Government could send out the wrong signal.

There is a huge amount of work to do, but it would be churlish to end other than by saying that we welcome the steps forward taken by the Bill. There is a degree of consensus across the House, but Conservative Members want to do a great deal more.

Vera Baird: For all the reasons set out by my hon. Friends, I welcome the Bill. At this time of night, I am not going to repeat what has already been said, especially when the Secretary of State is buying the drinks. At least I hope that he is, but he is frowning now.

The Bill takes another step in the Government's march to improve pensions. The Committee stage was pleasant and a good learning experience for many of us, very much including me. The Minister for Pensions was knowledgeable and well briefed—a bipartisan compliment, because one cannot be well briefed without an excellent team of advisers, which we clearly had.

The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) got it in the neck many times for reading other people's briefings, but to be fair, he always admitted that he was doing so and never pretended otherwise. His contributions were most welcome. Unfortunately, the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) missed the references to him made by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan). He will read them with interest in Hansard tomorrow. He is a bit of a worrier, but he is undoubtedly extremely knowledgeable. His contributions were also super.

I was pleased to raise, within the ambit of debating the Bill, the real problems that women still face in connection with pensions. Women's organisations such as Fawcett, as well as bodies like the Equal Opportunities Commission and many others, were very pleased when my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions agreed to produce a report on women and pensions. His offer did not have to be wrenched out of him, because he made it very willingly.

Indeed, the result is rather better than I had tried to achieve with my new clause. I had hoped only to get a report every year after the Bill had been introduced. If my new clause had been accepted, it would have been placed in a part of the Bill that need not have been brought into force by any particular date. By contrast, my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions has made a clear undertaking to produce a report on women and pensions next year.

That is an essential minimum. The Bill's enhanced security and regulation with respect to pensions will benefit everybody, but it contains nothing that directly addresses the pension problems faced by women.

I readily accept that the Bill is not like Santa Claus' sack, containing a present for everyone. However, 64 per cent. of pensioners are women, who receive on average only 57 per cent. of the income enjoyed by the average male pensioner. It is imperative that we put an end to that situation soon, and that we ensure that presents—if that is the right word—are given to women pensioners.

I and others will therefore continue to press every week for progress in respect of women's pensions. In that way, I hope to ensure that the first report from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is a good one. However, I have got used to the team with whom I served in Standing Committee, and I expect that I will serve with them again. When I do, I hope that it will be to consider the women's pensions Bill.

5.26 pm

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): I welcomed the Bill on Second Reading, when I pointed out that it had one glaring omission. I tried to speak in yesterday's debate on new clause 34, but my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) and I were the only two hon. Members not to be called before the debate ended. I was therefore keen to contribute today, as I want to thank the Government for listening to the argument put forward on Second Reading by me and many others—that the Bill offered nothing for people who would not be covered by the new pension protection provisions.

[Miss Anne Begg]

That omission was a clear injustice, as people would not be covered when the company for which they worked or the pension scheme to which they belonged had been declared insolvent. I accepted the Government's argument that the PPF could not be made retrospective, but I said on Second Reading that I hoped that the Government would come up with something to put matters right. I was not quite sure what that something would be, but I am delighted that the assistance scheme that the Government came up with is to be put in place.

Having constituents who are faced with a problem really helps to concentrate one's mind. The problem with pensions makes it clear why Members of Parliament should represent a distinct constituency. The phrase "restored the link" has a different resonance for my hon. Friends the Members for Hamilton, South and for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson). They think that it refers to restoring the link for MSPs in the Scottish Parliament, for which they have argued very forcefully throughout the passage through the House of the Scottish Parliament (Constituencies) Bill.

The changes that have been made to the Bill show that constituents can exert political pressure on their Member of Parliament to take up their case with Ministers. As many hon. Members have noted, that process works. In my case, pressure was brought to bear by members of the pension scheme run by the Richards textile company which, before it went into insolvency, used to be based in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, Central (Mr. Doran).

Those pension scheme members live all over Aberdeen and the north-east of Scotland. It was their plight that alerted me to the problem that the Bill addresses by setting up the PPF.

Much of what is in the Bill, especially the PPF, would not have been necessary if it had not been for the failures of the Pensions Act 1995. The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) praised the work of Dr. Ros Altmann, and she did a lot of work in persuading the Government that the pensioners in question should be looked after, but she also laid the blame for the problems that we now face with insolvent pension funds at the door of the 1995 Act. I was open-mouthed with amazement at the audacity of the Leader of the Opposition in taking credit for the solution to a problem caused by legislation passed by the Government of whom he was a member.

This Government have made a habit of picking up the pieces of the failed legislation of the previous Government or setting right problems that they failed to address. We all know about the compensation scheme for miners, but there is another scheme, which has not had the same airing in the House but is very important for my constituents, and it provides compensation for those who were made redundant as a result of the cod wars. Many of my constituents who lost their jobs as fishermen at the time of the cod war have received compensation. Indeed, the total is some 500 across the north-east of Scotland; that is another example of the Government making right something that the previous Government refused to do.

Several hon. Members have mentioned restoring the link. I would not wish the hon. Member for Eastbourne to be accused of misleading the House, but in a reply to a query by my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) as to whether any of the hon. Gentleman's constituents would lose out as a result of the Opposition's policy on restoring the link and the freezing of pension credit, he replied that they would not. Well, perhaps they would not, in strict terms, because under the Opposition's policy the pension credit would be frozen. However, what is often forgotten in the argument about restoring the link is that not all pensioners qualify for the national state pension. Some 1.5 million pensioners have only a partial contributions record and therefore receive a part of the pension or do not qualify at all. Restoring the link would do nothing for those poorest of pensioners. If the Opposition froze the pension credit, it would mean that that group of people—and those who receive only the basic state pension and nothing else—would have their income frozen for many years into the future. In other words, they would have no increases in income, whether the pension was linked to inflation or earnings. For those who made no contributions and therefore had no state pension, their income would never go up beyond the present level of the pension credit, if the hon. Gentleman had his way and the pension credit was left to wither on the vine. It is disingenuous to argue that restoring the link will help the poorest pensioners, because it would not.

The Bill is to be welcomed. It has many good aspects that have been well debated this afternoon. I add my congratulations to the Government on filling the glaring hole in the original Bill, and I hope that it comes out of the other place an even stronger Bill.

Mr. George Osborne: I thought that the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg) was a little ungenerous. To say that it was all the fault of the 1995 Act when that Act was introduced to deal with the fraud of a Labour MP, Robert Maxwell, and had the support—led by the previous Member for Glasgow, Anniesland—of the then Labour Opposition, is for the hon. Lady to forget her history.

In general, the debate has been good. My job is to wind it up, so I have to utter the usual pleasantries—as everyone else has done. As the person in the parliamentary Conservative party who is, I hope, furthest from my pension, I am not sure why I was put on the Bill's Committee, but I have enjoyed being understudy to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) who, with my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), knows a hell of a lot more than I do about pensions—I hope you will excuse my language, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne conducted proceedings in a relaxed and informal style, only occasionally rising to the sedentary interventions of the hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (David Cairns).

I have lost count of the number of Ministers I currently shadow—about five or six—but the Minister for Pensions and the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond), are among my favourites. I congratulate the Under-Secretary as I think this is his first Bill as a Minister. He did extremely well. The Minister for Pensions managed to get a large number of song titles into his speeches in Committee. If he was doing it for a bet, he must have won.

I pay tribute to the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) and the hon. Members for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson) and for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) who played an active role in Committee. Normally, it is traditional for Government Back Benchers to sit in Committees without taking part, but those three certainly participated and I congratulate them.

I also congratulate my hon. Friend, or rather the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan)—he was a friend during some of our Committee tactics. It is not generally known that the hon. Gentleman, the hon. Member for Greenock and Inverclyde and I share a woman. Her name is Linda Sanchez and she is a Congresswoman. The Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle), may be interested to learn that she was the first sister of a Congresswoman to be elected to Congress. The hon. Gentlemen and I met her in Boston and, through sitting around the bar talking to her about American politics, got to know each other, so it has been a pleasure to serve on the Committee with them.

Someone should write a book about what the hon. Member for Cardiff, West has done over the past year or two. He ran a textbook Government Back Bencher campaign, and did not wholly destroy his prospects of ministerial promotion in the process, which is quite a feat.

At the beginning of the debate, the Secretary of State said that the Bill would transform pension security. That is certainly needed, given the halving of the savings ratio and the kind of things that the chairman of Aviva said earlier this week. In The Financial Times, he said:

> "We will have a generation of elderly people coming soon who will have a hard time to live above the poverty line. No one should be proud or pleased with that scenario."

Aviva is the largest insurer in this country and is seeing faster rates of savings growth in many continental European markets than in the UK. A report from JP Morgan Fleming found that the number of defined benefit schemes that had closed or been restricted to new staff had doubled over two years.

Will the Bill transform pension security? It would be churlish not to concede that the PPF is an important step forward in providing that security. My hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne asked important questions in Committee and also—as did my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon)—in the debate about how the risk-based levy is to work and how moral hazard will be dealt with. Those questions need answers. The Government—whichever Government are in power—will have to play catch-up to close loopholes in the legislation as they emerge.

There were also questions about what kind of guarantee is behind the PPF. The Minister for Pensions was careful not to give an answer—as indeed was my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne. I suspect that there is a political guarantee: if the whole PPF goes bust, the Government in power at the time will be in a difficult position if they do not support it.

Throughout our deliberations, the elephant in the room was the 60,000 pensioners who had lost all or part of their pension. The elephant emerged at the last moment on Report. It was extraordinary that the Secretary of State gave over half his speech to that great thing, which was only introduced at the very last moment.

Perhaps if such compensation had been proposed earlier, we could have properly gone through some of the detailed issues raised, not just by Opposition Members such as my hon. Friends the Members for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) and for Sevenoaks, but by the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and, indeed, the hon. Member for Hamilton, South, who raised legitimate questions about the scope of the compensation and whether a group of very aggrieved people will receive no assistance having been given, if they watched the news during the past few days, some hope and an impression that they would do so. Time will tell.

I welcome a couple of other things in the Bill. Of course, I welcome the acceptance of new clause 23. Unfortunately, I was not in the Chamber to debate that yesterday, but it was kindly called the Tatton amendment, although it was proposed by an outside organisation and accepted by the Government. I also welcome the assurances that the Minister for Pensions gave yesterday about the amendments that we moved on the involvement of pensioner members in respect of member-nominated trustees. He said that the Government would take a close look at that issue and possibly table an amendment in another place. That would be good news to the Occupational Pensioners Alliance, and I hope that the Minister can live up to his promise.

I should note in passing that the hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) made an important contribution to the debate when he referred to the need for trustees to have sufficient knowledge and training to discharge the important responsibilities that we place on them.

Pension provision has been undermined not only by the security issue, but by the regulatory burden and costs on schemes that have accumulated under successive pensions legislation. I fear that the Bill will add to that burden, rather than reduce it, despite what the Government's rather optimistic regulatory impact assessment says. The new pensions regulator will cost 25 per cent. more than the previous one, and preparing the statement of funding principles will cost more than £16 million more than producing the minimum funding requirement, even according to the Government's estimates.

We will find out whether the statement of funding principles turns out to be the benchmark. There is certainly a view in the pensions industry that the basis for setting the PPF risk-based premium will, in effect, become the new minimum funding requirement because a well-run pension scheme will not want to pay a risk-based levy. Over time, we will discover whether that is the case. Of course, there is the cost of the PPF levy itself.

Additional costs will be placed on the industry, so despite what the Government say in their regulatory impact assessment, it is perhaps not surprising that the

[Mr. George Osborne]

Association of Consulting Actuaries found, after conducting a survey in advance of the debate on Third Reading, that "a majority of firms feel that"

the Bill

"will decrease occupational pension scheme coverage. Fewer than 1 in 10 firms feel that the measures will improve pension coverage. Close to 9 out of 10 firms say that the Bill's measures will either add to costs... or make no difference... as against the Government's claims that there will be £130 million savings."

That is what the industry says; it has certainly been our fear, and we have tried to make that clear as the Bill has been considered in Committee, on Report and now on Third Reading. The proof of the pudding will be in the eating, and the test will be whether more people save for their retirement. Will the closure of occupational schemes slow down, halt and perhaps even reverse? As my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne said, will confidence in pensions be restored? We will see.

Malcolm Wicks: This has been a good debate, genuinely well informed and authoritative—a proper Third Reading debate. The wide range of contributions has revealed a fair degree of consensus on what we are trying to achieve—a consensus that I hope another place will note.

We have heard contributions from all over the United Kingdom, from Northern Ireland, Scotland, Wales and England. Although I cannot comment on all the points made during the debate, we heard good speeches from the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson), my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, South (Mr. Tynan) and the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb). Last night, in private—because it was during Report stage—I gave the hon. Gentleman gentle advice about not being too cynical. I thought that the constructive tone of his remarks today showed that he had taken my advice, for which I thank him. My right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) made an important contribution, as did the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon). I shall write to the hon. Gentleman to reassure him that an investor in a company who has not been involved in any wrongdoing in relation to pensions will not be penalised.

We also heard important contributions from my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney), the hon. Member for Perth (Annabelle Ewing) and my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan), whom I thank for his generosity. The hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) helped to make this a United Kingdom occasion, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson). The hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker), my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) and my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg) also spoke, as did the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Osborne). I hope that I have left no one out—I want this to be a proper safety net.

Mr. Waterson: What about the Secretary of State?

Malcolm Wicks: The hon. Gentleman anticipates my list of "thank yous". We have heard lots of "thank yous" today, which is important, because we have had help from many people. I thank all right hon. and hon. Members present, especially those who have contributed to the debate, the members of the Standing Committee and our two able Chairmen. I have been aided by an excellent Parliamentary Private Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Inverclyde (David Cairns). I cannot believe that he would ever make a sedentary comment, but I believe that yesterday, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you commented that traditionally PPSs are silent. As a former Minister for Lifelong Learning, I shall find an appropriate course on which to send my hon. Friend, to teach him that silence and humility that will make him an even more excellent PPS. He has many duties: at one stage, I wished him to say something to Opposition colleagues on the Standing Committee, and he went across, much to the amusement of his Labour peers. Since it doubled the number of Members on the Tory Benches, I thought that there was an important parliamentary purpose in doing so.

Not merely because I was prompted to do so, I thank my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who has given us invaluable advice during the passage of the Bill. As I said yesterday, not only is the Bill the parent of the pension protection fund, but, because of my right hon. Friend's drive over many months, it contains the assistance scheme that has so dominated our debate, both in the past and today. I thank also the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Pond). He and I have known each other for many years. This is the first Bill that he has taken through Standing Committee, and I hope that the experience has not put him off, as it should not be his last. One day this week, he appeared before a Select Committee in the morning, put in a full day's debate on the Report stage of the Bill, then, because our Department covers work as well as pensions, he responded to the Adjournment debate. He is a role model for us all.

We should thank all those who work behind the scenes, but I thank my officials in particular. Last week, the hon. Member for Eastbourne said that when I heard a certain piece of news there must have been expletives in the air. Perhaps too primly, I replied that I do not go in for expletives, and I am sure that my officials will testify to the fact that I approach my task with even temper and good humour most of the time—occasionally, anyway. I would like to thank them, parliamentary counsel and everyone else.

I would like to take a moment to reflect on the journey the Bill has made through this House. Many hon. Members are about to make other journeys, so I will not detain the House too long. Three months ago, we introduced a Bill that, among other measures, made provision for a pension protection fund and a pensions regulator, which will significantly increase the protection offered to pension scheme members. We explained that the pensions regulator will be flexible and proactive and will focus on tackling the risks to members' benefits, while enabling well-administered and secure schemes to continue without unnecessary burden. We explained that the PPF will mean that, for the first time ever, individuals in defined benefit schemes, usually known as final salary schemes, based in the United Kingdom can rest assured that they will always receive a meaningful pension, even if their company goes bust and leaves the pension scheme underfunded.

We explained that over 10 million members—a modest estimate—of defined benefit schemes could benefit from the security and peace of mind afforded by the pension protection fund. In addition to those 10 million people, we must remember their families, who also rely on that security. However, Mr. Speaker, you will remember that Opposition Members declined to give the Bill a Second Reading. We also wish to remind them that, if my history is right, they declined to give a Second Reading to the Bill that set up the national health service.

Gregory Barker: I hate to interrupt the flow of the Minister's speech but, to be fair and for the record, does he not recall that the Opposition voted for a reasoned amendment, and did not simply decline to give the Bill a Second Reading? At this late hour, I would hate him to misrepresent the facts.

Malcolm Wicks: I am not a legal expert, but I have enough education to know the meaning of the phrase "decline to give the Bill a Second Reading".

In Committee, Members from all parties worked hard to scrutinise the Bill, including Opposition Members, who played a full and proper part in the proceedings. There was a highly informed and useful debate in Committee—it was not just a rubber-stamping exercise, and we discussed many issues. For example, we undertook to consider the proposal to remove the limited price index from defined contribution schemes when people are choosing an annuity. The new ombudsman may refer any question of law arising for determination in connection with cases to the High Court or, in Scotland, to the Court of Session. Pensioners as well as active members should be involved in the selection process for member-nominated trustees, so we have made a number of changes following scrutiny of the Bill in Committee.

On Report, we introduced a requirement on employers to consult their employees, trade unions or other representatives before making significant changes to pension schemes. In the early stages, however, we faced one overriding challenge— the issue of people who had already lost their pension and for whom the PPF has come too late. We were determined to do all that we could, but it was essential that we did not commit ourselves to writing a blank cheque. We were not willing to commit to a solution until we knew more about the scale and nature of the problem. While Government cannot stand behind private agreements—they cannot nationalise financial risk—and do not accept legal liability, we recognise that that group deserves Government help. It is the right thing to do and will greatly increase confidence in pensions.

We have therefore started a process to set up a financial assistance scheme with £400 million of public money spread over 20 years. The hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) banged his fists on the Dispatch Box at one stage, and demanded an end to claims of "No false hope". Following careful assessment, the assistance plan has now been announced and will bring true hope and, ultimately, true help for those who have lost out and suffered such a great injustice.

Members of the House have an opportunity this evening—I hope we will all make use of the opportunity—to support an extremely important Bill. I contrast what we are proposing with the position of the Opposition earlier. The hon. Member for Eastbourne was very good in Committee. He honed the art of quoting other people's views—many late nights with a fountain pen. Today the hon. Gentleman and his colleague the hon. Member for Tatton quoted from the Association of Consulting Actuaries report. I regret to say, and I am sure this was simply because of the lateness of the hour, they did not quote it in full. I shall quote the views from the survey on the pension protection fund:

> "Encouragingly for the Government, a clear majority of firms offering defined benefit schemes are in favour of the proposed Pension Protection Fund (PPF), one of its key new proposals in the Pensions Bill. The importance of offering greater security to defined benefits scheme members was mentioned by many firms. Support for the PPF has grown since the publication of the Pensions Bill."

We did not hear that.

Although we listen with great care to detailed points from those on the Opposition Benches, we will never forget that it was a Conservative Government who presided over pensions mis-selling on a massive scale. They did not provide any money to sort it out. Nearly 2 million cases have had to be reviewed and it has taken £12 billion in pension industry money to resolve. People in the industry are still working to clear up the mess. We will remember that.

It is interesting that the hon. Member for Eastbourne had to tell us that he could not commit his party to supporting the PPF, even at this stage. I hope the Opposition will nevertheless support the Bill this evening.

With the new assistance plan, as with many other successes, many people are claiming parentage. We had an unlikely candidate, the Leader of the Opposition, who apparently came in late, mentioned it once or twice at Prime Minister's questions and is now the proud parent of the assisted pensions scheme. Success has many fathers, but there is no Tory DNA in the new assistance plan.

Although I am being gentle with the hon. Member for Northavon today, I remind him of his cynicism when he said of the ASW and other workers on 12 January that > "the Government will do precisely nothing, and take many months to do it . . .Would it not have been more honest and generated less false hope to have told them that at the start?"—[Official Report, 12 January 2004; Vol. 416, c. 513.]

Those were the words of the Liberal Democrat spokesman. We have seen the plan from the Labour Government.

Finally, I am proud that it is a Labour Government who are introducing the Pensions Bill. Sometimes the term "social security" is used as technical benefit jargon, but "social security" has a meaning in the English language. It is about providing individuals and their families with a real sense of financial security. The pension protection fund will one day be regarded by historians as one of the proudest achievements of this Labour Government, because it brings a real sense of assurance and security to 10 million scheme members and their families. It is vital. Social security is also the right description of the assistance scheme that will be developed in the months to come.

[Malcolm Wicks]

In Committee there were one or two musical references. There was a rather serious one yesterday when my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) mentioned the great Woody Guthrie, in the context of a song saying that one could rob people with a pen. Woody Guthrie is also known for the song, "This Land is Your Land". We have been speaking about the people's pensions, and we will protect them.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Fire Service College

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Margaret Moran.]

5.59 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): May I start by thanking you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to raise the future of the Fire Service College in Moreton-in-Marsh? I also welcome the Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the hon. Member for Corby (Phil Hope), and hope that I can thank him in advance for what he is about to say.

A Treasury minute of March 1992 states:

"Section 4(1) of the Government Trading Funds Act 1973 provides that a trading fund established under that Act shall be under the control and management of the responsible Minister."

According to the Treasury minute, the Minister is responsible to Parliament for the running of the college, and I hope that he will make good use of his responsibilities.

The Fire Service College is the world's premier fire training establishment. It is also a very important employer in my constituency, employing some 262 people, most of whom come from the small Cotswold market town of Moreton-in-Marsh, with which it maintains cordial and close relations. It is from that standpoint I have secured this evening's Adjournment debate.

The Fire Service College covers some 500 acres,or 200 hectares. Its facilities include one third of a mile of two-lane motorway, a mock-up oil rig, a boat and an office block, all of which may be set on fire in exercises. It has some of the most modern equipment in the world, including modern fire hoses and fire tenders. It can stage multi-agency mock exercises in which the ambulance, police and fire services are all involved. It has mock aircraft and helicopters, accommodation blocks and a leisure centre. It is potentially a world-beating institution, subject to one or two caveats that I shall raise this evening.

The Fire and Rescue Services Bill allows the Minister to define the college's position as "a national Centre of Excellence for the UK Fire and Rescue Service."

However, I believe that the future role of the Fire Service College is still far too vague. It makes a loss, and it is no nearer the goal of partnership with the private sector, as identified in the 1999 report "Prior Options Review of the Fire Service College".

There is obviously a clear need for a central fire training facility, and the Fire Service College is uniquely placed to meet it. However, it is imperative that the college resolves its short-term financial and organisational difficulties in order to secure a long-term future in the private sector. We must ensure that the college has an increasingly secure long-term future, which will benefit the public, the emergency services, fire officers who train there and, above all, my constituents, by providing increased numbers of jobs.

I shall make five points about the future of the college. First, a chief executive must be appointed speedily. Secondly, the college must have a clear and defined role.

Thirdly, it should be allowed to become a viable commercial entity, to compete in the global marketplace and to raise its own funds for reinvestment in new facilities. Fourthly, the current financial constraints make consistent profitability and meeting the college's financial targets almost impossible. Fifthly, the college has a unique opportunity to expand and become a global leader in the field of civil emergency planning, if the Government give it the freedom to do so.

A key part of the long-term future is the speedy appointment of a new chief executive with a clear remit and proper scope for action. I understand that interviews for that position took place on Tuesday. Will the Minister inform the House when an appointment is likely to be made? Is he satisfied that the package that was advertised will attract a candidate of sufficient calibre, who has dynamism and a proven track record of successfully running businesses of that size and complexity?

Secondly, the Government must identify a clear and well-defined role for the college in the years to come, and must allow the college to compete in the global environment. The Bain report rightly commented:

"There needs to be clarity of purpose and a culture which fosters organic change . . . The College must also become the focus for developing the new thinking required by the service . . . The Fire Service College and Fire Inspectorate need reform with new remits which include the promotion of best practice and the delivery of a wider vision of an effective service."

The Government must allow the college to become a genuine global centre of excellence in multi-agency training by ending the present confusion over the college's role. They will fail the college and the dedicated people who work there if they fail to provide strategic direction. As the internal auditor stated in the 2002–03 annual report,

"There is an urgent need for the strategic direction and associated funding arrangements of the Fire Service College to be clarified".

The conclusions of the 1999 report into the college were supported by the then Home Secretary. The prior options review found that the college had been performing very poorly financially over a sustained period. The review concluded, based on the problems that it identified, that "a public sector management team acting alone would not be able to secure quick and effective changes needed at the College to ensure long term viability. We therefore believe that the right route lies in a partnership with the private sector; and we think that joining up the training requirements of the UK fire service with the MOD FSCTE"—

at RAF Manston—

"is preferable to going it alone."

That was point 1.16. The review argued that

"a private sector partner could strengthen and add to the expertise and skills at the College; offer the possibility of new funds for capital investment; act as catalyst to achieve culture change; and enhance the possibility of successful expansion into new markets to increase utilisation" of the excellent on-site facilities that I described.

In the years following the publication of the review, and thanks to the hard work and dedication of the then chief executive Terry Glossop and his successor Robin Currie, the financial and overall performance of the college improved substantially. A deficit on ordinary activities before exceptional items of £3,322,000 in 1997–98 was turned into a break-even point in 1999–2000, a surplus of just over £1 million in 2000–01, and a bigger surplus of £2,437,000 in 2001–02. The college also succeeded in winning a large number of international contracts and becoming increasingly attractive to the private sector.

I fear that in recent years the momentum gained in those years has been lost. That is a serious point for the Minister to note. In 2002–03, the college reported an operating deficit of £883,000 and a total deficit of more than £1 million, compared with a surplus of more than £1 million in the previous year. Several courses were cancelled in the last financial year. Sadly, the financial situation has deteriorated further, and this year the accounts are likely to show an even worse result.

The college must make correct decisions and eliminate waste. It recently commissioned an outside organisation to introduce a work regrading experiment, which was abandoned after it led to almost 90 grievances from the staff being received. It is imperative that that drift does not continue.

The college suffers from underinvestment. Page 30 of its business plan states:

"This has to be addressed as a matter of high priority if the FSC is to retain its existing business and deliver an effective modernisation programme. The under investment totalled some £9.8 million in 1996, and is now in the order of £12 million. In addition, costs associated with meeting modernisation and changed legislative requirements will take the total to an estimated £25 million."

After all, if the college is to provide world-renowned facilities, it must have world-renowned equipment on which to train firefighters.

I doubt whether the college will achieve its financial targets. It is required to achieve a minimum return, averaged over the period as a whole, of 6.5 per cent. a year in the form of an operating surplus expressed as a percentage of average net assets employed at current values. Given that it already has a public sector loan of some £16 million on which it is expected to pay a return of 7 per cent. to 9 per cent., I do not know how it is expected to make a profit. The valuation as at 31 March 2003 shows that the net book value of tangible fixed assets was revalued to some £30 million—an upwards valuation from £14 million as at 1 April 2000. Speaking as a chartered surveyor, I suspect that valuation, and I intend to draw it to the attention of Sir John Bourn at the National Audit Office before he draws up the next accounts. If the valuation is too high, how can the college be expected to make a 6.5 per cent. return on assets?

If the college is given commercial freedom, it can develop a proper business plan and consider its income stream before deciding how much to invest in facilities and what those facilities should be. Clearly, the Government must choose to go down one of those routes—privatisation or keeping the college in the public sector but providing it with the investment that it needs.

KPMG faced that stark choice when it suggested that the best option for the Fire Service College was either complete privatisation or management privatisation.

[Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown]

That led the then Minister, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), to aim to privatise the college by the end of the year. Sadly, those plans have subsequently been changed.

If the Government decide to avoid commercialism for the Fire Service College, they will find it extremely difficult to make a profit. In addition to the 6.5 per cent. that the college is required to make on assets, the Treasury minute that I have already quoted decrees that "the prices to be charged to UK fire authorities and also to Exchequer customers, must not exceed the full cost of courses provided for them. For the purpose of calculating full cost for UK fire authorities and Exchequer customers the required return on capital should be 6%."

I have already mentioned the public loan, which is currently £16 million. Under pressure from me in 1997, the previous Conservative Government wrote off £13 million.

It is essential that the new chief executive has a properly defined role and remit. I hope that the Minister will tell us something about that tonight. He must agree a new strategic direction for the future of the college with the Government within a few months of his appointment. There must not be a repeat of previous occasions, when previous chief executives have been blocked when trying to gain new business abroad in countries such as Malaysia, Qatar and Saudi Arabia. Some of those countries are excellent places for new business.

The Minister should consider several issues for the future of the college. Previous chief executives have been in negotiation with Cotswold district council to use some of the college's brownfield land on the western edge of the site for new housing. That could generate mixed tenure and social housing, which is needed in the area and, above all, generate up to £26 million. Will the Minister give an assurance that, if the money were generated by a sale or some form of partnership, all of it would be used to write off the £16 million public loan, and the balance used to reinvest in the site rather than being taken back into Treasury coffers?

The Minister might also like to reflect on the impact of the Government's airfield support services project, its part privatisation and its effect on the college. That is a big privatisation of various services in the Ministry of Defence and I have already said that if its firefighting training were concentrated at the college, that could hugely benefit the institution. One of the bidders for the ASSP is Serco, which has a large training college in Teesside. If the bid were successful, there might be some synergy in moving some of its aviation training from Teesside to Moreton-in-Marsh and beefing up the facilities there.

The global environment created by 11 September and the threat of global terrorism has made the need for a first-class training centre to deal with all civil emergencies through a multi-agency approach even more urgent. The Fire Service College has the potential to be the centre of best practice. Indeed, the Minister should consider that the college, which our forefathers set up as a world centre of excellence to train fire officers in 1968, could be transformed into a world centre for civil emergencies planning.

Firemen are unlike members of the armed forces, who may or may not experience armed combat in their career. From the moment they are trained and attend their first incident, firemen put their lives at risk. They deserve the best training we can give them. That means that the Government's previous blurred vision must now be cleared. The Government must give the college a proper vision for the future.

A former London fire officer, Gerry Clarkson, described the Fire Service College as "one of the most critical parts of the British Fire Service."

The people of Moreton-in-Marsh, those who work in the fire industry, those who work in the Fire Service College and the people who are trained there look to the Minister tonight to give us a clear vision for the future.

6.14 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): I congratulate the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) on securing this important debate on the future of the Fire Service College at Moreton-in-Marsh. I want to begin by doing exactly what he has just asked me to do, which is to reaffirm our support for the college and to acknowledge the huge importance of its role in the modernisation of the fire and rescue service. The Deputy Prime Minister has visited it, as have I and other Ministers on a number of occasions.

The hon. Gentleman's brief description of the fire ground did it little justice. It is a unique facility not just in this country but across the globe. He was right to say that our firefighters deserve the very best, and at the Fire Service College, that is exactly what they have. I appreciate that with an annual turnover of £20 million and a permanent staff of more than 200—the hon. Gentleman mentioned a figure of 262—the college is a major local employer and supporter of the local economy. Many of the staff and their families live in the immediate area, and I am pleased to say that the college has a good relationship with the Moreton-in-Marsh community. It opens itself up for many annual events and gives support to local charities. Membership of the modern, well equipped sports centre is also available to the local community. The college also has other more formal roles within the community. For example, it is the designated evacuation centre for Gloucestershire county council. The House and the fire service, along with the Moreton community, are bound to take an interest in what goes on at the college, and in its future.

In May 2002, my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) announced the creation of a task group of fire and rescue service stakeholders to look into the future of the Fire Service College. As I announced to the House on 30 June last year, the task group concluded that there was a need for a central training facility for the fire and rescue service, to take forward work on vocational development through the integrated personal development system, on the civil contingency response arising from the events of 11 September, and on the modernisation agenda opened up by the Bain report. The task group also recommended that a national work force development strategy be drawn up to define the role of the college in relation to other training providers, and that there should be a long-term plan for improving the college's infrastructure and services.

In accepting the recommendations of the Fire Service College task group, I also accepted the need to address the shortcomings set out in the task group's report, some of which the hon. Gentleman has mentioned tonight. As a trading fund since April 1992, the college has struggled to meet its financial targets. It has not been able to generate the income necessary to invest in the site, or to develop its training facilities to meet the needs of today's fire and rescue service. Nor has it been able to modernise its student accommodation to meet the standard now expected by stakeholders.

So where do we go from here? It is important that the college should be fit for purpose and able to deliver the key role that it has in modernisation of the fire and rescue service, as set out in the White Paper. This sets out a number of functions for the college as a centre of excellence. It should be a national centre for incident command training, based on a fire ground that is unique in the world in its size and scope. It should provide national specialist training in urban search and rescue and other new dimension techniques, working closely with the other emergency services. It should also provide drive and leadership for reform of the fire and rescue service through links with other services and fire industry institutions, and training and development for the most senior and specialist roles. It should lead the implementation of the integrated personal development system, and spearhead e-learning in partnership with the Scottish Fire Services College.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned investment. In my statement of 30 June, I confirmed that we would make £5 million available to the college for the upgrades necessary to meet health and safety and other legislative requirements, and to invest in its training facilities and student accommodation. I am pleased to say that that work is well under way, with training rigs on the fire ground being upgraded and a new accommodation block under construction. A further £2.5 million in new dimension funding has paid for a brand new urban search and rescue training facility. This is now in use, enabling the college to provide training to fire and rescue services in how to deal with collapsed buildings, for example. Those skills of the UK fire service search and rescue terms were recently used at the tragic factory explosion in Glasgow to very good effect.

We are also making good progress in bringing the college fire ground and facilities up to standard, but years of limited investment can only be made good over the longer term. It is therefore important that the college has a coherent and realistic corporate strategy in place that shows how it will benefit from our investment and how it will generate the income for future investment, which I know that the hon. Gentleman is keen to see.

When I visited the college earlier this month, I met the acting chief executive and college directors, and we discussed both their business plan for the current year and, importantly, the development of a corporate strategy for the next five years. The hon. Gentleman is right that that strategy will need to explore the options for partnerships with both the public and private sectors. He mentioned one specific project—the airfield support services project. He will know that the fire service college is a service provider for the consortiums bidding for firefighter training under the airfield support services project. Certainly, the college welcomes the possibility of joint working with the Ministry of Defence. It has made provision in its business plan to do so, but given that negotiations must continue, the college's planning remains flexible, depending on the outcomes of those discussions.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the importance of the right management team. He is right about that. I share his view that having the right management team in place is essential to realise this clear vision for the college. The appointment of a new chief executive is a key component in drawing up and delivering the college's future strategy. The selection process for a new chief executive is being run in accordance with Civil Service Commission recruitment rules to ensure fair and open competition. The competition has attracted strong interest and a selection panel chaired by a commissioner is interviewing a strong shortlist of candidates. When that process of selection has been concluded, I will have an early meeting with the new chief executive and college senior managers to discuss the corporate strategy as it takes shape.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: This is a critical point. Can the Minister give us any idea, as there has been a long period of uncertainty, how long that process will take? That would be helpful to people working at the college.

Phil Hope: I am mindful of the point that the hon. Gentleman raises. Of course, the proper processes must be followed, and it is not for Ministers to intervene in that. It is right that we need to get on with this job, because of the uncertainty that there has been, and the sooner that we get a chief executive in place in the college, the better for the college and the whole senior management team. I fully understand that concern, and I will take back those comments.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned financial and performance targets. It is important for the college to meet its targets and to have a sound financial footing so that it can meet its obligations as a trading fund, as set in the Treasury Minute that he mentioned, laid before the House on 15 January. To remind the House, those obligations were to meet outgoings from its funded operations, and to achieve a surplus on ordinary activities of 4 per cent., expressed as a percentage of average capital employed. The college has not met those targets in the past two years, but he and I would recognise that in both years trading was significantly disrupted by the fire dispute, resulting in the cancellation of 22 weeks of courses. That is one of the realities.

In my recent discussions with college senior managers, we have been in full agreement that a return to at least break-even in 2004–05 is a priority, and that is reflected in the college's budget plan for the current year. The college has also made substantial progress in modernising its products and services, with the development of a more flexible, modular form of training within a new course prospectus that is fully compliant with the integrated personal development system. We are continuing to work together to strengthen the college's trading performance in this and future years.

I want to emphasise training. The take-up of new training by fire and rescue services is positive, and the coming on-stream of new urban search and rescue training facilities in particular has prompted strong interest. The college does not have a monopoly of training for the fire and rescue service, however, and it operates in a highly competitive market. As I said earlier, the task group recommended the drawing up of a national work force development strategy to define the college's role in relation to others. The strategy will build on areas in which the college is a strong performer, where it has an established reputation, and where training and development can most efficiently and effectively be delivered at national level.

However, there will remain a need for some training and development to be delivered at regional and local levels. It is likely that the college will have a part to play in supporting the fire and rescue authorities and the regional management boards in those local and regional responsibilities. We look forward to the possibility of its offering services such as outreach training, development programmes and quality assurance.

I believe that the college is best equipped to provide specialist and operational training, taking advantage of the unique fire ground facilities that have already been mentioned. We have invested in updating those facilities, and in the provision of new capabilities. Further development is planned, and we are exploring ways in which the site's potential for joint training with other emergency services might be realised. The hon. Gentleman mentioned that, and we are keen to pursue it.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I assure the Minister that this will be my last intervention, as time is getting on.

Part of the college's way of meeting the business plan—and this is where it was so successful under its former chief executive, Terry Glossop—was going out into the world and selling itself. Could the Minister tell us something about this aspect of the new business plan for the next five years? How does he envisage foreign businesses being brought into the college?

Phil Hope: I think the hon. Gentleman has been reading my notes! I was about to deal with the market strategy for—literally—the wider world.

I think it fair to say that the college has an established reputation in the fire service community, not just here but abroad. I was keen for it to adopt a new marketing strategy to build on that, which it has now done. The Fire and Rescue Services Bill, which has been dealt with in the House of Commons but has not completed its passage, will give the college the additional flexibility that it needs to consolidate or—this is the point raised by the hon. Gentleman—expand its presence in wider markets both in the United Kingdom and overseas where it has the products, capability and capacity to do so. I should stress that meeting the training and development needs of the UK fire and rescue service will remain the college's primary task, but the hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to the opportunity offered by business abroad.

The college also has a key role in the support framework for the IPDS, which we set out in chapter 6 of the national framework document. The ODPM's enhanced support for the IPDS has resulted in a strengthened central team and three regional teams working from the college, giving advice and support to fire and rescue services. The college is currently working on a proposal to establish a major e-learning capability that will support the rolling out of the IPDS, especially in the retained service.

The White Paper sets out further development for the college as a nucleus of a centre of excellence for the fire and rescue service, bringing together service and fire industry institutions to provide a focus of expertise, research and innovation. I recently approved in principle the relocation of the Fire Protection Association and the Institution of Fire Engineers to Moreton, and subject to negotiation of terms both are expecting to move in September.

The task group's report spoke of the need to strengthen arrangements for those using the college to give feedback. The practitioners' forum will be able to play that role, enabling key stakeholders to comment on its performance.

Training and development are at the heart of the Government's modernisation agenda for the fire and rescue service. The college has a key role to play. We have invested in it to improve its facilities, and to put it on a sound footing for the future. We will continue to work with it to strengthen its trading performance, and to deliver the modernisation agenda.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): The Question is—

Mr. Clifton-Brown: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I thank you for allowing me to speak, and I thank the Minister for what he has said and for the positive and constructive manner in which he has said it. I think—subject to reading the small print in Hansard tomorrow—that my constituents will be greatly reassured.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am not sure that that was a point of order, but I am sure that the House will be grateful for what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Six o'clock.

Orders of the Day

Highways (Obstruction by Body Corporate) Bill

Bill reported, without amendment.

Order for Third Reading read.

9.33 am

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

This short Bill seeks to amend the Highways Act 1980 by applying section 314 of the Act to the offences of wilfully obstructing a highway—section 317 of the original Act—and failing to comply with a court order requiring removal of the obstruction, under section 137ZA of the Act. The Bill, if enacted, will enable proceedings to be enforced against officers of a body corporate who are responsible for obstructing rights of way. It prevents the unscrupulous from setting up and hiding behind a "paper company".

I welcome the support that the Bill has received from both sides of the House. I thank those Members who served on an extremely helpful and co-operative Committee. By coincidence most of them were from, or had connections with, East Sussex—testimony, no doubt, to the beautiful countryside in that part of the United Kingdom, which we all want to share. The officials at the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs who helped to draft the Bill have proven that a piece of legislation need be neither long nor complicated to have an effective impact and to protect the rights of UK citizens.

It should be recognised that the Bill might never have existed had it not been for the courage and determination of Kate Ashbrook. Her campaign to free a 140-year-old right of way in East Sussex from obstruction brought to light the loophole in the existing legislation. She fought a personal campaign against a company which hid behind the veil of incorporation. If the Bill is passed, such a situation will not be allowed to occur again, and it will be testimony to her fortitude.

I also thank the Ramblers Association for their encouragement and help in preparing the Bill, my researcher, Berni Smith, for her research on the detail, and the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality and hon. Members on both sides of the House for their support. In particular, I express my thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), whose expertise in parliamentary procedure has been invaluable.

I hope the Bill will gain the same sort of support in another place, and that ramblers in Britain can walk freely before we are recessed for the summer. I shall be content if my epitaph describes me in consequence as the "Rambling MP" although my brevity today may be pleaded in mitigation.

9.37 am

Mr. Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): We on the Conservative Benches warmly welcome the intentions of the Bill and congratulate the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster) on his efforts in bringing this important issue to the House.

As someone who is a Member for a rural constituency and has a keen interest in rural affairs, I understand the importance of access to the countryside wherever possible and appropriate. Historical rights of way should be preserved to ensure the continued enjoyment of the countryside by our constituents. Rogue landowners must not be allowed to obstruct footpaths and highways while hiding behind incorporated shell companies to avoid paying fines and removing the obstructions. It is right that a loophole in the law that allows the circumvention of existing provisions is closed.

The current loophole is exploited by putting land into the ownership of a shell company, by which process it is feasible to negate and nullify the law. The decisions of local magistrates and the determination of local authorities to reopen obstructed rights of way are, therefore, hindered at present. We all believe that the current situation is unacceptable.

There are, however, a few clarifications that I should like the Minister to make. First, should the Bill become law, what steps will DEFRA take to ensure that local authorities maintain rights of way and enforce the new powers in the legislation? Secondly, my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Charles Hendry) raised in Committee an important question about whether company directors residing abroad would be prosecuted under the new provisions. I understand that the Minister promised to write to members of the Committee on that point and it would be helpful if he could explain to the House the contents of that response.

Thirdly, it would also be informative if we understood how the legislation would apply to companies based offshore—in the Channel Islands, the British Virgin Islands and the Cayman Islands. That is obviously a possible loophole, or trick, that landlords could use.

Fourthly, will the Minister provide details about how DEFRA would publicise the changes under the Bill to ensure that local authorities, landowners and other relevant interest groups had a full and comprehensive understanding of their implications?

I welcome the Minister's commitment to my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) in Committee that if the Bill's provisions reach the statute book they will not be retrospective. Such a move would set an unwelcome precedent for future legislation. A further confirmation from the Minister on the Floor of the House would be most welcome.

[Mr. Mark Simmonds]

Finally, I understand that the Bill does not entail any additional public expenditure or changes to public service manpower. Conservative Members welcome that, and I should be grateful for a further assurance from the Minister that this is the case.

Conservative Members strongly support the Bill. We believe that the laws of the land should be fair, reasonable and effective. It is also important that they are seen to be so by the public. Deliberate obstructions are not only detrimental to rights of way, but are often eyesores and are damaging to the countryside. Law-abiding, decent landowners will welcome the Bill, as it will improve relationships between countryside users and landowners. The countryside is for us all, and we condemn people who deliberately prevent normal members of the public from gaining legitimate access to it. We support the Bill and hope that it will prevent unscrupulous landowners from obstructing historic rights of way.

9.40 am

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): I wish to place on the record Liberal Democrat Members' support for the Bill. I congratulate the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster) on introducing it.

I have had experience of dealing with rights of way legislation, both in local authorities and national parks, and know some of the difficulties involved with historic interpretations of different aspects of rights of way. Any legislation that is introduced to clarify the issues or to close a loophole is very welcome to Liberal Democrats.

I also congratulate ramblers and I congratulate Kate Ashbrook on the work that she has carried out. The sooner the Bill is brought into force, the better it will be for walkers and those who wish to use the countryside as well as for landowners. It will clarify the position. The deliberate obstruction of rights of way does nothing to enhance the reputation of landowners or to promote access to, and enjoyment of, the countryside. We welcome the Bill wholeheartedly.

9.42 am

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I am pleased that we have reached the conclusion to our careful consideration of this short, uncontentious but important Bill. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster) on succeeding in getting it to this stage. Many people have their names attached to a private Member's Bill, but it takes more than an accident to bring about sufficient agreement across the Chamber to give that Bill every chance of success. I congratulate him on his efforts.

I am also grateful to the hon. Members for Boston and Skegness (Mr. Simmonds) and for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) for their comments. They raised a couple of issues that I shall deal with briefly, but both have acknowledged that the issue of rights of access is not an easy one. Since I took up this brief, it has become clear to me that the range of complexities that can arise with rights of way and, in particular, with rights of way in relation to common land and those involved if one strays into Powys are enormous. It is not always easy to deal with what might appear to be a simple problem. However, I believe that this Bill closes a loophole and does so comprehensively.

The Bill's very simple but important aim is to close a loophole that allows the obstruction of a public right of way if a wealthy landowner sets up a shell company deliberately to evade legislation. I stress that we are dealing with deliberate evasion, not accidental oversight.

The Government's policy is to promote an accessible network of public rights of way for the greater use and enjoyment by all. As the foot and mouth outbreak in 2001 proved, this is vital for the rural economy as a whole. The Bill strengthens the provisions that the Government introduced in the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000 to deal with obstructions. The aim is to make provision for safe, accessible recreational facilities away from traffic, and the rights of way network must also facilitate initiatives towards walking for health and encouraging people to exercise more. The issue is as important as that.

The Bill seeks to close a loophole whereby an individual may act under the cover of a body corporate in the knowledge that, if the company has no assets, no fines will be payable. In Committee, Members from all three main parties referred to the appalling case in East Sussex associated with Nicholas van Hoogstraten. Local highways authorities are under a duty to assert and protect the rights of the public to use and enjoy those public rights of way for which they are responsible. However, authorities must have the necessary means to ensure that they can be proactive in keeping rights of way free from obstructions. It is wrong that there should be administrative, legal or cost obstructions in the pathway of a highways authority that seeks to carry out its obligations, and I agree with the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness on the importance of that. By removing the obstacle, we take a positive step in that direction.

In the vast majority of cases in which obstructions occur, the obstruction is removed through negotiation. The threat of legal action is usually successful when negotiation fails. However, the case in East Sussex has demonstrated that when that threat needs to be followed through, there is a loophole. Because of the notoriety of the individual associated with this case, the press coverage advertised widely the fact that recalcitrant landowners can defeat the system by misuse of the corporate veil.

Although we believe that the need to prosecute an officer of a company may occur very rarely in practice, we can only speculate on the number of occasions when authorities may have been deterred from prosecuting a body corporate, in the knowledge that enforcement action might prove difficult and, indeed, very expensive. It is therefore important to ensure that when the Bill becomes an Act the provisions are properly communicated to enforcement authorities; the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness made that point strongly. I give him the assurance that I intend to take responsibility for promoting the provisions to local authorities, landowners, users, and others with an interest in rights of way when the Bill becomes an Act, as I sincerely hope that it will before long. I intend to write directly to local authorities, and we shall update current departmental guidance on rights of way legislation to ensure that these important provisions are clearly understood by those who have to use them.

I underline that the Bill will ensure that when a body corporate commits the offence of wilfully obstructing a highway, or failing to comply with an order to remove an obstruction—and it is proved that the offence was committed with the consent, connivance or neglect of an officer of the body corporate—that officer may also be found guilty of that offence. The provisions of the Bill will apply to offences committed under section 137, which deals with wilful obstruction of a highway, of the Highways Act 1980 and section 137ZA, which deals with the failure to comply with an order to remove an obstruction, after the commencement of the Bill, regardless of whether the order to remove the obstruction made under section 137ZA was made before or after commencement. I should also clarify that local highways authorities are responsible for bringing prosecutions under sections 137 and 137ZA of the 1980 Act.

As the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness pointed out, concerns were expressed in Committee about whether directors of a body corporate resident abroad would be covered by the application of section 314 of the 1980 Act to offences under sections 137 and 137ZA of that Act. I can confirm that that will be the case. When a body corporate commits either of the offences in question and it is proved that the offence was committed with or through the consent, connivance or neglect of a director, that director will be guilty of the offence regardless of where he chooses to reside. Living overseas will not prevent the application of the offence.

The hon. Gentleman clearly anticipated that those with a creative turn of mind would consider our deliberations, and he asked whether placing ownership in an offshore company would be another route to escape. That is not the case. The issue is where the offence is committed, so a magistrates court can deal with any offence—whether it is committed by a British or foreign national—committed within the area of the Bill's jurisdiction, which is England and Wales. That applies to both companies and individuals.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster: Does my right hon. Friend agree that if there were difficulty in prosecuting an overseas company, it would be possible to prosecute the directors who were in this country even if there were no prosecution against the company itself?

Alun Michael: That would be the case. I do not think that there is a loophole for the inventive. The case only arose because of the misapplication of company law. That law had a virtuous intention, and I believe that the Bill closes the loophole entirely. It will enable highways authorities to carry out their responsibilities, as has always been the intention of the House and this and previous Governments, and will achieve consistency.

The Bill is modest, with an important purpose. The useful debate in Committee highlighted a number of issues, all of which have been dealt with. I hope that it will be successful in receiving Third Reading and will quickly become law.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Gangmasters (Licensing) Bill

Bill reported, as amended in the Standing Committee.

Order for Third Reading read.

9.51 am

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Back in February, I had the honour and privilege to move the Bill's Second Reading. I stood in the Chamber, in the shadow of the Morecambe bay tragedy, and asked right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House to support the Bill for one reason above all others—to end the exploitation of workers: the kind of exploitation that left men and women to die alone, helpless and terrified, on the sands of Morecambe bay in the name of easy money and quick profit; the kind of exploitation that has resurrected the slavery that we all thought was banished to the history books; the kind of exploitation that feeds off tax evasion, drug smuggling and human trafficking; the kind of exploitation that preys on the weak and the vulnerable; the kind of exploitation that diminishes the humanity of each and every one of us, inside and outside the House.

On Second Reading, I said that I believed it was time for legislation, not exploitation. The unanimous support that the House gave to my Bill was a clear demonstration that members of every party, from the Back Benches to the Front Benches, also believed that to be the case. That cross-party support was highlighted yet again only yesterday with the publication of the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs follow-up report into the role of gangmasters. The Committee stated that it now agrees that there is a need for a system of licensing and registration of gangmasters. It supports my Bill, which I deeply appreciate, and wants the Government to ensure that there is sufficient parliamentary time to get it on the statute book, with the political will and, more importantly, the resources to make it work.

My intention has always been to ensure that any law on gangmaster licensing is effective, robust and, equally important, workable. To coin a well-known advertising slogan, "I want a law that does exactly what it says on the tin." As amended, I believe that the Bill will deliver just such a law.

Before outlining how the Bill has been strengthened since Second Reading, I want to say some brief but important "thank yous". I thank the Government, both Ministers and officials, for their support and hard work in helping me to redraft the Bill. I also thank the coalition groups, from the National Farmers Union to the Transport and General Workers Union, which informed the ideas and the thinking that underpin it. The coalition is a coalition for progress. It spans workers, employers, industry, trade unions, communities and churches. Its breadth and depth are a powerful reflection of the seriousness of the problem and the Bill's merits. Last, but by no means least, I thank my parliamentary colleagues, Members from every party in the House, who have been unswerving in their support and wise in their advice.

I shall give a brief background to the Bill, as amended. The House will know that gangmasters are labour providers who operate throughout the UK economy.

[Jim Sheridan]

The Bill is not, however, intended to bring in regulations in each and every industry. Instead, as amended, it will regulate gangmasters in the sectors in which they are most common and where the abuses of the rogue operators are at their most extreme—agriculture and horticulture, the shellfish industry and the food processing and packaging industry. That amounts to about 3,000 gangmasters employing, supplying and supervising at least 60,000 workers. Although there are gangmasters who run good, honest, decent firms, many operate at the margins of the law at best and beyond the law at worst.

Voluntary codes and self-regulation have unfortunately failed. They have failed to protect workers, legitimate gangmasters, producers, packers and retailers. They have also failed to protect the taxpayer. The absence of a law to regulate gangmasters has given the good no chance and the bad every chance. The Bill attempts to right that wrong and, as amended, I believe that that is exactly what it will do.

I shall walk the House through the key changes that have strengthened and enhanced the Bill since Second Reading. It is important that there be no rat runs through which rogue gangmasters can escape, so its scope has been widened. Not only will it apply to the whole of the UK, it will also extend to gangmasters based offshore. The work to which the Bill applies has been defined in broad terms to ensure that rogue gangmasters cannot evade the law by redefining the nature of the work that they do. The Bill now covers all forms of sub-contracting. In addition, employment agencies and employment businesses will come within its ambit if they are engaged in activities for which a gangmaster licence is required.

I come now to the definition of a "worker". Although they are often the most vulnerable to exploitation, migrant workers do not make up the majority of those employed, recruited and supplied by gangmasters. In fact, it is estimated that some 70 per cent. of those involved with gangmasters are indigenous workers. But British or foreign, migrant or indigenous, legal or illegal, a worker is a worker is a worker, and no worker should ever be abandoned by the law and left to be a victim of exploitation. Through an amendment that defines a worker as the Bill now offers the full protection of the law to every worker.

"an individual who does work to which this Act applies"

Anne Picking (East Lothian) (Lab): I thank my hon. Friend for giving way. He is to be congratulated on this important Bill having reached this stage. He said that a worker is a worker is a worker. Is he aware of a situation in my constituency, where a third party employs migrant workers at a mushroom farm to work excessively long hours, sometimes 60 or 70 a week, thereby pushing out the local work force who cannot compete with those people? That means that workers are being exploited, no matter where they are based or where they come from, which has to be absolutely wrong.

Jim Sheridan: My hon. Friend makes a perfectly valid point. I know that she has worked extremely hard to tackle problems that she has identified in mushroom factories in her constituency. That is a classic case—and tangible evidence, if it were needed—of workers, in this case migrants, being exploited, having been offered terrible wages and conditions, in many cases without any accommodation. The net result, as my hon. Friend made clear, is that indigenous workers lose out on jobs because they cannot compete with people who are being paid poverty wages. A fundamental reason for introducing the Bill is to stop that exploitation of migrant workers and protect our indigenous workers, such as those in East Lothian, and that is exactly what the Bill will do. My hon. Friend is to be congratulated on the work that she has done behind the scenes, letting the authorities know what is going on.

I want to deal with the regulations and the powers of the Secretary of State. To ensure that the net is cast just wide enough to capture only those that it is intended to capture, the Bill gives the Secretary of State the power to make regulations concerning the exclusion from, or inclusion in, its provisions of certain types of work. Members will see that, as amended, the Bill also sets out the requirements for regulations that may be made by the Secretary of State through statutory instruments on matters such as the status and constitution of the licensing authority, the circumstances in which a licence may not be required, the licence appeals system and the "reasonable steps" defence for users of unlicensed gangmasters. When he rises to speak, I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Minister will confirm that all the regulations will be made in accordance with current Government practice on the use of delegated powers, including a full and proper consultation process at every stage, which is vital.

The Bill will establish a gangmasters licensing authority, which will be a non-departmental public body sponsored by the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. It will consist of key industry stakeholders and representatives from the Government, the police and enforcement agencies. It will set out the licence conditions after the fullest consultation with stakeholders. It will process licence applications, set and collect licence fees and establish a public register of licensed gangmasters. It will also have the power to modify, suspend and, where necessary, revoke licences, and it will run a licence appeals system, which is crucial. It will proactively enforce licence conditions. The authority will also be able to investigate and enforce the arrestable offences created by the Bill. I shall deal with those important offences in a moment.

The authority will play a pivotal role in bringing about the culture change needed to drive out the rogues, support the law-abiding and protect the vulnerable. Its fundamental strength lies in the four pillars on which it is built. The first is the skills, experience and expertise of the industry stakeholders who will make up its board and, through their experience, guide the board through its work. The second pillar is the enforcement link that the authority will provide between key Departments, local government, the police and existing enforcement agencies, such as the Health and Safety Executive and the Inland Revenue. The third pillar is the political commitment and financial support from the sponsoring Department, DEFRA, for which we are deeply appreciative. The fourth pillar is the authority's democratic accountability to Parliament, through DEFRA and the Secretary of State, who will be required to make an annual report to Parliament on its operation and, indeed, its effectiveness.

I return to the offences created by the Bill. It is right and proper that those who break the law should be brought to justice. The Bill, in its amended form, will make sure that that happens. However, prevention is always better than cure, so to provide an effective deterrent to rogue operators, the Bill will establish the criminal offences of operating as a gangmaster without a licence, obtaining or possessing a false licence, using an unlicensed gangmaster and obstructing an enforcement officer. Members will know that the illegal activities of some rogue gangmasters have been so serious that they have come under investigation by the National Criminal Intelligence Service.

The Bill now reflects the need seriously to tackle the crime with serious sanctions. It therefore amends the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 to make operating without a licence and possession of a false licence arrestable offences. It also amends the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 to ensure that the assets of convicted gangmasters can and will be confiscated. The Bill now has added deterrent value for the arrestable offences of operating without a licence and using a false licence, as it includes sentences for repeat offenders: up to two years' imprisonment for a second offence and up to 10 years' imprisonment for a third offence.

I shall now move on to what some Members rightly regard as the most important part of the Bill—the part that deals with enforcement. From the moment I introduced the Bill, I have argued that the key to the success of the licensing and registration scheme lies in the effectiveness of the enforcement that backs it up. To be effective, enforcement must be based on three crucial principles. First, it must be co-ordinated: rogue operators and their abuses cannot be allowed to disappear into gaps between Departments and enforcement agencies. Secondly, it must be properly resourced: the price of doing nothing always outweighs the cost of enforcing the law. Thirdly, it must be proactive: it cannot rely on whistleblowing by workers who are often too terrified to blow the whistle in the first place.

In my view, the amended Bill enshrines those key principles; for example, the licensing authority will act like a buckle on a belt, pulling together the enforcement efforts and expertise of key players such as DEFRA, the Department for Work and Pensions, the Home Office, the police, the Health and Safety Executive and the Inland Revenue. The authority will also be capable of carrying out proactive investigations. Income from the licence fees, in addition to the financial underpinning provided by DEFRA, should ensure that it has the right resources to do the job.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): The hon. Gentleman mentions licence fees. He knows that I support the principle of the Bill, but I am concerned about the costs that could be imposed on legitimate gangmasters. What does he think the fee will be, and does he think that setting it too high will encourage unlicensed activity to continue?

Jim Sheridan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. It is crucial that farmers, in particular, know the cost of the licence, but I remind him that the industry itself will set the licence fee, and it is hard to imagine it overburdening itself by setting the cost too high. Secondly, estimates of the cost suggest that it should not have a detrimental impact on labour providers. It is estimated—I stress that these are only estimates—that the fee for a three-year licence will be between £1,750 and £2,250, or between £585 and £750 a year. I do not think that such costs would put farmers out of business, and farmers themselves have said that the licence will produce a level playing field for them and their businesses.

The Bill opens gateways between Departments, the licensing authority and other enforcement agencies to facilitate the exchange of enforcement information and best practice. It also gives the Secretary of State the power to appoint enforcement officers, and gives those officers powers to enter premises, to search premises, to take possession of any item from those premises, to require the production of all relevant records, to inspect and take away the records, if necessary, and to order the attendance of persons. The Bill also provides enforcement officers and police officers with the power to make arrests in this respect.

Rogue gangmasters in agriculture, the shellfish industry and food processing and packaging are exploiting workers, undercutting good labour providers and engaging in serious criminal activity. The purpose behind the Bill has always been to construct the architecture necessary to end exploitation and to establish the legal paper trail that will bring rogue operators to justice and, I hope, drive them out of business. Farmers, packers, producers, supermarkets, Churches, workers, trade unions, employers, community groups, legitimate gangmasters, the Government, the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee and right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House all say with one voice that it is time to legislate, time to establish a statutory licence and a register, and time to end the exploitation. That broad coalition of support has played its part in informing, shaping and amending the Bill into the form in which it once again comes before the House today.

I have always wanted a Bill that was robust, effective and workable. I genuinely believe that, as amended, the Bill is precisely that. It now sets up a licensing authority that combines industry expertise with Government support and democratic accountability. The Bill also now has the scope and flexibility to close any loopholes through which rogue gangmasters might seek to escape, it reaches out to each and every worker throughout the UK, and it provides the framework for an enforcement structure that has both the strength and the flexibility to deter, to detect and to protect.

The House can never lay claim to the making of perfect law, but we can make good law—law that works, law that serves and protects, law that changes our communities, our country and our lives for the better. With the utmost sincerity and conviction, I say that, as amended, the Bill is an opportunity to make just such a law.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) both on introducing the Bill and on the manner in which he has just moved Third Reading. The agriculture industries of the UK owe him a great debt.

Although a member of the Standing Committee, I graced it with my presence for only a few minutes. It is matter of some regret to me that it sat on a Wednesday afternoon; I had expected it to sit on a Wednesday morning, a series of which I kept free in order to play a full and active part in its deliberations. However, there seems to have been some discussion with the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality about when the Bill would be ready for Committee, which indicated an afternoon sitting. That prevented several of my right hon. and hon. Friends and me from participating, even though we had wanted to contribute to work on the Bill. None the less, a clearly satisfactory Bill has emerged from the Committee, whose members I congratulate on their deliberations. Incidentally, I hope that no precedent has been set for the timing of Standing Committees on private Members' Bills—to have them sit on Wednesday mornings enables us to plan our very crowded diaries.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned whistleblowers, and I pay tribute to Zad Padda, my constituent as a company, Fusion Personnel, if not as a resident—he lives in Birmingham. He has played a leading role in bringing the issue to public attention and has put his personal security at some risk by taking such a high profile—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. We cannot have hon. Members making their speeches to music.

Mr. Luff: I am sorry about that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. At least it makes a change from the more mundane ringtone that we hear in cinemas when we are warned about the same peril. It will not happen again—although it is a good tune.

Zad Padda has put his life in some jeopardy by taking such a high profile, and I have had to ask my local police force to keep a close eye on his security. The world that we are discussing today is pretty murky, and some of those whose lives the Bill will make a great deal more difficult will not welcome what he has done. Zad Padda came to my constituency surgery two or three years ago, and he is the only person so far to have brought a PowerPoint presentation to one of my surgeries. I was so impressed by what he showed and told me about the work of gangmasters and how they could be better regulated and controlled that I asked Lord Whitty to meet him. You and I know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the convention is that a Minister gives about half an hour to such a meeting. In fact, Lord Whitty spent an hour and a half or even two hours with Zad Padda, which I think is a measure of the noble Lord's interest in the issue. It is therefore fair to pay tribute to Lord Whitty, too. I know that the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality has done the bulk of the work in the House of Commons, but the noble Lord has been concerned about gangmasters for some time. I might say—this is perhaps a more partisan note—that perhaps his concern seems rather higher than that of some other Departments, and it would be good to see the same commitment from them.

My concern about the Bill, which I support and will not vote against, is simply that the Government should not say, "We've got the Bill on the statute book. We can tick the box—job done." I regard the Bill simply as another brick in the wall of providing proper and better protection for workers and all the other benefits that will flow from a more effective system of control. The Bill is not the answer in itself.

I suspect that another hon. Member may want to comment on this is more detail later, but it is not at all clear to me that the Morecambe bay tragedy would have been prevented simply by the Bill. A much more comprehensive approach to the problem than just the Bill is required. The Bill is a useful contribution, but not the sole answer.

It is certainly not clear to me that the incident that provided me with my own personal wake-up call last July would have been prevented. You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may recall that one Monday I was travelling on a train towards Evesham, on the way to London and the House of Commons, when it was involved in a tragic collision with a white minibus on a level crossing at Charlton. As a result of that awful accident, three agricultural workers were killed. Soran Karim, a 23-year-old Iraqi, Satish Kumar from India and Islam Uddin Ahmed from Bangladesh were all victims of the accident. They were being driven by an Iraqi asylum seeker, Adnan Kadir Karim, who earlier this week received a five-year prison sentence for their manslaughter. Our hearts go out to all the families left behind as a result of that tragic incident. I warned the Government then, both publicly and privately, that that was an example of what happens when unlicensed workers, improperly trained and improperly warned of the dangers involved in an activity, are allowed to continue working unchecked on the fields of Worcestershire. Their deaths should have been the wake-up call that prompted rather earlier action.

We learned a lot from the court case. I have not yet seen the full proceedings—I am relying on press reports of the proceedings—but I am concerned that the Bill would not have prevented that tragedy. As far as I can tell, Karim was operating as a freelance gangmaster, going around cafés and restaurants in Birmingham, picking up people who wanted casual labour and driving them to the fields of Evesham to offer them and himself as employees: whether he was a gangmaster and whether it would have been apparent to a farmer that he was a gangmaster are interesting questions. I suspect that the Minister may tell me that, technically, under the terms of the Bill, Karim would have been deemed to be acting as a gangmaster. However, if a gang of four friends, colleagues, turn up casually on a farmer's fields and say, "Employ the four of us. We'll take what you give us", will they be caught by the Bill?

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I may be able to assist the hon. Gentleman. We do not want to leave any doubt in these matters. As my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) indicated, the Bill has been drafted and amended in Committee to make its provisions wide and ensure that all people who act as gangmasters—whether in a small way as subcontractors, or any other way—are caught by it. The Bill's powers of exclusion have been drafted to be clear that people in the business that the hon. Gentleman describes are caught and cannot avoid the provisions.

Mr. Luff: I am grateful to the Minister for that assurance, and he may well be right in that particular case. Another company in my constituency employs a lot of immigrant casual labour, without using gangmasters. It is said that the people just turn up and ask for jobs. It is a reputable company. I have visited it many times. I have seen the conditions in which people work. I know the rates of pay. It is a good company, but it strikes me that other companies that operate in the packing business might well claim that they operate in that way, while having informal arrangements with gangmasters. Even if they do not and the word goes around that a firm is a good company to work for or someone is a good farmer to pick for, people may be exploited by the farmer or the company without a gangmaster being involved.

I am sure that the Bill will not end the exploitation of agricultural workers. It should deal with the gangmaster issue, but it will not end all the problems involved in those industries. It is very important that the Government do not use the Bill as an excuse to play down the other enforcement activities in which they need to be involved. That is the key message of the EFRA Committee report on gangmasters. We are grateful to the Committee for producing its very important report. The Committee's original report showed that it was not convinced by the need for the Bill and thought that better enforcement was all that was required. That is a fair paraphrase of its original report.

The EFRA Committee's new report, published yesterday morning, makes it clear that it is now persuaded that the Bill is necessary and that it supports its principles, but that it is just not enough on its own. That very clear message comes through from reading the report. It refers to the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith) and talks about her concern that "enforcement continues to be held back to an extent by a lack of resources and an absence of co-ordination."

That will still need to be addressed, whether or not the Bill reaches the statute book, as I am sure it will.

The EFRA Committee report says:

"A plethora of cross-departmental and inter-agency committees, forums, steering groups, working groups and co-ordination groups have been set up, each of which addresses aspects of the problem, or which have wider responsibilities for illegal working... The Illegal Working Steering Group... chaired by a Minister of State in the Home Office... The Informal Economy Steering Group... chaired by the Inland Revenue... The Informal Economy Working Group... chaired by Customs and Excise... The Gangmaster Co-ordination Group... chaired by a Defra official... Regional gangmaster fora... The Department for Work and Pensions are responsible for the fora... The Department for Work and Pensions Fraud Steering Group, chaired by a Minister from the Department... enforcement activity is co-ordinated through Reflex... chaired by the National Crime Squad."

There is still a very complex enforcement framework, and the Government need to do much more to bring it together.

It is rather sad that one cannot verbalise the picture—that would be rather jolly—but it is entitled "Architecture of Government activity against illegal working". That is figure 1 of the report, which may reassure some people, but its sheer complexity rather alarms me. [Interruption.] I think that the Minister is indicating that he is a little concerned about its complexity as well, but it is a very pretty picture.

The EFRA Committee now accepts that registration is necessary, but it raises several concerns, which I share. We have already discussed the cost. I am grateful to the hon. Member for West Renfrewshire for what he said on the cost. At that level, it should not be a problem. Clearly, it is affordable—it is not a big issue—but if the cost becomes significantly higher than that, it may have an adverse affect. So the House will have to consider that issue very carefully, as the authority reports its work to the House, under its requirement in the Bill. However, there are two other concerns.

This is the kind of Bill that I instinctively do not like because all the detail is provided in secondary legislation. This is a running theme of mine in considering legislation. The Bill's detail will almost all come from statutory instruments. It contains enabling powers. Obviously, we have the Government's assurances—they count for a lot—but I would love to see more stated in the Bill about exactly what the gangmaster licensing authority will be expected to consider when issuing licences. For example, the issue in the accident in which I was involved last July was not only whether those people would be exploited because they would be underpaid, but that they were driving illegally. As far as I can tell, the minibus was not insured and the driver did not have an English driving licence. He could not even read English road signs, which is probably why the accident occurred: as he crossed the unmanned crossing, he did not know what to do. A licence condition ought to be that gangmasters can demonstrate that those who drive their minibuses all have driving licences and are fully insured.

Alun Michael: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, because it is important to put on record the way in which the Bill's architecture has been designed. It is virtually impossible for hon. Members to anticipate everything that could go wrong. Indeed, some of the hon. Gentleman's remarks illustrate precisely that point. As my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) said in his introduction, the two elements that enable the Bill correctly to target the real problem are, first, the engagement of the industry, given that those who know the business know what is happening on the ground, and, secondly, the fact that the provisions will be dealt with by statutory instrument, allowing them to be fine tuned if new ways to evade the law or the intentions of the Bill are found. So the hon. Gentleman is right to raises those issues, but the Bill's architecture is designed precisely to deal with them. I gave undertakings in Committee to the effect that we intend to indicate in advance of the Bill's enactment how the secondary legislation should be used.

Mr. Luff: That is helpful. Obviously, there is always a trade-off between clarity in primary legislation and flexibility in the operation of the legislation, particularly in fast-moving environments. I accept that, but perhaps it would have been possible to be rather more forthcoming in the Bill without prejudicing that flexibility. The Minister's assurance is appreciated, and I hope that the authority will be encouraged to examine the issue of driving licences and insurance.

The hon. Member for West Renfrewshire spoke about the responsibility of the supermarkets, which is important. Making sure that the industries operate ethically is not just the job of Government—a job that, as the report shows, has not been done adequately by successive Governments. It is also the job of the private sector. Price competition among our major supermarkets is leading them to turn a blind eye to what is happening as their food is prepared for them. One could say literally, in the wake of Morecambe bay and the Charlton crash, that there is blood on much supermarket food.

To their great credit, some supermarkets are trying to do something about the situation. Wychavon district council, which produced a report on issues relating to food processing in the Vale of Evesham, sought the advice of supermarkets. One supermarket, Asda, was happy to offer a great deal of advice. On the face of it, it seems that Asda is trying to do something about the problem, but I am worried that the other supermarkets are not. The British consumer needs to understand that she or he is often paying a heavy price for the very low prices of agricultural products. As part of an ethical trading initiative, the supermarkets must act to reassure themselves that they are genuinely using ethical labour at every stage of the production chain. The Bill, welcome though it is, will not solve that problem either, unless the private sector—the supermarkets—get a better grip of the situation.

I shall draw my remarks to a conclusion—I have already gone on longer than I intended. There is a parallel in legislation that might have been a better model for the Bill—the Private Security Industry Act 2001—which meets some of the objections that I raised with the Minister in respect of flexibility and clarity. But we are where we are, and the Bill is the only measure we have. It will improve the situation considerably and will be welcomed by all reputable gangmasters. Sadly, it seems that they are a dwindling band.

We can be fairly confident that the Bill will make a significant contribution to preventing the exploitation of labour. That is the key point for me. When I was commenting on some of these issues at the time of the accident, some people mischievously interpreted my remarks as racism—a criticism of the person driving the minibus. Not at all—my criticism was of the fact that the people involved were being exploited. They were the victims of what happened, and I was extremely sorry about what happened to them. The problems suffered by such victims are often more concealed than that—for example, the poor housing conditions in which many of them live, the appallingly low wages they are paid and the risk at which they are put.

Those are issues that the Bill should address. It should secure a vital service for agriculture. The word "gangmaster" has unpleasant connotations. It does not sound very nice. We need to put it on record that the casual foreign labour working in British fields and British packhouses is crucial to the success of those industries. We should thank those foreign labourers for the contribution they make to the success of our agricultural and horticultural industries. We should be grateful to them and look after them properly. We should ensure the safety of the general public, we should guarantee tax revenues, we should prevent abuses of immigrants and we should ensure that the law of the land is better upheld than it has been. The Bill is not a panacea, but it is a useful step in the right direction and I welcome it.

Geraldine Smith (Morecambe and Lunesdale) (Lab): I welcome the Bill and am delighted to be in the Chamber to see it go to Report and Third Reading. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) on all his hard work and his foresight in bringing the Bill before the Commons even before the Morecambe bay tragedy. I also congratulate the Bishop of Lancaster, who has pushed hard for a gangmasters Bill. He behaved magnificently after the Morecambe bay tragedy and conducted a multi-faith service in the cathedral.

I thank the Government for acting so swiftly to assist the passage of the Bill through Parliament and agreeing to give it parliamentary time if necessary. I thank all hon. Members for the support they gave me after the Morecambe bay tragedy and for the support they have given the Bill. It has been a fine example of Parliament working well and Members of all parties working hard together.

It is true that the Bill is a small step in the right direction, but it is not a panacea. It probably would not have prevented the Morecambe bay tragedy. To be honest, I do not know what would have done. How could one have stopped people going out in the darkness in the middle of Morecambe bay, even if there had been double the number of enforcement officers and ample regulation? There were people operating outside the law, and I hope that the police investigation will bring some people to justice if it is proved that serious exploitation was taking place.

The Morecambe bay tragedy brought the issue of gangmasters to the fore. Last Thursday I attended a service down on the beach. It was 100 days since the tragedy occurred and the Chinese tradition is to hold a service. I met up again with many local people who had been involved in the tragedy. What an impact it had had on their lives—for example, on the local lifeboat crews. One of the young men who had recovered some of the bodies is still having nightmares, seeing Chinese people in his dreams. The local chief superintendent, Wendy Walker, is a credit to the local police force. She behaved so well following the tragedy, but it still plays on her mind because she went into the morgue and saw 20 young people with not a mark on their bodies—20 people who should not have been dead and who were probably dead as a result of exploitation.

There was not just a human cost. We are faced with a police bill of £1 million to date, and the investigation continues. I put it on record in Parliament that I should like to see the Government pick up the cost of that. They have been helpful and given a grant of £200,000, but Morecambe bay was a national tragedy and it should not be the people of Morecambe who suffer in their policing and have to foot that bill. I appeal for more help in paying the bill.

The issue of exploitation was brought to my attention after the Morecambe bay tragedy because I met so many people who had so many horrendous tales to tell me about how people were being exploited right across agriculture—often illegal immigrants, but not always. Quite often British people were suffering terrible exploitation. We heard one example today of a mushroom factory where exploitation was taking place. I have heard of a similar factory in my area where local people are being put out of work because the owners are trying to get cheaper foreign labour. It seems that there is probably exploitation taking place there.

It is clear that we need measures to address the problems. The Bill will be helpful. It will produce a public register so we will know how many gangmasters are operating in this country. We must be careful. A gangmaster is just a supplier of labour and there are some good, reputable gangmasters operating. Those gangmasters have suffered as a result of unscrupulous people undercutting them by employing slave labour. The Bill should help to deal with that.

As has been said, there is a need for joined-up government. Let us be honest—that is easier said than done. It is difficult for any Government. Government works in Departments and it is hard for those Departments to liaise and work closely together at times. The tragedy in Morecambe bay and other events that hon. Members have highlighted show the need for Departments to work together.

We still have issues to deal with in Morecambe bay. Agencies have worked much better together since the tragedy. The Department for Work and Pensions, the Inland Revenue and various other Departments have got together and reviewed multi-agency operations. They are looking closely at the situation. The immigration service has acted well since the tragedy, carrying out a number of raids in my constituency and taking what I consider at this stage to be satisfactory action. But problems remain. I have heard that last week up to 80 Chinese people were working on the northern side of the bay at 11.30 at night in dangerous conditions, so clearly more remains to be done.

Enforcement is important. This is a good Bill if it has teeth, and that will be the key to its success. We are talking not just about foreign workers, but about young British people. I have seen young British lads, 16 and 17-year-olds, out in Morecambe bay working for gangmasters, who are often not aware of some of the dangers of the bay, and I am sure that the same applies throughout the agriculture sector.

The events at Morecambe bay shocked and shamed the nation. At least 21 young lives were lost. A body was found only two weeks ago, and we hear that two bodies are probably still out there in the bay. People were shocked and saddened that such practices could occur in the 21st century, with people living in overcrowded conditions, 20 to a small flat, exploited, transported in rundown vehicles that were not even taxed and just left in the middle of a bay to die in freezing cold, icy waters in the darkness.

We want to ensure that those lives that were lost were not wasted. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire for making sure that those lives were not wasted. His Bill will be a tribute to them and will help to prevent other vulnerable workers from being exploited in the same way.

As I have said, the Bill is not a panacea, but it is a step in the right direction and I welcome it.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): It is a privilege to follow hon. Members who have done such exemplary work in furthering such a good and potentially promising piece of legislation. Its target is largely the illegal gangmasters, or gangsters—shadowy criminals, exploitative people who engage in trafficking and abuse every piece of employment and housing legislation going. But I hope that within the Bill's ambit comes another group of people who call themselves agencies rather than gangmasters. Their names often appear in telephone directories and they advertise in newspapers, and they too house, deliver, tout for and organise a work force. Some could be described as borderline legal. Some have been prosecuted, some are rather easily satisfied with false identities, and some turn a blind eye to almost every health and safety regulation known. In addition, they often house the people who work for them in circumstances that violate all the regulations for houses in multiple occupation. That creates a problem throughout the country.

Those agencies fundamentally provide a legal get-out for legitimate employers in all sorts of areas, including agriculture, building, catering, packing and industry. They are their alibi against whatever legislation the Government may wish to introduce in order to enforce decent labour relations.

I very much favour the Bill, but like previous speakers I wonder what the eventual statutory instruments will look like and how the measures will be enforced. It is important that they be effective, not only against the gangsters, at whom the law can throw sufficient ammunition anyway, but to some extent at those people who regard themselves as working properly but who breach a good number of regulations in the process. If legislation—

Alun Michael: If the hon. Gentleman is talking about organisations or individuals that operate within the legislation for registering employment agencies, I should make it clear that where they act as a gangmaster they are covered by the Bill. Obviously, people using a particular name can seek to avoid the law, but they would not be able to put themselves outside the legislation by the simple use of a term, or by using other legislation in order to try to avoid the Bill's application.

Dr. Pugh: I am grateful for that assurance and all the other assurances that the Minister has given so far. The principle of the Bill is entirely sound, but the ultimate test will be its enforcement and the statutory instruments that follow, which we look forward to receiving.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) (Lab): I welcome the Bill, which is long overdue. I sincerely congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) on introducing it and on all his work in preparing it and in the discussions that have taken place since Second Reading. It deals with what has been a growing problem, at the heart of which has been the exploitation of vulnerable workers receiving extremely low pay, working in poor conditions, facing excessive charges for their travel arrangements—which, as the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) pointed out, have frequently been dangerous—without proper insurance cover, often being charged ferocious rates for protective clothing and so on, and often living in very poor accommodation supplied by the gangmaster at vast expense, so that while their notional pay may have been low, their take-home pay dwindled into virtual non-existence because of the deductions for travel, accommodation and clothing.

It is also worth emphasising that not only was the vulnerable work force being exploited, but the taxpayer was being swindled left, right and centre. The Inland Revenue was not receiving the money that it should have been. Contributions were not being made towards pensions and other requirements of the Department for Work and Pensions, and you can bet your boots that VAT was not being paid. There have also been rising costs to the national health service. Because of the poor health and safety conditions, people were falling sick and being injured in a way that they would not have been if they had been properly employed by decent people.

The Bill is the product of legitimate concern that has been building up over a long period; it has not just occurred now. I recall time and again listening to Dick Body on the Tory Benches and Joan Maynard on the Labour Benches, a joint attack by two people who probably did not agree on anything else on earth other than their dislike of the gangmaster system. Dick will probably be pleased by it, because he is still in the land of the living, and Joan Maynard would have been very pleased had she still been around to see it.

That was all years ago, then my hon. Friend introduced this Bill and then there were the awful events in Morecambe bay. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith), who, I confess, is a friend of mine. She had been exercising foresight and forewarning of the problems in Morecambe bay for a long time, but proper notice was not taken of what she was saying, and she found herself in the awful circumstances of being able to say "I told you so" after a tragedy, which was not something that she had looked forward to. She is still working hard and still drawing attention to shortcomings that might make it possible for such an event to occur again, in Morecambe bay or elsewhere.

One of the problems in the past, highlighted by the recent Select Committee report to which the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire referred, concerns the co-ordination of the raids—if that is the right way to describe them—involving the police, the Inland Revenue, and sometimes the immigration service, the Departments for Work and Pensions and for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the Health and Safety Executive, and so on. As I understand it, one of the Bill's benefits will be that there will not be the necessity to co-ordinate raids in quite the same way. If there is a raid and someone is lifted, they can be arrested on the spot and taken to a police station. At that point, it should not be beyond the wit of anybody to get in touch with the proper people at the Inland Revenue, the Department for Work and Pensions, the immigration service, the police, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs or the Health and Safety Executive so that the full weight of every possible law comes down upon the offender.

Co-ordination will be made much easier by the Bill, which will be welcomed by all decent, law-abiding people. It is certainly welcomed by the law-abiding and decent suppliers of labour in the rather peculiar markets involved, and it is welcomed by the National Farmers Union, the Transport and General Workers Union and the major retailers.

Generally speaking, I agree with the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire in wanting the detail of the legislation to be included in the primary legislation. In these circumstances, however, there are good grounds for saying that much of that detail needs to be set out in regulations. If it were included in an Act of Parliament, it would probably take a great deal of time and effort to get any Government to make an appropriate amendment to that Act. We are dealing with some vile, villainous and ingenious people, so the fact that the detailed control of true regulation can be amended relatively quickly and easily in response to their latest ingenious villainy makes a good case for using the regulatory system.

I represent Chalk Farm and various other such places—Holborn and St. Pancras is not a very agricultural or even horticultural area—and while the Bill covers agricultural and horticultural work, shellfish gathering and the processing or packing of any products derived from those industries and sectors, I wish to point out that there are other areas where gangmasters operate. Some of them are equally villainous in cleaning, the building trades and further stages of food preparation, which I do not think that the Bill necessarily covers. We can pat ourselves on the back about the Bill, but we cannot say that we have dealt with everything. It is right that the Bill deals only with the limited area that we have been discussing, but there are other issues, and we cannot think that we have dealt with the whole problem of gangmasters because we have tried to deal with a particular aspect.

None the less, this is a good day, and it is the product of a lot hard work by Members of Parliament and officials. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister on organising the process as he has done. His officials have had a number of meetings with the various interest groups, and he and they have also had meetings with the all-party membership of the Committee outside the Committee's proceedings, in which we managed to identify practical problems and come up with answers that dealt with them as far as we could see. There has been an interchange of ideas to meet a common and decent objective. It has been a good and productive process, and I congratulate him on his approach, which has been immensely helpful, as I think everyone who has been involved in the process would agree.

After the law is passed, it needs to be implemented. As I said, I think that it will make it easier to co-ordinate the activity of the various supervisory bodies, but a great deal of hard work and effort will be needed and the various Departments will have to give the matter higher priority than they have been doing in practice until now if the Bill is to achieve what we want. We will also have to ensure that resources are available to back up the practicalities in the field. For all the good that the various working parties and such like are doing—and it may be very good work—what really counts is what happens on the ground, as I said in one of the meetings; it was a fairly chilly one at six o'clock in the morning in a pea field in Lincolnshire. We have got to get that sorted, and I think that the Bill goes a long way towards doing that. There will be further consultation about the regulations, involving the Transport and General Workers Union, which has done a great deal of work on the matter, as well as other organisations, including the National Farmers Union, which has been extremely co-operative.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale said, the problem does not apply only to foreign workers. In fact, the majority of the people who have been awfully exploited are our own fellow citizens. An end to the exploitation of people who are in this country for a brief period, but who might want to stay longer, and of our fellow citizens is a good thing and a step forward.

The cost to a farmer and the ultimate cost to retailers and the rest of us of paying decent wages and ensuring that people work in decent conditions is an increase in the cost of the final product. We must recognise that; if we are going to ensure that people are decently treated when they are working to provide food for us, it may cost us a few more pence on our grocery bill, but that paying those few more pence is absolutely right if we are to bring about improved working conditions and get rid of the scandalous working conditions that some gangmasters—not the decent ones—have visited upon some of the most vulnerable people in our country. We may have to pay a little bit more to live in a better society, but I think that most people would agree that it will be well worth it.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): My hon. Friends and I very much welcome the Bill. I pay tribute to the hon. Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) for the work that he has done. The skill and determination that are needed to take a private Member's Bill through the House must never be underestimated. It has never fallen to me to do so, but I am told that it dominates a great deal of one's time, including parliamentary time.

I first became aware of the gangmaster system when I was doing some missionary work in East Anglia in the 1960s and 1970s. We were picked up after the children left for school and brought back home just before they arrived back. I am probably looking at what happened through rose-tinted spectacles 30 or 40 years on, but it seemed like a family-friendly system. I guess the same abuses were happening then, but that they were not so readily identifiable and that attention was not drawn to them.

The system and the market supply chain have changed incredibly. There is now a huge demand to deliver fresh products on to the table in a matter of hours rather than days. In the light of the domination of the limited number of supermarkets that have such a huge influence on the supply chain and prices, and their basic determination to compete on price, it is clear that the gangmasters in question and the abuses that have been identified are a symptom of that system. As a number of hon. Members have said, if we are going to address the issue, supermarkets must take some responsibility for the ethical considerations in deciding how a code should be produced. It is all very well for them to make great play of welfare conditions in respect of a chicken product produced in a foreign country, but it also behoves them to look after the welfare of the workers who have been involved in supplying that food. In warm weather, demand for salad increases, and farmers are asked at short notice to increase production and get more product to the supermarket shelves. The gangmaster system often breaks down during such stressful periods, which ill serves the people whom it employs.

Assuming that the Bill is enacted and becomes part of the legislative framework, how will 3,000 gangmasters apply for and obtain licences? We want to encourage gangmasters into the system, and we do not want people making excuses by claiming that the system could not cope with their applications. Will a system of temporary licences be set up while the inspections and investigations take place to ensure that gangmasters meet the requirements of the licensing system?

The Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee report criticised the Government for not being able to establish the number of gangmasters and employees affected by the Bill. The hon. Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) mentioned 3,000 gangmasters, and I am sure he has the evidence to substantiate that figure, but a huge amount of work remains. We must set up an inclusive system, because the last thing that we want is gangmasters to exist outside the system—we want them inside it. The Select Committee report also pointed out that some gangmasters have co-operated voluntarily with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. Because those gangmasters have volunteered to take part in the scheme, they presumably feel that they comply with the legislation.

I recently visited St. Merryn Meat, which lies just outside my constituency in Merthyr. It employs 1,000 people, and produces 70 per cent. of the meat for Tesco. On a daily basis, it also employs 100 Portuguese workers, who are supplied by an employment agency. When I attended the briefing held by the hon. Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan), I asked whether those people and the agency that supplies them would be covered by the gangmaster legislation, and was assured that that agency must register. Perhaps the Minister will update us on whether the Bill covers such work.

Many tributes have been paid to the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith). None of us wants a tragedy to occur in our constituency. The hon. Lady has dealt with the matter with dignity and determination, and brought the issues to the Government's attention. Hopefully, her work will make it less likely that such disasters will happen in the future.

[Mr. Roger Williams]

Police criminal intelligence tells me that people traffickers also traffic drugs and evade excise on alcohol and tobacco. Those people form a criminal fraternity, and the more we can do to break its back, the better. If the Bill does just a small amount to achieve that objective, not only will it have improved the working conditions of up to 60,000 people in this country, but it will produce a big stick with which to attack the criminal fraternity which brings this country's reputation down.

We support the Bill for all those reasons. A wide range of people have co-operated with the hon. Member for West Renfrewshire. The National Farmers Union, the Transport and General Workers Union and others attended your briefing, which shows the hard work that you have put in.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I gently remind the hon. Gentleman to use the correct parliamentary language?

Mr. Williams: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The attendance at the briefing just goes to show the great work carried out by the hon. Member for West Renfrewshire, and we wish him all the best in the future.

11.5 am

Mr. Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) on getting the Bill to Third Reading. He has put a great deal of time and effort into behind-the-scenes work to hold together the disparate and diverse group that supports the Bill, which is no mean feat. The group of supporters is a coalition of the willing, including the NFU, the trade union movement, suppliers, retailers and, most importantly, legitimate labour providers in the agricultural and horticultural sectors. The hon. Gentleman has also secured cross-party support in this House. That is not always easy, but he has done it with great aplomb. I also congratulate him on his explanation and analysis of the Bill in his opening remarks, which was expertly done.

Mr. Luff: My hon. Friend may plan to blow his own trumpet later, but meanwhile it is fair to put on the record the fact that he was first person to bring a Bill like this before the House, under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. Simmonds: I thank my hon. Friend for making that point, which I was going to mention a little later in my remarks. As an MP who represents a rural part of Lincolnshire, I support the Bill, as the House knows. Many hon. Members will recall that last September I introduced a similar Bill to tackle the problems associated with rogue gangmasters.

I was delighted that the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) mentioned my predecessor, Sir Richard Body, and his unstinting and tireless work to get Governments of both political parties to address the problems and issues, which have existed for many years, surrounding the exploitation of both the indigenous population and migrant workers in the agricultural and horticultural sectors. Although Conservative Members support the Bill, we must recognise that hon. Members on both sides of the House are concerned about the regulations and the cost structure that the Bill imposes on legitimate businesses. I hope that we can seek clarifications and assurances about the legislation's scope and execution during this debate.

Before I discuss the Bill in greater detail, it is important to understand the context within which it is set. Over the past five years, the number of illegal workers entering the country has dramatically increased, partly as a result of this Government's failed immigration policies, but also because of the failure to enforce existing legislation. That has left illegal workers particularly open to exploitation by rogue gangmasters, as those who are here illegally have no recourse through the trade union movement, or any other method to deal with maltreatment.

The Government clearly have no idea of the number of gangmasters and migrant workers—illegal and legal—involved in the problem. They do not know how long migrant workers have been in the UK, where they are working or whether they are being exploited, and they cannot accurately assess the revenue lost to Customs and Excise in VAT or to the Inland Revenue in tax—the regulatory impact assessment that accompanies the Bill openly admits that point.

In 1998, Operation Gangmaster was established to look into the problems of illegal ganging. However, it has been widely acknowledged, not least by the EFRA Committee, which was extremely critical of the Government, that the Government's efforts to tackle the problem have failed. The first report by the EFRA Committee stated:

"Five years on, Operation Gangmaster has no overall budget, reports to no Minister, has no identified aims or goals and no time frame by which anything must be achieved."

That relatively significant lack of co-ordination between Government Departments is one of the major reasons why Operation Gangmaster has not succeeded.

I accept that the terrible tragedy in Morecambe bay, which was highlighted in a moving speech by the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith), has created a sharper focus for the Government, particularly for the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality. I echo the comments of the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras about how well the Minister has conducted the passage of the Bill, particularly in holding private informal meetings with all the interest groups.

None the less, in its conclusions and recommendations, on page 23 of its latest report, the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee says:

"The reality, then, is that the Government is no nearer obtaining a comprehensive picture of the scale and nature of the problem of illegal gangmaster activity than it was when we published our original report eight months ago. Other than issuing a tender for one piece of limited research, the Government has made no progress."

I find that sad.

I did not open my speech in that way for party political purposes; I simply want to ensure that the Minister, other DEFRA Ministers and Ministers in other Departments who are responsible for specific pieces of relevant legislation, and their civil servants, understand categorically that the enactment of this Bill will be not the end but the beginning. It is the efficient enforcement of the Act that will determine its success or otherwise.

We must remember that we already have in place 20 pieces of legislation that should curb illegal practices—but the lack of co-ordination between Government Departments and agencies has resulted in confusion, a certain amount of chaos, and, there is no doubt, a significant growth in illegal activity.

Members on both sides of the House, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff), the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale and I, urged the Government to tackle the problem and ensure that existing legislation was enforced. However, the Government's record of inaction looked set to continue—until the terrible tragic events in Morecambe bay in February. I join other hon. Members in making my personal tribute to the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale, who has handled herself with dignity and determination in resolving the issues that emanated from that tragedy.

Only after the tragedy, and the subsequent public outcry for action, did the Government feel it necessary to act, and to support the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for West Renfrewshire. To the hon. Gentleman's eternal credit, he had decided to bring the Bill in before, rather than after, the tragedy in Morecambe bay.

I am generally hesitant about introducing licensing schemes and regulations per se, not least when legislation is already in place, but I sincerely believe that a licensing scheme for gangmasters will make the existing legislation easier to enforce. If a gangmaster fails to obtain a licence, the conditions of which will include satisfying the requirements of the existing legislation, he could be subject to prosecution and, ultimately, a custodial sentence.

As several hon. Members have pointed out, the Bill is not a panacaea, and the expectation that it will solve all the associated problems is unrealistic. I am particularly concerned that unless there is extremely robust enforcement, rogue gangmasters may continue to operate outside the licensing system, while legitimate operators face the increased costs of meeting the conditions in pursuance of obtaining a licence.

Like the hon. Member for West Renfrewshire, I was delighted to read that the Select Committee had changed its mind about supporting the Bill, and I shall put on the record two quotations that demonstrate how it has changed its position. Its previous report, published in September, said that it was > "not convinced a statutory registration scheme offers a stand-alone solution to the problems of illegal gangmasters . . . without concerted action to remedy shortcomings in enforcement . . . a statutory registration scheme, introduced as a single policy response will serve nothing".

I understood and shared its concerns about enforcement, but I have always felt that a licensing scheme will aid enforcement, provided that there is a co-ordinated effort by enforcement officers ensuring that the conditions of licences are met.

I am sure that all hon. Members are delighted that in its recent report the Committee said:

> "We are persuaded that licensing and registration are required to deal with the problem of illegal gangmasters. Therefore we support the Bill and call on the Government to ensure that time is made available—in Government time if necessary—for its successful passage".

I echo that last point, although I hope that that will not be necessary. I was intrigued to hear the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale seem to suggest that the Government had already committed themselves to ensuring that the provisions of the Bill could pass through Parliament in Government time, if, sadly, the private Member's Bill should fall for some reason.

I now turn to some of the specifics in the Bill, although I have no wish to repeat the debates that took place either on Second Reading or in Committee. I shall talk about the regulatory impact assessment, the proposed structure of the licensing authority and the proposed draft regulations.

The regulatory impact assessment provides an estimate of the likely cost of a licence—a point rightly raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire. The estimate was that a three-year licence would cost between £1,750 and £2,250. I am still concerned that that may be excessive, and I fear that it may prove to be a burden for small-scale labour providers, and could discourage some gangmasters from registering for a licence altogether.

I have been informed by some rogue gangmasters that this charge is minimal, particularly in the context of the large sums that are often to be made in what is—let there be no doubt—a multi-million pound business. I hope that the Minister and his officials will consider a sliding scale of charges, determined by the turnover of the business, to ensure that the small-scale labour provider is not deterred from participating in the marketplace.

Alun Michael: We have designed the arrangements so that there can be engagement with the industry on such issues, such as whether there should be a flat rate or a sliding scale. Would a sliding scale mean more bureaucracy, or would it be fairer? That is precisely why the engagement with the board of the body to be established, as well as in consultation work, is crucial. What matters is not just my view, or that of other DEFRA Ministers and officials, but what will work best in helping the legitimate industry, as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Mr. Simmonds: I am grateful for that helpful intervention.

For the licence to be effectively self-financing, running costs and bureaucracy must, as the Minister suggested, be kept to an absolute minimum, so that licence fees are as low as possible. However, that should not be done at the expense of enforcement.

According to the regulatory impact assessment, accommodation costs for the new authority are likely to be in excess of £200,000 per annum. I believe that to be extravagant, and suggest that the authority could—and should—be based close to the agricultural areas that it serves, rather than in Whitehall. That would also reduce the accommodation costs and other overheads. Personally, I would be delighted to see it based in Boston in Lincolnshire—[Interruption.]—just to mention somewhere at random.

[Mr. Simmonds]

Paragraph 5.2 of the regulatory impact assessment emphasises the point made by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) when it suggests that labour providers may pass increased costs up the food chain. I wonder how likely it is that retailers will be prepared to absorb the costs themselves rather than pass them on to suppliers and consumers. In order for the Bill to work, retailers must be prepared to engage and co-operate with suppliers. In these days of ethical consumerism, it would be in their interests, so I hope that they will play their part.

In Committee I expressed my concern about some of the ambiguity in the Bill, especially the provisions in clause 13, which refer to "all reasonable steps" to be taken by labour employers such as farmers to ensure that a gangmaster holds a valid licence. I understand that the definition of reasonable steps will be elaborated on in secondary legislation, and I understand why that is necessary. However, it would be helpful to have an assurance from the Minister today that that will be subject to the fullest consultation with the industry. It is essential that those reasonable steps be practical. Farmers will often require labour at short notice, sometimes in the middle of the night while in the middle of a field. It is essential that a gangmasters' register is available 24 hours a day, seven days a week, and is up to date, to ensure that a gangmaster's licence is valid. The only way that can happen is if the register is an online, computer-accessed facility, so that a farmer can access it via a laptop in the middle of a field in the middle of the night.

It is still unclear what steps a farmer or packhouse owner will have to take to ensure that he is not liable for employing an unlicensed gangmaster. It is also unclear from the Bill how far the liability would extend. For instance, would a large retailer which sold produce knowingly harvested or produced by an unlicensed gangmaster be liable to prosecution? Paragraph 44 of the EFRA most recent report, paragraph 44 recommended that the Government consider extending liability to retailers. Has the Minister considered that suggestion and, if so, has he reached any conclusions?

I have previously expressed concerns about the lack of detail available regarding secondary legislation. That point was also raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire and the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras. I understand why flexibility must be maintained, but the make-up of the authority is clearly hugely important. I am pleased that DEFRA has provided details of the structure and operations of the gangmaster licensing authority, and that that will be subject to affirmative procedure in the House.

In the context of the gangmaster licensing authority, the DEFRA document, in annexe 1, section 17 on "Liaison Groups and Committees", says that the authority shall establish enforcement, labour provider and labour user liaison groups. Will that be stipulated by Ministers in the regulations, or will the authority set up such groups at its discretion? Annexe 2, which refers to exclusions, is helpful in clarifying which types of work require a licence for supplying labour and which do not. I particularly welcome the exclusion of gathering shellfish using boats. Many small-scale family shellfish gatherers would otherwise be classed as gangmasters and would require licences to employ family members.

Annexe 3 suggests that the providers of workers to farmers under the seasonal agricultural workers scheme would not require a licence. That may initially seem sensible, as the organisations that operate within SAWS are perfectly legitimate. However, I am concerned by the number of SAWS workers who may have overstayed and breached their permits. In October last year, the Home Office said that it had no reliable estimate of the number of SAWS workers that had officially disappeared and failed to return to their country of origin. Surely it would be sensible to address this aperture in the immigration system before excluding the scheme from the gangmaster license. SAWS suppliers should ensure that their workers do not violate the terms of their immigration status, and that could be something that the gangmaster licensing scheme could enforce and control.

In conclusion, I broadly welcome the provisions to license gangmasters, which are long overdue. The Bill should make enforcing existing legislation easier, provide a level playing field for legitimate labour providers, and put an end to the exploitation of British and migrant workers by rogue gangmasters. However, the Bill by itself is not a complete solution, and there are still issues that need to be resolved. The Bill must ensure that the licence fee does not become too burdensome and a deterrent to legitimate labour providers, and there must be adequate enforcement and prosecution of those who continue to operate outside the law.

I specifically welcome clause 23, which states that the Secretary of State will report to Parliament once a year, analysing the performance of the scheme. I would like the Minister to clarify what form that report will take, and that if required it will involve a debate in the House. We would not want the report just to be stuck in a dusty corner of the Library. As the criminal element becomes more sophisticated and imaginative in its determination to flout the law and exploit vulnerable workers, so we must be equally determined to ensure that legislation is continually monitored and updated to enforce this Bill robustly, to the benefit of those who are exploited and to the benefit of the whole food chain.

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I am pleased to be able to respond positively to a debate that has been remarkably well informed and a detailed examination of the issues before the House. On occasions one feels that the House has skated over the surface of important issues, but that could not be said of today's debate. From the start, it has gone to the heart of the Bill.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire (Jim Sheridan) for giving me the opportunity to engage with the Bill. As many hon. Members have said, it has been a very positive process. The Bill is very different from the one considered by the House on Second Reading, but its target is the same. The Bill is now clear and specific in its design and intentions. It provides a licensing system for gangmasters, which has been debated on many occasions, but it goes further. It will create a kind of antisocial behaviour order for gangmasters, if used in the way that hon. Members who have taken an interest in it intend.

Much work has been done in a short time to get the detail of the Bill right. It has been an excellent example of co-operation and teamwork. I am pleased that hon. Members on both sides of the House have referred to DEFRA officials, because policy officials, lawyers and parliamentary counsel have demonstrated an extraordinary willingness to work hard and quickly to achieve the Bill that we now have before us. They have brought credit on themselves and the civil service in general. They have demonstrated that things can be done both quickly and carefully when the will is there.

I also support my hon. Friend's comments about the work undertaken by officials of the Transport and General Workers Union, the National Farmers Union and others. Indeed, it is fair to say that when we met informally again this week, at a meeting called by my hon. Friend, significant commitment was evident from a variety of organisations. However, the personal engagement of Jack Dromey, the deputy general secretary of the TGWU, and Tim Bennett, the president of the NFU, provided encouragement and support to their teams which was essential in evoking the co-operation necessary to achieve the result we have before us. People not only talked about the problems, they went away and tried to tease out the answers. My right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) posed some difficult questions at the beginning of the process. Having three former Cabinet Ministers—including two former Agriculture Ministers—as part of the team was very good for concentrating the mind. They each made a positive contribution.

I also wish to thank the members of the Committee, of all parties, who worked constructively with us to ensure that the Bill would be effective in delivering its objectives. By the time we reached Committee stage and Report, unseen work had been done that made a difference to the quality of the legislation. We reached the point at which the Committee's members were able to support unanimously the amendments tabled. We now have a much stronger Bill that will, I hope, continue to command the cross-party support that was evident in Committee. We have a Bill that provides for the registration and licensing of gangmasters. It will make the whole labour supply process more open and ensure that gangmasters are accountable for their actions.

Members have raised significant issues during the debate, while making it clear that they want the Bill to progress. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire, myself and the groups to which I have referred have discussed and anticipated all those points, but it is only fair to mention some of them. I was pleased that the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) referred to the way in which my noble Friend Lord Whitty has engaged with this issue. He referred to the work of Zad Padda, a young man who has shown leadership and intelligence in recognising the importance for labour providers of setting up an effective system of licensing.

To those hon. Members who have referred to how much activity is going on, I would say that the work of Operation Gangmaster is only in the headlines when a major prosecution takes place, which is often considerably after the events that have led to arrests. A number of successes have been reflected in the press and other media recently, perhaps not with as great a splash as we would wish. It is a pity that that was not reflected in the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee report. It was right to comment that the support of that Committee for the Bill, which was not given earlier, is important and welcome.

My hon. Friend the Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith) was right to underline, as other Members have, the fact that this Bill is not a panacea. Indeed, legislation is never a panacea and never a substitute for action. Previous Governments have made the mistake sometimes of engaging in frenetic activity in adding to legislation, without making a difference on the ground. We must recognise that we are dealing with illegal activity, which does not operate on the basis of convenient structures in which we can intervene without a great deal of work. We are dealing with a market in which there is flexibility, in which people change their methods of working rapidly, and in which a lot of people are not prepared to obey the law. Flexibility is what the market needs. Growers, to whom the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire referred, need help fast at particular stages in the year, but that flexibility is what makes it difficult to regulate the industry properly. I take on board the point made about the impact on lifeboat crews and the police, and the much wider ramifications of the events in Morecambe bay.

My hon. Friend the Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale rightly mentioned the damage done to legitimate labour providers. I am pleased that Members on both sides of the House have refereed to the legitimate contribution made by those who are trying to operate within the law and do things properly. The liaison between Departments and agencies, which was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire and touched on by various other Members, is a serious issue. The problem is that although liaison is often good at ministerial level and the will is there to co-operate, the situation at ground level is different. The trick is to ensure that that will is reflected on the ground.

In relation to the Bill, enforcement has two elements. Of course, there is the desire to prevent tax evasion and to ensure that the minimum wage is paid, but the two elements are enforcement by licensed gangmasters of the requirements of the agency in relation to the code of practice and so on, and making sure that we burn off those who work outside the licensing system so that they cannot undercut legitimate labour providers. Those two elements need to be looked at separately, because they are different. Enforcement in relation to those who are within the virtuous circle of licensing needs to be kept to the minimum necessary to ensure that they comply with the requirements, whereas firm and swift action is needed to ensure that those who are not licensed, and not within that virtuous circle, are unable to continue their activities.

The hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) referred to agencies and those who operate in the shadows. If somebody is operating as a gangmaster, whatever title they use or however they advertise, they are within the ambit of the legislation. One of the questions that we discussed with some care was that of employment agencies. We did not want a duplication of legislation, but we wanted to ensure that somebody could not register as an employment agency and effectively act as a gangmaster but not be caught by the provisions of the Bill. I believe that we have got the design right.

Mr. Luff: This is a technical point, and I am happy if the right hon. Gentleman wants to write to me rather than answer it now. There is one quite sophisticated packing operation in my constituency, which requires a large supply of office labour to deliver its services. If it used a recruitment agency to recruit staff for the office rather than the packing side of its operation, would that recruitment agency also be required to register as a gangmaster?

Alun Michael: As often seems to be the case, I am happy to engage in correspondence with the hon. Gentleman on arcane detail. I think the answer is that if staff were recruited to undertake activities that fall within the ambit of the Bill, that would be caught by its provisions. Were those activities outside its ambit, they would not be caught. On the other hand, if the activities are ancillary, that is the kind of area that needs to be clarified. I believe that we have ensured that the Bill casts the net as widely as possible, so that we can provide by exclusion, which is allowed for in the Bill, that those not intended to be covered are not caught. That provides flexibility in the architecture of the Bill, which I hope will be effective.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras helped at an early stage, applying his experience as a Cabinet Minister and his acute sense of the practical, by asking the most challenging questions about how the Bill would operate in the mists of the morning in some of the flatter areas of England. As a result of responding to those questions, we have improved the Bill considerably. He was absolutely right to underline the legitimate concern about swindlers who do not pay tax, national insurance or the minimum wage, and to remind us of the long history of parliamentary concern about exploitation, which goes back much further than a generation. I agree entirely that action not just in terms of co-ordinating raids but in terms of following up intervention should be made much easier, which goes to the heart of the Bill and of what I meant when I described it as providing an antisocial behaviour order for gangmasters.

A number of questions were asked about who would be caught. I was asked whether the Bill would cover workers in a meat processing plant. The Bill covers all processing and packaging of produce derived from agricultural work, which includes meat. We will consider the coverage of downstream processing activities in more detail when the regulations are made, to ensure that we do not inadvertently catch those for whom the legislation is not intended. All such work is included unless it is excluded by regulation.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) asked how quickly licences would be introduced, and whether we could ensure that there was not a long period before licences could be obtained. The Bill allows for transitional provisions, which would allow temporary registration or provisional licences, to ensure that labour providers can be brought into the licensing scheme quickly and allow us to concentrate on operating the scheme and ensuring that it restricts those who seek to break the law. The hon. Gentleman referred to his experience in East Anglia in the missionary field. I reflected that my experience was of stone picking after ploughing during bob-a-job week in north Wales—he will appreciate that there are some areas of the uplands in which stones are quite a significant crop. That activity may well come within the ambit of the Bill. I make it clear for the record that that was before my experience of the Transport and General Workers Union, when I was employed on the buses.

As the hon. Gentleman said, it is important to encourage gangmasters into the system straight away. It would be a tragedy if they hung back and waited to see what happened. We need to get them into the system and to make it clear that being outside it will not be tolerated and will lead to swift action. On the other hand, we do not want a bureaucratic system that produces just statistics. In terms of the Select Committee's comment yesterday, putting effort into bean counting is not the way to approach the matter; we want to ensure that it is unrewarding to evade the law.

Much preparation work has been done with the Ethical Trading Initiative. Two or three hon. Members have referred to the fact that the Ethical Trading Initiative has discovered some flaws in the audit system. I do not think that that is terribly surprising. Those who have been involved in the Ethical Trading Initiative have effectively had to accept an additional burden as legitimate providers of labour, while those who do not bother to get involved do not have that burden, and those who operate completely outside the law obviously avoid all sorts of overheads. The Ethical Trading Initiative and the systematic approach that some providers have sought to develop will be greatly strengthened by the legislation.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Mr. Simmonds) made a series of important points. I congratulate him on his positive approach to the Bill. He has genuinely supported it and sought to help to improve it. I hope that that does not reach the ears of the Leader of the Opposition and damage the hon. Gentleman's political career. He showed himself to be courageous, even adventurous, by referring to immigration policy. I gently remind him that the Leader of the Opposition had personal responsibility for immigration policy as well as wider areas of the law for a number of years. I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman was wise to draw that to the attention of the House because it was not exactly the most productive period, in respect of either immigration policy or enforcement of the law.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the scope and execution of subsidiary legislation. We are trying to give the shape of the subsidiary legislation, such as on the membership of the board of the non-departmental public body that will run the scheme, so that, as has already happened, points can be made about whether there is a gap, or whether the balance of the membership is right to ensure that the expertise is there. The final version of the statutory instrument that provides for the membership of the board will follow soon after the legislation has reached the statute book, but we have outlined a proposed membership, which was not dreamt up within the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs but arises from the discussions that I referred to earlier with all the participants to try to ensure that we get it right. That is the way we are approaching the subsidiary legislation generally: we aim to develop policy and the drafting at the same time as the Bill goes through the House, and to give as much clarity as possible to those who will look at the Bill in another place as to how the provisions will be used. That has not always been the case. My first experience of legislation in the House was with the Immigration Act 1988. The Minister who led for the then Government was Tim Renton, who later became their Chief Whip. I spent a lot of time trying to tease out of him the slightest indication of what the subsidiary legislation might look like. We even offered the old regulations as a gift-wrapped package at Christmas in the hope that he would relent and give some insight into what would happen after the Bill became law.

The position this time is very much the reverse. We are seeking to work with all the organisations and to be open with hon. Members about the way in which the subsidiary legislation will be used, because the experience of all the organisations and the application of the knowledge of hon. Members can help to get it right. We will continue in that spirit. I undertake to my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire, the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness and others who served on the Committee to keep them informed as we develop those ideas.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness made some points about delivery. We could give the impression that nothing much is going on. The message needs to go out that a lot is going on in order to catch those who are defrauding the Exchequer as well as undertaking exploitation. Operation Gangmaster has delivered benefits to the Exchequer of some £10.6 million in 2002–03. That includes recovery of income tax worth some £4 million and a reduction in benefit fraud through the prevention of claiming benefits while working. Government enforcement action has led to a number of high-profile arrests and prosecutions of gangmasters in recent weeks.

The Department for Work and Pensions has identified 235 over-payments and 1,023 adjustments to benefits worth £405,000, securing 138 sanctions and prosecutions. The Inland Revenue specialist team is settling 46 inquiries and reviews, and identifying unpaid tax and national insurance contributions worth £4.3 million. In addition, there have been criminal prosecutions of 14 gangmasters for VAT offences involving £5.9 million and resulting in prison sentences totalling 31 years.

Some of those recoveries have been done without the sort of prosecutions that bring the matter into the public eye and lead to headlines, but people should be in no doubt that enforcement measures and co-operation between Departments are having a positive effect.

Mr. Luff: Would the right hon. Gentleman take this opportunity to remind police forces that another area where enforcement is very important is traffic offences? It would be helpful if police forces showed more enthusiasm to tackle the obvious white mini-buses that run around illegally.

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman makes his point effectively. It is always difficult for the police to balance the different requirements and, indeed, the different calls on their time from hon. Members, but I am sure that, as a result of recent events, the police are well aware that there is an issue here that is not just about casual labour—it is about a number of much more serious things. Indeed, the Home Secretary and members of his team have made it clear how important they regard those issues.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness referred to the regulatory impact assessment and was concerned about the cost to small-scale providers. That issue needs to be addressed. On the one hand, we want a licensing system under which the charge and the means for assessing it are as simple as possible, while on the other we must ensure that we do not set up a perverse incentive for smaller-scale providers. That is one of the issues that we want the partners to discuss both before the establishment of the agency, and within the agency, as soon as the shadow board is in place.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness referred to accommodation costs and, if I understood him correctly, made us an offer that we cannot refuse—free accommodation in his constituency. We do not envisage that the accommodation will have to be in Whitehall, so we are open to offers, even from Boston and Skegness. I can assure him that we shall certainly not be gold-plating the accommodation costs. Currently, all the costs are of an indicative nature. The very fact that the board will include representatives of those who will have to pay the licensing fees will, I hope, help to ensure proper scrutiny of the proposals so that costs are kept to a minimum. That will obviously have a knock-on effect on licence fees.

Mr. Dobson: The concept that the licensing system should pay for itself seems reasonable, but this point has just occurred to me: is there any possibility that some of the money obtained from prosecuting the villains could also be used to finance the enforcement system, on the polluter pays principle? The villains are the polluters.

Alun Michael: My right hon. Friend has vast experience of hypothecation and of attempts to persuade the Exchequer that any income it derives should be directed back to the activity whence that money came, so he can anticipate my answer. However, we have acknowledged that as well as operating the licence system and ensuring that those who are licensed obey the licensing terms, there is also a need for enforcement in respect of people who are not licensed or who have had their licence withdrawn. The Government should take responsibility for that, to ensure that inappropriate burdens are not put on the licence fee and on legitimate gangmasters.

Mr. Luff: Until the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) put his question, I had not thought about that point either. In fact, there is a precedent in government. We are told that speed cameras pay for themselves and surpluses go to the Exchequer, so perhaps the fines under this system could pay for the authority and the surplus could go to the Exchequer.

Alun Michael: It is clear that the hon. Gentleman has not thought that idea through. He would not have made that proposal when his party was in government. I was involved in the discussions about the return of money from speed camera fines and can tell him that it takes an awful lot of evidence to persuade the Treasury that it should go along with such proposals. I do not think we need to take that route.

There are advantages to the Exchequer in the prosecution of people who do not pay tax and so on, which create an incentive for the application of the law in different ways. As I said, we have looked into DEFRA's enforcement role, as well as into co-operation between different enforcement agencies. In fact, groups will be set up under the Bill to ensure that the agency liaises with labour providers and other enforcement agencies. The agency will set up those liaison groups to ensure that the process is joined up and that the groups are practical and effective and do not merely fulfil a theoretical requirement. I hope the hon. Gentleman will accept that the important thing is that the process should be rooted in what happens in practice and that the different interests of enforcers and labour providers, as well as the overall policy on the operation of the licence system, are considered in the liaison groups. The board will bring all the significant players together and we have designed the Bill so that we can achieve a balance between specific and overall interests.

The hon. Member for Boston and Skegness asked about retailers absorbing costs. It is important that we have an indication from the supermarkets, the British Retail Consortium and others of their commitment to the licence process and the need to follow it through in practice. We shall be discussing that with them.

In response to another point made by the hon. Gentleman, I can promise that we shall hold the fullest consultation with the industry and ensure that everyone has a chance to comment on the process as it is developed. We want fast access to information on the ground, because unless the police and others who operate the licence system are able to get information quickly, we shall be unable to draw a firm line between legitimate, licensed gangmasters and those who operate outside the law, which is obviously the focus that we need.

That process will be helped by the work that Home Office Ministers are undertaking to simplify and clarify the authorising of overseas workers in this country, so that they can show that they are in the UK legitimately. The system has been over-complex in the past, but the need to demonstrate legitimacy is fully understood and that is important for labour providers and other employers.

I think that I have referred to the liaison groups and covered most of the points raised in the debate.

Mr. Simmonds: Will the Minister deal with the final point that I made about the implications of the seasonal agricultural workers scheme, which is referred to in annexe 3 of the regulatory impact assessment? I understand why it has been excluded, at least initially, from the provisions in the Bill, but I hope that he will deal with several of the issues that I highlighted in my remarks.

Alun Michael: I am happy to consider the hon. Gentleman's points in detail. We believe that the seasonal agricultural workers scheme is carefully designed, so the possibility of it being used as cover for illegitimate activity would not arise. However, I am happy to reconsider that and to write to him with the details.

I referred to the Bill as creating an antisocial behaviour order for gangmasters. The licensing scheme will provide a further tool for us to use in the fight against the exploitative activities of illegitimate gangmasters—those who are not concerned with obeying the law. It provides robust enforcement powers to support that objective.

The Bill also ensures a high degree of stakeholder involvement in the detailed design and operation of the new licensing arrangements. I reinforce the point made at the beginning of the debate by my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire when he outlined the Bill's impact and how it would work. It creates a new non-departmental public body to operate the licensing scheme. We want to make sure that it is not an unnecessary piece of bureaucracy and that the Bill will bring together key stakeholders and the Government to steer and operate the new licensing arrangements so that those who provide labour do so in a way that is within the law and is not exploitative. Therefore, the names of the providers of labour who act properly and within the law will not be tarnished by the activities of the lawbreakers, the thugs and those who have no respect for the law.

It is important that there should be commitment to the licensing scheme from all sectors of the industry, from producer to supermarket. The representation on the board secures that engagement. The involvement of stakeholders will also ensure that the conditions attached to a licence balance our wish to see an end to the exploitation of vulnerable workers with the need to ensure that the licensing arrangements do not place unnecessary burdens on labour providers and others in the fresh produce supply chain. That is why the licence fees will be set by the licensing authority in discussion with the Government.

Reference has already been made to the fact that the indicative costings suggest that the fee could be between £1,750 and £2,250 for a three-year licence, but those figures will be need to be reviewed once we have a clearer idea of the conditions that the licensing authority thinks should be attached to a licence. Again, that involves the engagement of all sides of the industry. Although the licensing authority will have day-to-day responsibility for the operation of the licensing scheme, the Government will also have an important role to play. In particular, we will establish and fund an independent appeals mechanism for the licensing process. That will ensure that labour providers can appeal against decisions taken by the authority involving the issue and withdrawal of licences.

At the beginning of the debate, my hon. Friend the Member for West Renfrewshire stressed the importance of enforcement, as others have. Co-ordinated action and being proactive are important. We will also put in place robust enforcement arrangements to deal with the criminal offences created by the Bill. It gives the Secretary of State responsibility for the appointment of enforcement officers. That ensures that officers from existing enforcement agencies can utilise the new criminal offences to tackle gangmasters when this helps to deliver departmental enforcement objectives—in a sense, the antisocial behaviour order aspect of the Bill. We are also considering making additional resources available to increase the number of enforcement officers operating in this area, and we will be looking to secure police co-operation when appropriate.

Enforcement activities need to be intelligence-led. The powers of entry and arrest provided for under the Bill will be used when necessary, but I reassure the House that all enforcement officers will be trained appropriately before they are given the authority to exercise these powers. There may be considerable merit in including housing enforcement officers within the Bill's ambit, effectively to facilitate a one-stop shop approach to licensing and enforcement, but we have made it clear where the different responsibilities lie. That will also ensure that enforcement officers have ready access to information on gangmaster activities flowing from the licensing scheme.

Information sharing will be a key element in the successful introduction of the licensing scheme, so the Bill creates a two-way flow of information between the Government and the licensing authority. Again, that will ensure that the authority can take fully informed decisions on whether a licence should be issued or withdrawn. It will also provide valuable intelligence for Government enforcement bodies.

The Bill also provides for robust maximum penalties. I said that the intention is that if an offence is committed, prosecution can follow rapidly, but should there be repeat offences, we would hope that the courts use the higher penalties quickly to burn off any idea that offenders can get away with it, because that would do great damage to the licensing scheme and, again, provide succour to those who do not respect the law.

It has been underlined that much of the licensing scheme remains to be clarified in regulations. I have stressed that despite our wish to see licensing introduced as quickly as possible, there will be full consultation at every stage of the regulation-making process. We intend to set out our ideas as early as possible so that that discursive opportunity is used and that we get it right. That will enable us to move quickly once the legislation is on the statute book. The key regulations on the operation of the licensing authority will be presented to the House for detailed consideration. That is appropriate and reflects our wish to ensure that everyone has a chance to consider the detail of the new arrangements.

We have come a long way since Second Reading, and we still have some way to go before a fully operational licensing scheme can be introduced. However, I hope that the House agrees that the Bill provides a firm foundation. We understand the industry's need for a flexible labour supply, but that flexibility cannot be provided at the expense of workers. Licensing will oblige gangmasters to operate their businesses ethically. It will create a clear distinction between legal and illegal operators and strengthen the ability to enforce the law in a variety of ways. It provides the ability to ensure that those gangmasters who operate without a licence are prevented from doing so and that legitimate labour providers know that those who are willing to use any means to undercut them will be put out of business in short order. That will strengthen the legitimate part of the business. There can be no place for unlicensed gangmasters in future.

As many hon. Members said, the Bill is characterised by the tremendous spirit of co-operation displayed by all those involved with it. That has helped to ensure its speedy development and passage to this point. I hope that that spirit of co-operation continues and that the Bill successfully completes its passage through Parliament. Indeed, I hope that the spirit of co-operation will also help to guarantee the success of the new licensing arrangements. I commend the Bill to the House as a positive response to the problems caused by gangmasters who are willing to exploit those who cannot look after themselves.

Jim Sheridan: With the leave of the House, I want to thank right hon. and hon. Members for their support, especially those who made such powerful and eloquent contributions to the debate, not only in the Chamber today but throughout the parliamentary process. In particular, I thank those people who gave me the benefit of their advice and experience, which was extremely helpful.

Again, I express my gratitude to the Minister and his officials, not only for their hard work, but for the receptive way in which they accepted the changes that we proposed and for the expeditious manner in which they responded to those suggestions. I must say, however, that I was somewhat surprised when the Minister referred to "Bob-a-job". I had not thought that he was of an age to be able to feel nostalgic about that worthwhile experience. Finally, I also want to thank the broad coalition that has supported the Bill every step of the way.

We are all too aware that, today, politicians have a less than glowing reputation. Election turnouts are at an all-time low, voters are disengaged and opinion polls rank us somewhere between estate agents and loan sharks in the popularity stakes. That is little wonder in an age when the public perception is that politicians would rather trade insults at the Dispatch Box than work together to solve problems and that politics is more about delivering memorable soundbites than about developing workable policies. It is therefore very easy to be cynical about what we, as MPs, can achieve during our time on these Benches, but today we can achieve something—we can effect real, lasting and positive change. Today, we have a rare chance to do what we were elected to do: to make a difference.

The Bill represents a different kind of politics. It is not the product of political point scoring; instead, it has been born out of partnership, consensus and reasoned debate between workers and employers, between Government and industry and between Members from every party in the House. At this point I want to pay tribute to the hon. Member for Boston and Skegness (Mr. Simmonds), who has worked tirelessly alongside the rest of us on the Bill and should be congratulated on that. Perhaps most importantly of all, the Bill is not driven by slogans and spin; instead, it is inspired by ideas and motivated by principles.

It has been said on a number of occasions that the Bill is not a panacea, and I have never said that it will cure every ill or right every wrong, but it will make a difference. It will serve and protect those who, by electing us to this House, give us not only their votes but their trust. So, yes, the Bill may be only one small step towards ending worker exploitation, but it is a step in the right direction, and it is a step on a journey that social justice and workplace dignity demand we take. Good law can do great things, and this Bill makes for good law. I therefore thank the House for its indulgence and ask for its support.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Town and Country Planning (Telecommunications Masts) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

12.8 pm

Mr. Richard Spring (West Suffolk): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The measures in the Bill are of significance to many people in my constituency and other constituencies up and down the country. At the outset I should like to put on record my appreciation for the overwhelming cross-party support that I have received and the enormous encouragement from outside the House. Since the Bill's First Reading, my postbag has been filled with letters from the four corners of the country expressing support.

In particular, I would like to thank the pressure groups Planning Sanity and Mast Sanity, which have been a constant source of encouragement and assistance. I would also like to thank Mr. Mike Bell, chairman of the Radiation Research Trust, and his team, whose support has been invaluable. Finally, Mrs. Sarah Webster of Bridgetown in Devon deserves, in particular, to be thanked in this debate. She is a dedicated and passionate campaigner on the issue of transmission masts who has helped me to understand in the clearest possible terms the impact it has had on the lives of so many people. She has put me in contact with people across the United Kingdom who are suffering from serious ill health that they attribute to transmission masts and base stations.

I have the fullest support of the two local councils in my constituency, Forest Heath district council and St. Edmundsbury borough council. I have consulted and have the fullest support of the Local Government Association, which is backing the Bill having canvassed the views of the local authorities it represents. I make no party political point when I say that many people in this country feel that the power to influence their lives and their local communities has slipped away from them over the years. It is extraordinary that the construction of masts that are so visible and so intrusive is a matter over which, in practice, local people have no control.

Far too many Members of Parliament have sent e-mails and letters of support to name each individually; none the less, I should mention my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe), who has campaigned for greater regulation in this area for several years—indeed, she preceded many in her calls for the effects of transmission masts on health to be researched much more rigorously. Many other Members have discussed the subject and their constituency concerns with me, not least my right hon. Friends the Members for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot) and for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young), and my hon. Friends the Members for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning), for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter), for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Soames), for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous), for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) and for East Surrey (Mr. Ainsworth), as well as many others across the political divide, most notably, my fellow Suffolk Members of Parliament.

In the past few years, there have been several Adjournment debates on the impact of transmission masts on health and on the environment, including one that I introduced last March. I should be surprised if any Member of Parliament has not at some point received correspondence on the issue from a constituent. Action to defuse a national groundswell of public anxiety is long overdue, and I want action to be taken on three fronts in particular.

First, the Government should accept the need for more research to investigate the genuine cases of ill health and the health concerns felt by sensible, rational people. Secondly, the precautionary principle advocated by Sir William Stewart when he was a Government senior advisor should mean that, in most cases, masts should not be placed too close to people's homes, schools and hospitals. The Government might wish to draw up new guidelines to put that into practice. Thirdly, a change should be made to paragraph 40 of policy planning guidance note 8 to enable the councillors who have to make planning decisions to take the views of those whom they represent into account in a balanced and objective way.

I note that, earlier this year, the National Radiological Protection Board published research that broadly confirms what Sir William Stewart stated four years previously:

"There is now scientific evidence, however, which suggests that there may be biological effects occurring at exposures below these guidelines . . . We conclude . . . that it is not possible at present to say that exposure to RF radiation,"— radiofrequency radiation—

"even at levels below national guidelines, is totally without potential adverse health effects, and that the gaps in knowledge are sufficient to justify a precautionary approach".

With such uncertainty continuing to hang over transmission masts, there is a clear need for more specific research.

My Bill addresses the other two calls for action. If it is enacted, every application for planning permission for a mast must be accompanied by a certificate that sets out the area and maximum range of the beam of greatest intensity. If that falls on part of any premises or land occupied by an education or medical facility, or a residential property, planning permission will not be granted. Furthermore, every application must also be accompanied by a precautionary principle statement. If the statement indicates that there is a threat of serious damage to heath or to the environment, the fact that there is no full scientific certainty about the health impact of mast radiation shall not constitute a reason to ignore the precautionary statement and grant planning permission. Those measures are significant and will place the power to accept or reject applications clearly in the hands of local authorities. I shall return to those points later in my speech, for I now want to concentrate on why I feel that those measures are necessary.

My interest in this matter was provoked by constituents of mine who wrote to me on numerous occasions to relay their fears that mobile phone masts have a detrimental effect on their health. Nausea, dizziness and headaches are just some of the symptoms that a number of my constituents tell me have affected them since a transmission mast was erected near their homes. One notable, specific case is that of Mark Wheal, who first brought this to my attention on behalf of himself and his anxious neighbours. Elsewhere, schoolchildren have suffered from nosebleeds, insomnia and, indeed, behavioural changes allegedly because a mast has been erected near their school.

When a cluster of transmission masts was placed on a water tower at Haverhill in my constituency, there were some curious consequences. Almost immediately, the squirrels and birds disappeared. Doris Barnes, who lived with her nephew, John Insole, began to have a series of what appeared to be strokes. Dementia began quickly to set in, and she needed 24-hour care. Her bedroom had been in the path of the beam of greatest intensity of the transmitter. As the Insoles inevitably found it difficult to cope, and on their GP's advice, she was put in a care home in a village nearby. Almost immediately, her health substantially recovered, and there was no apparent explanation. Those constituents of mine are rational individuals, I find it difficult to reject out of hand their belief that radiation from masts is responsible for their ill health. I also find it difficult to believe that there has been some sort of outbreak of mass hysteria in many parts of the country in relation to concerns about such masts.

I have led grass-roots campaigns in Newmarket and Haverhill—two towns in my constituency—against mobile phone masts that were near schools, residential property and centres of population. In one instance, the behaviour of the mobile telecommunications company involved was literally underhand and unscrupulous. A TETRA mast was erected on a block of flats in Newmarket. After a strong campaign, agreement was reached that the mast should be moved. I thought that I had brokered an agreement for its removal to a location on a hill just outside the town. Then, one morning, we all woke up to find that it had been erected in another part of the town—technically, not in Suffolk, but in neighbouring Cambridgeshire. Townspeople were understandably outraged. Indeed, the Suffolk constabulary were deeply embarrassed as well. The local district council sought to have the mast removed, but lost on appeal. The company was simply not interested in discussing alternative sites for a compromise, despite assurances having been given to me.

Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West) (Lab): I am deeply grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. We have discussed this matter several times. Will he confirm that the contractor for the O_2 system in his constituency was, in fact, O_2 Airwave?

Mr. Spring: Yes, I can certainly confirm that. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for being present because I shall now address specifically something that is of particular interest to him.

That behaviour is totally and disgracefully at odds with the code of best practice on mobile phone network development. That telecommunications company followed none of the guidance issued by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. Indeed, let me read to the House an extract from the foreword of the code of best practice:

"Strategic planning, combined with proper discussion of and consultation on proposals for developing the telecommunications network, is central to this process. This requires operators, local authorities and local people working together in partnership to produce optimum solutions.

In August 2001, we introduced improved planning arrangements for telecommunications development. These included greater requirements for consulting local people."

[Mr. Spring]

The document goes on to say that the one of the main aims of the code is to "encourage better communication and consultation at all stages of network development between operators, local authorities and local people."

Those words will come as a cruel joke to the people of Newmarket, whose deep concern and anxiety have been ignored.

Operators have devised what they call "the traffic light model" to enable them to rate a site according to likely sensitivities. It is intended as a guide to the degree of consultation necessary. One of the factors that is supposed to be considered before a mast is given green, amber or red status is the involvement of the local Member of Parliament. My concerns have been routinely ignored.

Furthermore, PPG8 already makes it clear that where there are plans to install, alter or replace an installation close to a school or college, the institution should be consulted before an application is submitted to the local authority. The mast in my constituency in Newmarket, which was moved to the neighbouring constituency in Cambridgeshire, is close to three schools, none of which was ever consulted. Schools never are.

Since I indicated my intention to present the Bill, I have discovered that the pattern is repeated right across the country. Such is the frustration of local residents that groups of concerned protesters have torn down masts and forcibly tried to block new installations. I shall quote from some of the letters I have received from worried people across the country.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): The hon. Gentleman will not be surprised to hear tales from my part of the country too, where, when masts are upgraded to secure greater 3G benefits, that is happening without any consultation whatever.

Mr. Spring: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point. When an industry acts in that way, it divorces itself from people's anxieties. That is at the heart of the problem. There is no effective control of the process to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

I shall describe some of the worries expressed to me in letters, so that the House will be under no illusion about the severity of the problem. Mrs. Lin Ansell of Liss in Hampshire tells me of the impact of a mast outside her home. She writes:

"We experienced a phenomenon here in Liss regarding the Tetra mast sited between 120 and 300 metres from our houses. On Wednesday 29th October, 17 of the residents including 4 children experienced ill health, disturbance and disorientation. We were having a residents meeting at the time when we expressed our concern about how ill we and members of our family were feeling. We got better on the following Friday, and we found later (AFTER we had experienced these various symptoms) that the Tetra mast had been turned on during Wednesday and turned off on the Friday. . .

Since the mast was switched on for good, I have a permanent headache, metallic taste in my mouth and feel sick. We have moved into a back bedroom, and my friends who have come to stay complain of headaches and sleeplessness. I have been unable to offer the house to lodgers because of the illness felt by guests. This has deprived me of my health and my income. Are you able to offer any help in our hour of need?"

More disturbingly and tragically, I have received information that describes serious illnesses such as cancer, which sufferers ascribe to masts near their home. In Ballygawley, Northern Ireland, five homes amid rural farmland make up the hamlet of Cranlome Hill. Those houses are within 100 m of a transmission mast. In those five homes there are six cases of serious life-threatening cancer. The people who live in the houses lead healthy lives, with plenty of exercise and a good diet. Many would find it an unsustainable argument that the ill health may not be connected in some way to the unwelcome mast. Mr. Walter Graham, chairman of the campaign group, Northern Ireland Opposing Masts, explained to me in a letter the symptoms of local people living close to the mast:

"Our most recent member is a small rural area between Ballygawley and Dunganon known as the Cranlome Hill mast. Local citizens concerned for their health cut down the mast after their group of five homes at the bottom of the hill from the mast had six people with cancer. Four are now dead. The mast had thirty-five pieces of microwave equipment with another four due to go up. They even had cancer appear in a six-month-old cow kept in the field with the mast."

Mr. Graham goes on to speak about another mast in Saintfield. He says:

"I spoke at a public meeting in Saintfield, which has had two masts for a number of years. During question time a woman stated that she had had a daughter with leukaemia within a half mile of the masts and that she had contacted the health board asking about other children with the disease. They found eleven children under eleven with leukaemia and seven adults with cancer, all within a half mile of the masts. It has since been reported that a farmer two miles out of Saintfield, who has a mast in his field near the house, has had his child come down with leukaemia."

Any Member of the House present during the debate introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Mitchell) on 28 January could not have been left but deeply concerned after hearing of the cancer cluster in the hamlet of Wishaw. The chairman of the local action group, Sutton Coldfield residents against masts, Eileen O'Connor, an exceptionally brave lady herself who has battled against cancer, catalogues the ill-health in the tiny hamlet. She says:

"Five ladies developed breast cancer

One case of prostate cancer

One bladder cancer

One lung cancer

Three cases of pre-cancer cervical cells

One motor neurone disease age 51, who also had massive tumour removed from the top of his spine

People have developed benign lumps

Electro sensitivity

Three cases of severe skin rashes

Many villagers suffering with sleep problems, headaches, dizziness and low immune system problems.

Out of the eighteen houses surrounding the mast at up to a range of 500 metres, 77 per cent. of the tiny hamlet has health-related illness believed to be as a result of radiation from the mast. The outbreak of illness occurred in 2001 after seven years of exposure to the radiation emitted by the T-Mobile mast. We are now in connection with many people who are suffering from this form of radiation.

One other important fact is that since the Wishaw Mast was vandalised on 6th November 2003, many of the residents are reporting a feeling of well-being. The residents are reporting improvements in their sleep patterns and increased energy levels. The headaches and dizzy symptoms have disappeared".

The time is at hand to react to those tragic cases of ill health with a precautionary approach to the siting of masts. It is all that we can do in the absence of long-term definitive knowledge about the impact of radiation. The present law is woefully inadequate, with numerous loopholes that mobile phone companies are able to exploit at will. The hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) has just indicated one. Masts below 15 m do not even require planning permission. This means that masts can be erected without a full check on the suitability of the site by local councillors. If that state of affairs was not bad enough, masts erected on land owned by Network Rail require no planning permission whatever. It is wrong that these structures can be erected with such ease when there are still so many question marks over their impact on health. If enacted, my Bill would require that the transmission masts go through the full planning permission procedure, regardless of their height or whether they are on land owned by Network Rail.

The case is different elsewhere in the world where the large questions over the health impact of masts is recognised. UK Government policy concerning human exposure to the electromagnetic fields emitted by mobile telecommunication base stations is based on compliance with the safety levels published by the International Commission on Non-Ionizing Radiation Protection. These levels are much higher than in Italy and Switzerland, and even than in China and Russia. In Italy, the national public limit for people exposed for more than four hours a day is 90 times lower than the ICNIRP value. A mast in Haverhill in my constituency complies with UK emission levels but would not have been allowed in other countries. Such disparities may be based on conflicting scientific information, so it is incumbent on us to access the best worldwide scientific research to try to plug the gaps in our knowledge.

I turn now to how my Bill may help to prevent many of the disturbing cases that I have described to the House. I have already touched on how it would amend existing legislation, bringing within the full planning process all applications to erect a mast. Furthermore, I have spoken about how the Bill would embrace the precautionary principle by requiring the publication of a statement that shows how the mast adheres to that principle. Considering that an application should already be accompanied by an explanation of an operator's needs in a particular area, details of the location and type of telecommunications apparatus or structure to be constructed, details of any other mobile phone systems on the site, the area of search and details of possible alternative options where appropriate—these may include other methods of providing the required coverage—design options for particular sites, a traffic light model rating and the proposed consultation strategy, I do not think that a precautionary principle statement would be too much of a burden. It seems sensible that such a statement should be made available to the public and that an appeal to the Secretary of State must take into account its contents. The fact that there is no full scientific certainty about the health impact of mast radiation should not constitute a reason to ignore the precautionary statement and grant planning permission.

Let me turn to the other measures in the Bill. I want to reduce from six months to three months the time for which telecommunications companies are allowed to install cumbersome, temporary, movable apparatus to replace unserviceable apparatus. New apparatus has to be of the same type and capacity as the unserviceable apparatus that it is to replace. That measure is important, as it will place the emphasis on telecommunications companies to repair their equipment quickly and with as little inconvenience to local residents as possible.

My Bill would also allow schools and hospitals to cancel contracts that they have entered into with telecommunications companies agreeing to the erection of installations on their land or premises. Once an application to cancel a contract has been served by a school or hospital, the mast must stop being used within 28 days. Many schools and hospitals might have entered into such agreements before the possible health effects of masts were known as they are now. It is only fair that they should have the opportunity to cancel those agreements in the light of new research. I know of parents and head teachers in my constituency who would strongly welcome the measure.

I do not pretend to be a scientist and I cannot possibly make scientific judgments. My interest in this subject has arisen from real-life experiences and some, admittedly minority opinion, research. Finally, I would like to read a copy of a letter that I received from Mrs. Jane Lee of Budleigh Salterton in Devon, a lady who lost a legal battle with Orange earlier in the year, as I want to show the House in the clearest possible terms how the law is stacked in favour of the telecommunications companies, and to what lengths ordinary people have gone in order to prevent masts from being placed outside their homes. She writes:

"I am severely disabled and now in an extremely serious financial situation. The reasons for this are:

1. I have just lost an expensive legal battle to stop Orange putting up a mast that would focus the beam of greatest intensity directly onto my home.

2. Now that this mast has been allowed, my local estate agent tells me that I will probably lose a third of the value of my home.

3. In order to protect my own and my family's health, I feel I am being forced to move. It will be hard to find another bungalow in this area that I can afford and adapt to my special needs. Worse, in order to find another home that I can afford I may have to move away from my family and friends who are my support.

I have seen other people who have been made ill by low level radiation from masts beaming into their homes. I refuse to have this imposed on myself, my family or on my neighbours. I have therefore fought 4 battles over 2½ years. The stress of this has meant that I have hardly slept in the last 12 months and been driven to near despair.

As my house is worth over £100,000 I cannot get legal aid. In losing my high court battle, I have to pay costs, which I cannot afford. As few people will risk living so close to a mast I am about to lose a third of the only capital I will ever have (due to my disability I am unable to earn money to replace this). I have lived here for over 7 years and am heartbroken at the prospect of losing the home I love."

Since being drawn in the private Members' ballot I have been sent more than 500 letters from individuals and organisations offering me alternative Bills, but this issue needs urgent legislation and attention. My Bill is sound and comprehensive, and I hope that my arguments in the House today and the impressive cross-party support that I have received show that we can reach a sensible consensus should the Bill reach its Committee stage. Without a shadow of doubt, legislation is required.

The Bill gives the power to local authorities to decide where transmission masts should be erected. I understand that mobile phones will not work without the supporting infrastructure—the masts—and want people to benefit from greater choice and network coverage, but that can be achieved while minimising the possible health risks to members of the public. I urge the House to support the Bill today, to carry it through Committee and to turn it into law.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) on introducing the Bill, which I support. The Bill is built around the precautionary principle and reflects concerns about the risks posed by mobile phone mast stations and people's fears of them.

Although the risks posed by using a mobile phone are well known to hon. Members, many of whom walk around with mobile phones glued to the sides of their faces, the scientific community has not yet agreed the risks posed by mobile phone stations—the risk is not an established fact. Indeed, the hon. Member for West Suffolk has included this fair and honest statement on his website:

"Recent studies have discovered no link between poor health and exposure to radiation that is emitted from the masts."

However, we all know three perfectly plain things. First, as yet, no study can gauge the long-term effects of consistent exposure to masts and their radiation, and it will take decades correctly to establish that point. Cigarettes were not originally known to be carcinogenic, and the initial use of a cigarette does not produce a change in cells, but over time sustained exposure has that effect. Formula milk, as opposed to breast milk, has only recently been discovered to have long-term risks, which were previously unidentified.

Secondly, we know that some people are affected more than others by base stations because they are more in the line of fire, which causes an effect. The debate is not about whether there is an effect, but whether the effect is harmful, and, if so, exactly how harmful it is. Even the Stewart report acknowledges that children are potentially more at risk.

Thirdly—this is the key factor that impresses anyone involved in a mast campaign—those affected or those who believe that they are affected are not at liberty to move out of the way of the mast. They live in the area, they are residents, their children play in the area and they are inevitably affected, and not by their choice.

Additionally, it is fairly obvious that a new generation of masts may well magnify some of the purported effects of the current masts. I pay tribute to activists in my constituency, and particularly to Geoff Williams and "Mast Sanity", which has done a lot to alert me to the increase in phone masts, which is almost unknown to the general public.

The Bill does two positive things. It forces the developers of masts formally to state that their masts generate no harm and that they are, in a sense, safe, which is good. It also urges people to identify the groups who are in the line of fire—the beam of maximum intensity. I am sure that the phone companies will not welcome either of those provisions. A declaration of safety, however and whenever given, is to some extent a legal hostage to fortune and can be produced later if any evidence should arrive. That will innately make the mast manufacturers and the mobile phone companies a little more cautious. Moreover, it will define, or force a definition of, the people who are most at risk, who might later wish to make a claim.

The one good thing that that will do is concentrate the minds of both developers and councillors, by making them think specifically about who may be affected and about the long-term effects. It will not guarantee that everything goes perfectly for the mast protesters, or that every proposal that they object to is turned down. In particular, it will do nothing to affect mast developers' rights of appeal. They will still be able to appeal, and win their appeal.

Mast developers will, I guess, feel reasonably legally safe if they act according to the best knowledge at the time, regardless of what subsequent developments and scientific knowledge may show up. Ultimately, however, they will not be that protected, because they will be working in a transparent regime. They will feel that bit less comfortable if the Bill reaches the statute book.

Legally, the Bill will not make a seismic change or radically reduce mast developers' rights as some of us may wish. Culturally, however, the change could be significant.

Jim Dowd: In the context of cultural change, does the hon. Gentleman share my view that although this is one of the most sensitive and delicate issues for communities throughout the country, the uniform experience of Members of Parliament is that the mobile operators act with haughty and contemptuous disdain, when they ought to be engaging most closely with the communities that are alarmed by their proposals?

Dr. Pugh: The hon. Gentleman is right. Mast operators talk a better game than they play. They see Members of Parliament from time to time and tell them about their commitments, but as the hon. Member for West Suffolk said, when applications are made, particularly when they are sensitive, we are not always consulted.

We want cultural change and a swing in favour of local authority power. We want the siting of masts to be more collaborative and consensual, with a greater role for the local authority to say where they should go—for example, places where there would be less public opposition. I would like local authorities to play a more directive role, but the Bill does not do much to lead them in that direction. The hon. Member for West Suffolk talked about local authorities being only too willing, but he must be blessed in that respect. Local authorities in many parts of the country want a directive role, but there are some that are not so aggressive. For example, my own local authority seems to accept that the siting of masts in residential areas can be responded to with a shrug, whereas it prohibits masts on the end of a pier. Consequently, in my constituency the fish are better protected than the population.

The Bill is a first step forward, not a massive breakthrough. As the hon. Gentleman said, if he had drafted a more aggressive Bill, it would have been shot down in flames right at the start. It does, however, have real potential. It is a positive way forward, which could produce some kind of cultural change, and it should certainly have a Second Reading.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): I support the Bill that my hon. Friend the Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) has brought before the House with his customary elegance and attention to detail. It is greatly to his credit that he has provided the House with an opportunity to debate this important subject, and I congratulate him accordingly.

I doubt whether there is a Member in the Chamber today who has not at some time or another had a letter, e-mail or phone call from a constituent concerned about the impact of mobile telephone masts on health or quality of life. Many will have experienced pressure groups in their constituencies campaigning on the issue. Members will undoubtedly recognise the complaints listed by my hon. Friend—nausea, dizziness, cancers, and, of course, critically, the fear of those complaints. The growth in those complaints has seemingly occurred in line with the increase in mobile telephone use, and the perception in the public's mind is that the two are linked.

The Bill would introduce several valuable measures that would protect individuals from the potential dangers of telecommunications masts. Relevant to all this—and in many ways the starting point for it—are the findings of the independent expert group on mobile telephones, chaired by Sir William Stewart, and published in May 2000. As the Stewart group found, there is no conclusive evidence of harm from emissions from mobile phones and telecommunications masts. However, the report did recommend a precautionary approach, which would indicate that the findings were far from certain. Indeed, how could they be? It is therefore important that we take the necessary precautions to protect people from potential harm.

Let nobody be in any doubt about the scale of the issue with which we are dealing. There has been a massive boom in the use of mobile phones in recent years. Figures from the Mobile Operators Association show that in 1997–98 there were 9.1 million UK mobile phone subscribers. By June 2001, that number had rocketed to 44.7 million. As at June 2003, the association noted that the number of UK mobile phone subscribers had topped 50 million people for the first time. I have also read that 6 per cent of all households already do not use landlines and rely solely upon mobile phones.

Naturally, the boom in mobile phones has led to an expansion in the number of masts across the country. According to the Mobile Operators Association, there are currently some 40,000 radio base stations in the UK. With the increasing number of mobile phone users—and the additional masts that will be needed to support the new third generation or 3G services—it is possible that this number could rise to 48,000 by 2007. That is a reasonable estimate, but it would mean many new installations across the whole country, at a time when Britain is perceived to be increasingly congested. It undoubtedly deserves some scrutiny.

The boom in mobile phone use has far surpassed the levels that were anticipated when the current planning rules relating to masts were introduced. It was as long ago as 1995 when the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order, specifically part 24 of schedule 2, was brought into law, providing certain permitted development rights for licensed telecommunications operators. Obviously certain conditions apply to those rights—the mast cannot exceed 15 metres in height, it must not be erected in a national park, conservation area or area of outstanding natural beauty, and it must not have been denied permission by the local authority within the period allowed by the order.

I am no friend of red tape, but there is a definite and pressing need to examine closely the planning laws and issues surrounding the erection of new telecommunications masts. The Bill may not prove to be the perfect tool to overhaul the planning laws on this important issue. However, given proper consideration and amendment in Committee, it would provide a useful channel for a discussion of the planning laws and could end up as a strong addition to the statute book.

I once again congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for West Suffolk on all the work that he has done to bring this issue forward. The principle he proposes has my strongest support as a Front Bencher and as an individual Member of Parliament. I urge the Government to give the Bill a Second Reading and to allow the parliamentary time necessary for due consideration.

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Keith Hill): I congratulate the hon. Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) on his placing in the ballot for private Members' Bills, and on using this opportunity to secure a debate on an important topic that is of widespread interest to Members of the House and the general public and high on the Government's agenda. I listened carefully to his contribution, as I did to those of the hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) and the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson), who I suspect may have been speaking from the Dispatch Box for the first time, in which case I congratulate him.

Before I deal with the substantive concerns of the Bill, I want to set this discussion in the wider context. It has been the Government's objective to create the most dynamic, competitive communications industry in the world, ensuring universal access to a choice of diverse services of the highest quality, and ensuring that citizens and consumers are safeguarded. There are 50 million mobile phone users in the Untied Kingdom—around 75 per cent. of the population. Take-up of this technology, which did not exist 15 years ago, has been at a remarkable rate. The UK is at the forefront of service provision of mobile communications technology and it has been estimated that the UK mobile sector contributes £18 billion to the UK economy, or about 2 per cent. of GDP.

This has been achieved by a careful balancing of the planning regulations and guidelines, which have facilitated the growth not only of existing but of new telecommunications systems, while seeking to keep the environmental impact to a minimum and addressing public health concerns. The Government believe that we have struck the right balance.

Let me assure hon. Members that very careful consideration was given to the current planning arrangements before they were introduced. The Stewart report on mobile phones and health, published in 2000, recommended that telecommunication development should be subject to the normal planning process, in order to improve local consultation. The Government considered this recommendation in detail and accepted the importance of ensuring that effective public consultation took place. As a result, in August 2001, we significantly strengthened the planning arrangements for telecommunications development. We increased the time for authorities to deal with prior approval applications from 28 and 42 days to a uniform 56 days, and strengthened public consultation requirements on prior approval procedures so that they are exactly the same as those for applications for planning permission. We also increased fees from £35 to £190 to enable authorities to carry out full public consultation.

Our revised arrangements for prior approval applications have the same consultation requirements as those for applications for planning permission. Therefore, we have met the concerns that led the Stewart group to make the recommendation for full planning permission.

Mr. Spring: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will come to this point, but can he tell the House of any instance in which an application to erect a transmission mast has been rejected on appeal? He may have set out a theoretical framework for what happens in the planning process, but in practice nothing of the kind happens. I hope that he is not suggesting that it is happening, because it is not.

Keith Hill: I defer to the hon. Gentleman, and I will check on that point. If I may, I will write to him to indicate the Government's observations on the process. Nevertheless, I reiterate that the fact remains that the full procedures are in place, and the options for appeal are there under the proper provisions of the law.

The Bill aims to bring all telecommunications development under full planning control. That is simply not realistic. The prior approval procedures give authorities time to consider proposals, but consent is deemed to be granted if no decision has been made after 56 days, so that development is not delayed. This discipline is needed because many authorities are failing to meet their best value targets for determining planning applications. Furthermore, network operators estimate that only around 15 per cent. of installations are under their permitted development rights. Those installations are by definition the smallest and most discrete of developments. We do not want to restrict those rights, because local planning authorities need to focus attention on the developments that will have the greatest impact.

The current arrangements also have the effect of encouraging network operators to install smaller apparatus on existing buildings and structures wherever possible. That minimises the environmental impact of such developments. However, the fact that those small developments do not need planning permission does not mean that there is no public consultation. The code of best practice that was produced jointly by central and local government and the mobile phone industry is clear that every potential site is rated using the traffic light model. That model determines the level of public consultation that will be required if the site is selected for the installation.

The Government believe that limiting the rights of network operators to install telecommunications equipment would be detrimental to the ability of network operators to meet public demand for mobile services and would not materially increase or improve consultation with local communities.

Jim Dowd: My right hon. Friend says that every site is rated according to the traffic light model. I do not think that that is the issue. The issue is what the mobile operators do in response to that rating. When they get a clear red indication on the model, they do absolutely nothing. How are the public reassured by that?

Keith Hill: I hope to take up those issues, which I know are of considerable concern to my hon. Friend, in the course of our proceedings today. We can deal with those concerns in greater detail at that point.

The Bill would also remove the permitted development rights afforded to railway undertakings that allow them to build masts and install antennae for their communications systems. The recent concern about those permitted development rights results from the development of masts required as part of Network Rail's new safety system, known as the global system for mobile communications for railways—GSM-R.

Network Rail is upgrading its analogue radio systems network to a digital network. GSM-R will for the first time provide a national system of secure, immediate and direct driver-to-signaller communication across the entire network. The upgrade is primarily safety driven. It will implement a key conclusion of the Cullen investigation into and report on the Ladbroke Grove rail accident and facilitate compliance with European legislation.

On 10 September, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister published a research study on permitted development rights from Nathaniel Lichfield and Partners Ltd. That is the first phase of a wide-ranging review of the General Permitted Development Order 1995. It includes a review of the operation of the permitted development rights available to railway undertakings, and consideration of whether a height limit of 15 m should be set for their masts in "sensitive" landscape areas, and whether prior approval should be required on their siting and appearance.

We are considering the report's recommendations carefully. Once we decide whether any of the suggested reforms should be taken forward, we will undertake a public consultation. I will, of course, encourage all interested Members to participate in that process.

If the Government decided that the permitted development rights granted either to mobile network operators or to Network Rail in respect of the erection of masts needed to be restricted, primary legislation would not be the appropriate way of achieving that. Their permitted development rights are granted by the General Permitted Development Order, and any restriction should be by way of amendment to the order.

Let me address the provisions in the Bill that would require a planning application for a telecommunications installation to be accompanied by a statement that it conforms to the precautionary principle and a certificate setting out the range of the beam of greatest intensity. There is a clear distinction between the precautionary principle and precautionary approaches. Implementation of the precautionary principle was described in some detail in a Commission paper of February 2000. I want to say more about the detail of that shortly, but it is apparent that the requirements of the precautionary principle would fit poorly with any measures undertaken in respect of mobile communications equipment.

The precautionary approach taken by the Government in respect of mobile telecommunications is of practical measures that are achievable and, in many cases, implemented voluntarily. The precautionary measures adopted on the recommendation of the Stewart group included the decision to adopt the exposure guidelines for non-ionising radiation recommended by the International Commission on Non-Ionising Radiation Protection—ICNIRP—to which the hon. Member for West Suffolk referred in his speech. That important measure was adopted for public protection.

It is important to acknowledge that ICNIRP is an international body that puts considerable effort into developing comprehensive reviews of the available scientific information to provide a basis for recommendations on exposure guidelines for non-ionising radiation, including electromagnetic fields. The members of the commission are experts in their field and are supported by a number of standing committees, on epidemiology, biology, physics and optics.

The advice that ICNIRP gives on exposure guidelines comes from extensive consultation based on the totality of the available scientific evidence on possible health effects. For that reason, the guidelines are widely accepted around the world and are the basis for exposure standards in many countries, within Europe and further afield. Those international guidelines have been developed to protect everyone in the population—mobile phone users and those who work or live near base stations, as well as people who do not use mobile phones.

The term "the beam of greatest intensity" arises from a recommendation in the Stewart report,

> "in relation to macrocell base stations sited within school grounds, that the beam of greatest intensity should not fall on any part of the school grounds or buildings without agreement from the school and parents. Similar considerations should apply to macrocell base stations sited near to school grounds."

The group made the recommendation as it had been suggested that children might be especially vulnerable to any adverse effects of radiofrequency radiation and would have a longer time to accumulate exposure over the course of their life. The group acknowledged that some countries had prohibited the placing of macrocell base stations on sensitive sites, such as schools.

Although such a policy is easy to administer, Stewart did not believe that it always produced the desired effect, because of the way that emissions are beamed. A macrocell base station located near a school may cause higher exposure to pupils than if it were placed on the roof of the school building. The group thought that there was a better approach, which was reflected in its recommendation.

The Government considered that it would be difficult to adopt the recommendation, despite the arguments in the Stewart report. The concerns about the practicalities of adopting the recommendation including technological ones, such as the fact that it is problematical to define exactly where the beam of greatest intensity falls in all cases. It was also feared that adopting the recommendation would generate greater unnecessary anxiety about the siting of mobile phone base stations. People would inevitably ask why, if it was not acceptable for beams from base stations to be directed near schools, it should be acceptable near hospitals, homes or workplaces.

A base station rarely operates at the maximum licensed power and even if it did it would still have to comply with the international guidelines that were set, as I said, to protect everyone in the population. The Government believe that adopting the recommendation would have no practical benefit in decreasing the risk created by exposure to base station electromagnetic fields.

Furthermore, the ongoing audit of base station emissions near sensitive sites justified that decision. Ofcom—formerly the Radiocommunications Agency—has measured exposures around nearly 300 base stations, including those located on or near schools. In all cases, exposures were below—mostly thousands of times below—the guidelines. That should also serve to allay public concerns. For all those reasons, the Government do not support the intentions behind the provisions in the Bill that require that a planning application for a telecommunications installation be accompanied by a statement that it conforms to the precautionary principle and by a certificate setting out the range of the beam of greatest intensity.

The hon. Gentleman, in his detailed and well researched speech, raised a number of issues relating to PPG8, general health considerations and the precautionary approach, and I will say a few more words in response to the points he raised. The guidance in PPG8 says that health considerations and public concerns can, in principle, be material considerations in determining applications for planning permission and prior approval. In the first instance it is for the decision maker—usually the local planning authority—to determine what issues are material in any particular case and what weight to attach to them. Nevertheless, PPG8 states clearly that, in the Government's view, if a proposed mobile phone base station meets the international guidelines for public exposure—the ICNIRP guidelines—it should not be necessary for a local planning authority, in processing an application, to give further consideration to the health aspects and any concerns about them.

Let me say a few words about health and the precautionary approach. The Government, of course, take seriously public concern about the possibility of health effects being associated with telecommunications base stations. That is why we set up the independent expert group, chaired by Sir William Stewart, to consider the health effects of mobile phone base stations and transmitters. In respect of base stations, the report concluded that the "balance of evidence indicates that there is no general risk to the health of people living near to base stations on the basis that exposures are expected to be small fractions of guidelines."

The Government have adopted the precautionary approach recommended by Stewart so, since the publication of his report, we have introduced standards to ensure that all base stations meet the international guidelines on public exposure set by ICNIRP. These guidelines are five times tougher in respect of public exposure than the National Radiological Protection Board guidelines previously used.

The Government's acceptance of a precautionary approach is limited to the specific recommendations in the group's report and the Government's response to them. It does not mean that individual local authorities should introduce their own precautionary policies for determining applications for mobile phone base stations; that would certainly be a recipe for confusion and uncertainty. However, we remain alert to public concerns and to the need for continuing research in these matters. That is why we have also launched a £7 million joint Government and industry research programme to investigate the health issues relating to mobile telecommunications and have made a commitment to keep the whole subject of mobile phone technologies under review in the light of further research.

I shall also say a few words about other forms of research. Reference has been made to Tetra—terrestrial trunked radio. The National Radiological Protection Board's independent advisory group on non-ionising radiation—AGNIR—published a report on possible health effects from Tetra in 2002. The report noted that the signals from Tetra-based stations, like their mobile phone counterparts, are not pulsed. There is, therefore, no reason to believe that signals from Tetra-based stations should be treated differently from those from other base stations. The report also found that exposures of the public to signals from Tetra-based stations are small fractions of international guidelines. Airwave mmO_2, which is rolling out the Tetra network for the police, is not a signatory to the 10 commitments, but it has its own version of the commitments and works to the guidelines in the code of best practice.

I am sure that hon. Members will also be aware of the recent Dutch TON study. The study from the Netherlands has examined the effects of radiofrequency signals from mobile phone base stations on feelings of well-being and cognitive functions. The results reported are important and need to be considered carefully. They also need to be confirmed by a different laboratory, as the authors themselves have emphasised.

On 14 May 2004, AGNIR published its report on "Health Effects from Radiofrequency Electromagnetic Fields". It fulfils a recommendation of the Stewart report to review the issue within three years.

With regard to exposures in the vicinity of mobile phone base stations, AGNIR examined data from a number of surveys and concluded that exposure levels are extremely low, and the evidence indicates that they are unlikely to pose a health risk. Nevertheless, AGNIR points out the limitations of published research and concludes that continued research is needed. The Government accept that the public have health concerns about mobile technologies and recognise that those need further study, which we are supporting.

The Bill's remaining provisions relate to base stations on property used by schools and medical facilities. They attempt to prevent operators from compulsorily acquiring rights to site installations on grounds used by schools, colleges and medical facilities. They would require county councils to revoke agreements to site telecommunications installations on sensitive locations, such as schools and medical facilities, and would allow for land previously compulsorily purchased for telecommunications use to be returned to its original owner without compensating the operator.

I remind hon. Members that the Stewart group report did not recommend that the erection of masts on or near schools be prohibited, or that existing masts be removed. As I stated, the report recommended that the beam of greatest intensity should not fall on any part of a school's grounds or buildings without agreement from the school and parents. I reiterate that Stewart did not recommend a moratorium on the siting of base stations on schools. As a result of the way in which omissions are beamed, a macrocell base station located near a school may cause a higher exposure to pupils than if it were placed on the roof of the school building.

The Government do not accept the arguments for directing the beam away from sensitive sites, but even if we did, it is impossible to understand the logic for the provisions. The Stewart group's report does not provide any basis for precautionary actions beyond those already proposed and accepted. It is our view that we should not implement additional precautionary policies. Of course, the development of modern communications systems inevitably leads to an increase in the infrastructure needed to support them, but the planning system already contains the necessary controls to ensure that such developments are carried out sensitively and with respect for the environment.

Mr. Spring: I put it to the Minister, in a wholly non-partisan and dispassionate way, that if he thinks that planning protection is actually working on the ground he is entirely mistaken. I also put it to him, again in a wholly non-partisan way, that the Government have a responsibility to react to the incidences of ill health ascribed to the transmission masts. That is what the precautionary principle is all about. The voluntary code is being abused wholesale by the telecommunications companies. It is a mess. I understand his position and acknowledge that he has been open and professional, but the Government have a responsibility to the people of this country to tidy up that mess. I hope that as a result of this debate he goes away and reflects on how to do that.

Keith Hill: I understand and appreciate the spirit in which the hon. Gentleman raises those concerns. I also appreciate his acknowledgment that the Government are taking the issues seriously. We recognise the public's concerns about the health implications of masts. We have worked very hard to get the best scientific evidence on which to make a judgment about the health impacts of those masts. What is more, we are responding to research from abroad and in this country. Indeed, we are funding research in this country to continue studies into the public health implications of masts. Let me reassure the hon. Gentleman that we are also carefully monitoring developments in the localities where masts have been installed.

As the hon. Gentleman told the House, he has been the recipient of a huge volume of correspondence since he announced his intention to propose this measure. As the Minister for Housing and Planning, I, too, am in receipt of a considerable amount of correspondence, from members of the public and from Members of the House who are properly responding to the concerns of their constituents. Of course, that volume of correspondence encourages any reasonable Planning Minister, which I hope I can claim to be, constantly to ensure that official and other relevant parties test the performance of the operators in these matters. In addition, Ministers regularly meet the operators and make strenuous demands for the evidence on which they maintain their activities.

The Government are aware that this is an issue of great public sensitivity, and we are constantly on the alert with regard to it. The fact that we recognise those public concerns is exactly the reason that this country is a world leader not only in research and development in mobile phone technologies but in research on health concerns. I say again to the hon. Gentleman and to the House that we are keeping the whole area under the closest review in light of that further research.

Rights of Way (Amendment) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

1.28 pm

Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West) (Lab): With the permission and consent and, indeed, at the request of my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Janet Anderson), I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

My hon. Friend is deeply sorry and sends her apologies to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, and the House for the fact that she is not here today to move the motion. All hon. Members experience, from time to time, an unfortunate dilemma and a conflict between our duties in the House and those in our constituencies, and she is currently in her constituency on a very pressing personal engagement. Rather than lose the opportunity today at least to air the principles underlying the Bill, she has asked me to step into the breach. I apologise to the House and to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for the fact that you are getting the dustcart instead of the lord mayor's show today.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen has a particular concern about the matters covered by the Bill in relation to her constituency, with its large concentrations of urban dwellings and industry flanked by beautiful countryside. Open green spaces are increasingly important resources for constituents who seek respite through countryside recreation and the associated benefits of fresh air, peace and tranquillity. Even though my own constituency is urban and part of inner-London and we do not have similar issues pressing there, it is a pressing matter for my constituents. They, like the constituents of hon. Members throughout the House, use the countryside more and more for recreation, especially if they live in urban areas for the working week.

The tranquillity of our greener areas is threatened by the invasion of scrambler bikes, bikes incorrectly but almost universally known as quad bikes, and four-wheel drive vehicles known as off-roaders. Irrecoverable damage is being done to sensitive land and it is becoming increasingly commonplace to see such damage owing to the inappropriate and inconsiderate use of those vehicles. Other rights of way users feel intimidated by convoys of vehicles, and reckless motorised use continues even through the winter months, turning many fragile countryside routes into deeply rutted and impassable mud baths.

Early-day motion 380 in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) has been well supported by some 110 Members from all parts of the House. Although I know that some hon. Members would go as far as a complete ban on vehicles on rights of way, the Bill does not attempt to achieve that. It does not seek to prevent vehicles using the 4,500 km of recorded vehicular rights of way in England and Wales.

Use by vehicles of rights of way is not always in itself undesirable or damaging. There are already legislative provisions such as traffic regulation orders to regulate use where rights for mechanically propelled vehicles already exist.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): The hon. Gentleman no doubt has an intimate knowledge of the explanatory notes—in fact, I would not be surprised if he helped to draft them. I was rather puzzled by the sentence in paragraph 4:

"A public right of way for all vehicles may also arise where mechanically propelled vehicles have used a route for the 20 year period, even where that use is illegal."

Can the hon. Gentleman explain to me how illegal use has been allowed to continue for that length of time?

Jim Dowd: There is a passage in my notes that deals with that in part, and I shall come to it later. The right hon. Gentleman is aware that part of the reason for introducing the Bill is precisely the lack of clear regulation in this area. I shall come to some of the antecedents of that and some of the conflicts that it is creating. I share his view that the matter is subject to considerable confusion and needs clarification. The Bill presents us with an opportunity to adopt a partial, though not a complete, solution to the problem.

It is evident that existing motor vehicular use of the rights of way network will increase to unsustainable levels over the next 20 years. The figure of 20 years is used because there is a deadline of 2026—which is actually 22 years away—under the terms of the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000 for claiming historic rights to use highways and byways.

Many claims are already being submitted to local highways authorities to upgrade existing footpaths and bridleways to motor vehicular ways. Most alarmingly, the claims are generally based on the production of evidence of use by horse-drawn vehicles many years, if not centuries, ago.

Mr. Forth: Will the Bill's provisions be retrospective? I am interested that the hon. Gentleman says that there is a process whereby claims are now being submitted. He will know, because he understands these matters better than most, that there is always an issue with legislation such as this that seeks to put right something that is claimed to be wrong. Were the Bill to become an Act, would it have any retrospective effect in nullifying the claims already submitted and established?

Jim Dowd: As far as I know, there is no retrospection in the Bill. It is only a clarifying measure. However, having said that, I note that the Minister, who is far more intimately aware of its detail than I am, seeks to intervene.

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): People are sometimes confused about the date at which provisions take effect. The Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000 put a limit on the date by which a claim could have been made in terms of a right of way existing because of use in the past, which was 2026. That means that a long way into the future there would be a degree of uncertainty. As I understand it, the Bill allows a period of 12 months from its coming into law. So, far from having any retrospective effect, it allows a window of opportunity for evidence to be put forward under the existing arrangements, but for a year rather than for some 25 years.

Jim Dowd: I am grateful to the Minister. Those are exactly the words that I would have used myself, but he has saved me the effort.

We are talking about establishing rights based on horse-drawn vehicles using tracks many years ago, which bears no resemblance to modern day use by powerful vehicles, sometimes weighing as much as 2 tonnes. This seems to be a perverse way to determine the accessibility of the rights of way network by motor vehicles.

The Government have recently consulted publicly on this issue in the consultation paper on the use of mechanically propelled vehicles on rights of way. Clearly, it is an emotive issue, which often creates conflict and ill-feeling between those who use mechanically propelled vehicles on rights of way and those who do not. However, I commend the Minister on a comprehensive consultation paper that directly confronts the issues of concern.

My hon. Friend seeks, through the Bill, to build on the proposals in that consultation paper. The Bill has a very simple purpose, which is to clarify those vehicular rights that can be recorded on local authorities' maps of rights of way, known as definitive maps, in England and Wales. At present we can only speculate on the extent of the historic evidence yet to be uncovered that would support claims in favour of their use by motor vehicles.

The Bill seeks to curtail claims for rights of way for mechanically propelled vehicles, known as byways open to all traffic, or, for those who like acronyms, BOATs. The impact is clear. When the Bill becomes an Act and its provisions are commenced, it will no longer be possible to add further byways open to all traffic to the rights of way network.

It may be helpful if I clarify how the Bill seeks to achieve that. The Bill limits the creation of any new public rights of way for mechanically propelled vehicles by ensuring that evidence of use by non-mechanically propelled vehicles in the future would not be sufficient to establish a public right of way for mechanically propelled vehicles.

The Bill also seeks to extinguish any unrecorded rights of way for mechanically propelled vehicles. This means that it will not be possible to rely upon any evidence of horse and cart use or an express dedication for such use to establish a right of way enabling motor vehicular use. But this historic evidence should not count for nothing. The Bill also provides for the recording of these rights as restricted byway rights—that is to say, rights on foot, on horseback or for non-mechanically propelled vehicles.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his generosity and the relaxed way in which he offers the Bill to the House on behalf of his hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Janet Anderson). Can he reassure me that the claims that will be allowed for another 12 months, following the Minister's helpful intervention, will be considered on exactly the same basis as hitherto, and that the Bill will in no way seek to change the criteria that have been used to consider these claims?

Jim Dowd: I believe that I can give that reassurance. As I mentioned, the Bill does not seek to change the balance; it seeks to establish a system of regulating the competing claims. As I also pointed out, it does not seek to extinguish existing rights that have been established; instead, it seeks to resolve conflicts between what could be perceived as the conflicting rights of users of footpaths and byways.

We are not discounting historic evidence. The Bill provides for the recording of restricted byway rights—rights for those who are on foot or horseback or are using non-mechanically propelled vehicles. That separates such byways from those that are open to all traffic rights. In most cases, recording rights under that category will ensure that rights of way are used in a way that reflects their historic past.

There are property owners or occupiers who rely on unrecorded public vehicular rights of way to gain access to their premises. They need to be protected from being landlocked. The Bill ensures that landowners and occupiers who are adversely affected by extinguishment of unrecorded rights in respect of mechanically propelled vehicles will retain those unrecorded rights to the extent that they need to exercise them in order to access their land. Of course, the provision would also extend to people who are legitimately visiting such owners or occupiers.

The Bill provides an opportunity for Members of the House to highlight their concerns about the use of motor vehicles on rights of way, and I am confident that the evidence will demonstrate that action is needed now if we are serious about having a sustainable rights of way network. The Bill is a major step forward in addressing the problems associated with motor vehicles in the countryside. It seeks not to ban vehicles, but merely to ensure that their future use is not dictated by past use that bears no comparison with the circumstances of today.

On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen, I thank all the hon. Members who have helped her in preparing in the Bill and who have expressed their support, as well as those outside the House who have sent letters and e-mails expressing their support. I again thank the Minister and his staff for their considerable efforts and assistance in drafting the Bill, and I thank him for his decisive approach.

If the House, in its infinite wisdom, gives the Bill a Second Reading today, my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen will do all that she can to ensure that it achieves the further stages of its parliamentary progress—and she would do it in person, I am certain.

1.42 pm

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): A Bill that can unite in my area all farmers without exception, all horse riders without exception and dog walkers—I cannot confirm that it unites all dog walkers, because I have not spoken to all of them, but all whom I have consulted in many of the 80 villages around my constituency would warmly welcome a Bill such as this—is to be welcomed. Should a Committee consider the Bill, I shall earnestly offer my services to assist in its further progress.

I have one question, which I hope the Minister will answer, about what will happen if changes of the sort that are proposed should be introduced, whether through this Bill or other means. I want to ask about retrospective action, as it appears to me that in areas such as mine or the neighbouring constituency of Newark, where applications are currently under way, there needs to be clear guidance on the potential use of traffic regulation. When people wish to ride quad bikes and other such motorised vehicles, including motor bikes of all different kinds, licensed and unlicensed, legal and illegal, on the footpaths and bridleways of my area and that of the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer), such guidance is needed to ensure that we have the opportunity properly to put a case on our constituents' behalf in order to restrict such rights and allow people to get on with their lives in peace, rather than alongside the horrors of organised sport invading the countryside in an inappropriate way.

I hope that the Minister can consider providing some guidance, irrespective of the progress of the Bill, on how traffic regulation orders could be used by decent, law-abiding people in order to protect their rights.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): The use of a loophole to convert more public paths into byways open to all traffic is a cause for concern. Conservative Members therefore welcome the Government's consultation on mechanically propelled vehicles, which closed in March, and we also welcome the Bill.

It is important to understand the scale of the problem. In England, there are about 188,000 km of public rights of way, of which more than 146,000 km are footpaths, just over 32,000 km are bridleways and 3,700 km are byways open to all traffic. An additional 6,000 km of roads are used as public paths or RUPPs—roads used as public paths—and they are currently being reclassified under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

Mr. Forth: I make a plea to my hon. Friend to talk in good old miles rather than these ghastly kilometres to which he seems so wedded. I know that he is a young man with his future ahead of him, but we old folk prefer miles because we do not understand kilometres. How much of that mileage is either in public ownership or is public land has not come out in the debate, and perhaps we can explore that point later with the Minister or in some other way. That distinction must be important, but when I examined the Bill quickly, I did not see it. Does my hon. Friend have any thoughts?

Mr. Ruffley: On my right hon. Friend's first point, I was as shocked as him to see a Conservative research department scriptwriter use kilometres. If my mathematics were quick enough, I would multiply the distance in kilometres by five eighths to get the proper figure in miles. However, my maths is not quick enough, and I must make some progress.

I have not examined or considered my right hon. Friend's second point about the proportion of mileage in private ownership as against public ownership, but it is worth delving into.

Alun Michael: I cannot help the hon. Gentleman on the proportions, but rights of way legislation deals with rights of way, and not with the ownership of land. On considerable amounts of private land, however, evidence of a right of way would, under the current arrangements, lead to a right of access not only for walkers and horses, but for motorised vehicles, so the Bill would benefit private landowners.

Mr. Ruffley: I am grateful to the Minister, and I hope that that helps my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Forth: Not much.

Mr. Ruffley: I could not answer my right hon. Friend's question, but I hope that the Minister's response is of some use.

The legal rights of access to RUPPs cause a great deal of confusion in the countryside. Many people believe that they have vehicular access to a route, when no such formal right exists. We believe that the Bill is not an attack on legally acquired vehicular access rights, but rather a renewed attempt to establish much needed clarity. The number of off-road vehicles has grown spectacularly over the past 10 years, and some estimate the increase to be more than 400 per cent. In that context, the need for clarification is all the more pressing.

It cannot be right that the use of a route centuries ago by horse-drawn carts can be used as evidence to grant access to mechanically propelled vehicles, which have a dramatic impact, particularly on unsurfaced roads. We believe that the loophole should be closed, and that the usage of a road over 20 years should not automatically give rise to vehicular access rights.

Mr. Forth: In our enthralling packed Friday debates in this place, we hear a lot about this or that group lobbying our colleagues. Has my hon. Friend been approached by any interest groups—walkers, horse riders, quad bike users, sport utility vehicle owners, people with horses and carts or perhaps even Prince Philip, as he drives his four, six or eight horses along with great skill—to argue one way or the other about the Bill, or is he completely in the dark?

Mr. Ruffley: Sadly, I have not been approached by the Duke of Edinburgh—but I have been approached in one of my many constituency advice centres by a man from Woolpit. I confess that I cannot recall his name, but he was extremely exercised by the prospect of the Bill biting and preventing him from using his quad bike on the highways and byways of mid and west Suffolk. I fear that what I am about to say, in what my right hon. Friend rightly described as this packed debate, will not be much to that man's liking—but perhaps he is not watching or listening, so I might get away with it.

In fact, I am supporting an official Opposition position, and I can say that we, as the official Opposition, have received many representations. Later in my speech, I shall take some time—

Mr. Forth: Oh yes, please do.

Mr. Ruffley: I am sure that my right hon. Friend will look forward to that part of my speech, when I shall outline some of the representations that have been made to us on both sides of the argument.

The use of routes by mechanically propelled vehicles does not inevitably cause damage, but there are many examples of damage being caused by trail riders and 4x4 vehicles. That has undoubtedly led to the enjoyment and amenity of the countryside being spoilt for many people. In my part of the fair county of Suffolk, there are many walkers of all ages who fear 4x4s and quad bikes tearing down quiet, bucolic country lanes or paths at great speed. That concern has been expressed not only to me but to many of my right hon. and hon. Friends.

The Ramblers Association has reported how green lanes have been scarred by trail bikes and four-wheel drives, at a cost both to those who use them and to those who try to maintain them. The problem is worst when conditions are wet, and large ruts can be gouged in paths.

Mr. Forth: Now that my hon. Friend has started to talk about wets and ruts, this is getting a bit more interesting, but has he any details or statistics on the number of people who have been injured by that phenomenon? As he develops his argument—I am sure that he is still only on his preliminary remarks—it strikes me that there is a distinct possibility that people using quad bikes, SUVs or other such vehicles, including even horse-drawn vehicles driven at speed, may be causing risk to innocents who are simply walking. Do we have any figures? Are they part of the argument?

Mr. Ruffley: It certainly would be an important part of the argument if I had those statistics to hand; my right hon. Friend makes a powerful point. I am always indebted, as are all of us on the Opposition Front Bench, to my right hon. Friend, because he has a brilliant capacity to ask the most telling and trenchant questions—and his latest intervention is true to form. It is a very important point. We should not just support or pass legislation willy-nilly: we have to drill down into the detail. Should the Bill obtain a Second Reading and go into Committee, I would expect that we would have more statistics to hand.

Alun Michael: It is difficult to provide statistics on that point, because statistics depend on the way in which information is collected. During the consultation, many people wrote to us about danger and injuries. The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point about the wider issue of conflicts between different types of users, but the Bill would have only one narrow effect. It would mean that 12 months after it came into effect a claim could no longer be made that would allow use by motor vehicles on the basis of evidence of use by horses or horse-drawn vehicles many years in the past. The Bill would not introduce a complete ban, nor does it seek to try to prevent a wide range of different types of use. It would simply prevent the creation of a new right of way for motorised vehicles on the basis of historic use by horse-drawn vehicles.

Mr. Ruffley: I am grateful to the Minister, but it is worth pursuing my right hon. Friend's point. The Bill may address a narrow loophole but it is still a proposed piece of legislation, and we do not want to pass legislation for the sake of it. We must be convinced that it cuts out an abuse, rights a wrong or clarifies the law. My right hon. Friend makes an excellent point by asking what evidence is available of loss of life or injury to walkers and others who may be incommoded by vehicles using certain country routes. How serious is the problem?

John Mann: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have read of the case earlier this year of the four-year-old boy in south Wales who was killed on one of these roads used as public paths—or RUPPs—by a motorbike travelling at great speed. Doubtless the hon. Gentleman will also be interested to hear of the concerns of hundreds of my constituents whom I met last weekend, in villages such as Clarborough. They fear injury, but also the disruption of their peace and quiet as they attempt to live their lives.

Mr. Ruffley: I was not questioning whether people were concerned about this issue. Many walkers and ramblers clearly support the Bill, not least for the reasons that the hon. Gentleman gives. I was making a slightly different point, which is that if we are to have good law based on a proper rationale, we need to test all the propositions. My right hon. Friend made a good point by asking whether we could quantify the occurrence of danger, injury or fatality. The hon. Gentleman gave a powerful example, about which I recall reading, but we need more empirical data before we make any final decisions on the Bill.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his typically forensic analysis. We do not want to pass laws only on the basis of good intentions: they must be founded on evidence.

Mr. Forth rose—

Mr. Ruffley: If my right hon. Friend will allow me, I will make some progress.

As I said, the problem is at its worst when conditions are wet. It leads to degradation of paths and routes, makes them difficult to use by walkers, many of whom are often deterred from returning to some areas, as they expect these motorised vehicles to return and disturb their peace as they go about their business walking along. The Ramblers Association states that the 85 miles of the Berkshire-Oxfordshire Ridgeway has suffered particularly badly from off-road vehicles, and the damage has cost Berkshire county council many thousands of pounds to repair.

Earlier, I promised my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) that I would refer to some of the representations that we have received. He might be interested to learn that there are arguments on both sides. There has been criticism of the Bill and its implications from the Trail Riders Fellowship—I do not know whether he is familiar with that organisation. In the consultation response to the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, it said:

"We are aware that the Minister continues to be lobbied by groups and individuals who wish him to totally eliminate the use of mechanically propelled vehicles from rights of way. We believe that the claims made in support of prohibition are very selective, misinformed and exaggerated"—

Alun Michael: It would be a great disservice to the House and the public were two things to be confused. One is the question of the suitability of rights of way for particular use—the hon. Gentleman referred, for instance, to the Ridgeway, in which I have taken a considerable personal interest. There is a right of way along the Ridgeway. The damage to the areas that he mentioned needs to be tackled via traffic regulation orders, which local authorities of a variety of political colours and MPs across three parties currently support. That is a coherent way of dealing with damage to a right of way. The Bill does not address those issues, and nor did the consultation, a response to which he was quoting. The Bill simply considers whether, if there has been use of a particular way by horses in the past, that should automatically lead to future use, after the 12-month post-implementation period, so that not only is there no backdating but there is a window of opportunity for using the current legislation. That is the only issue with which the Bill deals. It is important not to confuse the issues because organisations such as the Trail Riders Fellowship have been confused in making representations that have nothing to do with this Bill. The consultation to which he refers is much wider, and is not relevant to the specific proposals that we are considering.

Mr. Ruffley: I am grateful to the Minister. I hope that I am not missing anything, but it seems to me that the precedent that certain motorised vehicle users can now pray in aid—that a track had been used by a cart and horse for 400 years—which the Bill seeks to close off, is relevant. If that loophole is kept open, as the trail riders and others wish, they would be able to damage certain pathways and routes. Therefore, the suggestion by the trail riders that they should have a right to go down those routes and do what they like to the surface seems pertinent to the Bill. If the loophole is not closed, they will be allowed to go about their business and to cause damage. The ramblers to whom I will refer shortly object to that. Therefore, I am not quite sure why the Minister suggests that damage to some of those routes is not pertinent to the debate. If the loophole is not closed, more damage will be done. Is that not the point?

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman quoted responses in relation to general protection of rights of way and damage to rights of way that exist now. I made the point that traffic restriction orders are the means of dealing with that issue. The question in the Bill is simply whether it should be possible in future for people to claim a right of way for a motorised vehicle where the only evidence of previous use is that by walkers or horses, sometimes in the distant past.

Mr. Ruffley: I am grateful to the Minister. I do not think that we are disagreeing, because that is our understanding of the Bill. If that loophole is not closed, which the Bill seeks to do, it seems that there is potential for people who use motorised vehicles to pray in aid a precedent created by horses, for example, which would enable them to use their mechanically propelled vehicles and to cause damage. Therefore, if that loophole is not closed, there could be more damage to the countryside. That is the ramblers' argument.

May I continue quoting from the response of the trail riders to the consultation? I will be happy for the Minister to intervene if he thinks that this is not pertinent to the Bill—I think that it is. One of the key arguments of those who oppose the Bill is that all vehicles that use rights of way do not necessarily use them in a careless and destructive manner. The trail riders and others think, fairly or unfairly, that they have been tarred with the brush of being destroyers of rights of way and of certain routes. They say:

"Legislative changes driven by such claims would be disproportionate to the problem and would bear down unreasonably on the law abiding and responsible. It would also be a replication of previous attempts to manage recreational use of countryside by tampering with legislation that have largely failed."

John Mann: How would the hon. Gentleman respond to the case that has been put in my constituency? It has nothing to do with the Ramblers Association or the Trail Riders Fellowship. If those rights of way were authorised and lawful, those wishing to go lamping and to case isolated farms such as that of my constituent, Mr. Geoffrey Wheatcroft—the story appeared in The Sunday Telegraph—would be able to do so. Concern has been expressed by 80 members of the National Farmers Union in my constituency and by the hon. Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer), the hon. Gentleman's Front-Bench colleague. They are worried not about organised trail riders but about the individuals who would have those rights and therefore would legitimately be in such areas on motorised vehicles, to the detriment of the security, safety and rights of the individuals living and working there.

Mr. Ruffley: The hon. Gentleman makes a powerful point. I repeat that the official Opposition are in favour of the Bill. I am merely trying to ventilate some of the different views. I was referring to the fact that some trail riders and British motorcyclists think that they have been hard done by. It is only fair to air their grievances. This is not a Bill that has universal support and there are arguments on both sides.

The British Motorcyclists Federation said:

"The consultation paper proposes measures that will curtail 'cowboy' usage. However to be effective in doing this it is likely that any legislation will shape the activities of sensible and authorised users."

Alun Michael: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that he is again talking about a consultation that ranged over a wide variety of issues, which go way beyond the limited elements covered by the Bill? By drawing in so many issues that are extraneous to the consideration of the Bill, he gives rise to the suspicion that the official Opposition have decided to talk out the Bill. It would be helpful and interesting to hear whether he has anything to say about the actual provisions of the Bill.

Mr. Ruffley: I am grateful to the Minister for that intervention. I do not agree that my references to the consultation are irrelevant to consideration of the Bill. As I said earlier, if the Bill is successful, it will close off a loophole and will, on balance, reduce the amount of motorised vehicles driven along some of the highways and byways of this country. If, on the other hand, the Bill does not go through, those wishing to use vehicular transport will be able to go down country routes by praying in aid the precedent of usage by horses, carts and so on over many generations. It thus seems to me that the general remarks of motorcyclists on the one hand and ramblers on the other about their view of their activities in the countryside, and their responses to the consultation, are extremely relevant, because the heart of the Bill is whether there should be more or less use of country routes by motorised vehicles.

Mr. Forth: Notwithstanding the bluster of the Minister, who obviously needs a refresher course in charm and persuasion, is my hon. Friend tempted by the thought that a better way to resolve a Bill such as this would be to test the will of the House in a Division, as the Government did on the last Bill? Does he recall that on six previous occasions this year, on Fridays such as this, it was Ministers who talked out Bills? If someone is still on their feet debating a Bill at 2.30 pm on a Friday such as this, it is more often than not a Minister.

Mr. Ruffley: As always, my right hon. Friend puts his finger on the point. I make no comment as to whether the official Opposition seek to talk out the Bill. As I am sure my right hon. Friend agrees, I am merely ventilating some of the issues, so that we can give a balanced reflection of who is for and who is against the Bill. The Minister has intervened twice to imply that my remarks were not pertinent to the Bill, but I believe that they are. Depending on whether the Bill goes through, there may be more or less use of motorised vehicles on country routes and that is what I am looking at.

I shall turn to what the Bill is trying to achieve and the more positive set of remarks about it, which have been amplified by the Ramblers Association. It referred to the Ridgeway and, although the Minister might intervene to say that this case should not be quoted in the context of the Bill, the views expressed reflect the opinion of ramblers generally on the principle of recreational motor vehicle use and how that might affect the use of the countryside by ramblers and others who wish to enjoy the highways and byways. It said:

"We are not campaigning for a ban on recreational motor vehicles, we are campaigning for a ban on their use on rights of way which came into existence before the motor car was invented, and have never been designed to support such use. There are many sites dedicated to off-roading where this activity can be enjoyed."

The Ramblers Association has expressed a fair and balanced view in support of the Bill.

The Friends of the Ridgeway and the Yorkshire Dales Green Lanes Alliance have also made supportive comments. The Friends of the Ridgeway said recently:

"The 'rights' arise from historical legal anomaly. Until the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000, UK law did not distinguish between motorised and non-motorised vehicles when it came to a consideration of rights of way. Once upon a time it was possible to drive through the centres of many of our towns and cities that are now pedestrian precincts. Sometime in the future we will look back on the banning of motor vehicles on The Ridgeway and see it as just another step in protecting the 'rights' of the majority".

The Green Lanes Environmental Action Movement—GLEAM—is yet another organisation that is in favour of the Bill. About 150 MPs and Members of the European Parliament of different parties are apparently honorary supporters of GLEAM.

Mr. Forth: Not today.

Mr. Ruffley: As my right hon. Friend points out, they are not here today. There do not seem to be many people who support the Bill in the Chamber today. None the less, its supporters appear to number more than 100.

Mr. Forth: In absentia.

Mr. Ruffley: Yes, in absentia, and demonstrably so.

Jim Dowd: They are on their way.

Mr. Forth: Using a byway.

Mr. Ruffley: There is a lot of sedentary intervention, but I will ignore that and try to press on.

Mr. Forth: I appreciate my hon. Friend's helpful analysis, because we need to hear the different views. However, before he concludes, will he give us his reaction to the Bill's explanatory notes? He has a distinguished record in the House as a custodian of the public purse and he may be alarmed, as I was, by paragraph 14 of the explanatory notes, which states:

"Local authorities may experience a surge of applications to record byways open to all traffic on their definitive maps before the legislation is commenced but their longer-term workload will be reduced."

Does my hon. Friend interpret that to mean, as I do, that there may be a considerable additional burden on the local council tax payer—yet again? The council tax payer will take little comfort from the fact that it may be reduced in the longer term, which never really arrives.

Mr. Ruffley: My right hon. Friend makes an important point. I hope that it will be picked up should the Bill ever be debated in Standing Committee. I know that he pays much attention to the resource implications of all legislation. We need full advertence as regards the cost implications of this Bill, as we do with all pieces of legislation.

It is important to ensure that there is a balance between the various users of the countryside, including those who walk in it and those who drive their vehicles down highways and byways. The Conservatives have a proud tradition of conserving that which is best. The beauty of the British countryside, not least in Suffolk, which is clearly the most beautiful county, should not be spoilt, but protected. We lean in favour of a regime that protects the environment from spoliation by vehicles. We are not against all vehicular use of byways, but on certain routes vehicles should not have untrammelled access as of right.

The loophole arising from the precedent set by the historical use of routes by vehicles such as horse-drawn carts exploited by those whose mechanised vehicles might despoil some of the lanes and routes needs to be considered. For that reason, we find merits in the Bill. On balance, it is an appropriate and proportionate response to a muddied—no pun intended—legal situation. We hope that the unjustified conversion of paths for vehicular usage can be stopped. In so doing, we hope that everyone can enjoy our cherished countryside free from disturbance and free from damage. We shall support the Bill should it be put to a vote.

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) for trying to tease out some of the things that would be affected by the Bill. When my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Janet Anderson) announced her intention to introduce such a Bill, I was unable to be in the Chamber to hear her remarks, although I know that she referred to the fact that I had explained the reasons for my absence. When I read what she had to say, I offered all the help that I could in pursuing her objective.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds raised a number of issues, some of which go wider than the Bill's scope. That is fair; a piece of legislation fits within a wider context. The consultation received many responses and raised many issues. In particular, I was pleased at the large number of Labour and Opposition Members who said that they thought the problem needed tackling in a comprehensive, proper and thoughtful way. They also said that they supported this specific measure.

The Bill is carefully measured. It effectively attempts to cap the extent to which the public right of way network is open to use by motor vehicles. Essentially, we are dealing with past vehicular use by horse-drawn vehicles long before the invention of the internal combustion engine. In many cases, roads and motorways started off by being used by horse and cart, but they have been subject to continuous use and the development of appropriate surfaces. We are concerned here with routes that have not been used by any sort of vehicle over many years and have never previously been used by mechanically propelled vehicles. Such use does not form part of the evidence for routes to be considered under the Bill.

I therefore emphasise the support for the limited nature of the Bill to underline the fact that, as was indicated in earlier interventions, it is not retrospective; it does not seek to curtail existing rights of way. It provides a window of opportunity for applications to be made under the current arrangements and for a year after the Bill reaches the statute book, rather than during a period that lasts until 2026, which is the provision in the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000. It merely means that, after that window of opportunity has closed, any rights of way that are asserted on the basis purely of walking and horse-drawn vehicles will give rise to the right to use that route on foot or in a horse-drawn vehicle rather than in a motorised vehicle—it will go no further than that.

I hope that, with those assurances on points of concern and in the knowledge that it will be widely welcomed as a small step in the direction towards a coherent means of properly protecting and using our rights of way, the Bill will receive the support of the House.

2.26 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): I suppose I should start by declaring somewhat of an interest, in that I am the happy owner of an SUV. Mine is a pretty little Jeep Wrangler of which I am inordinately proud. It is, of course, derived from the original second world war jeep and it is a true four-wheel drive vehicle. I have to confess, however, on behalf of my Wrangler, that it has never been off-road—it is a London-based SUV—so it has not yet been able to disrupt anyone's quiet or peace and sadly may never do so. I should put that on the record, though, because I have a potential interest in the contents of the Bill, rather than a present one.

I say for the sake of the record that the Minister has had the gall to stand up and say how many MPs support the measure—something that we often hear in the House on Fridays. You and I know, Madam Deputy Speaker, that at the last Division in the House, about an hour ago, only 12 MPs out of 659 voted, and looking around the Chamber now, there are 10 Members present. If we were to divide the House to establish the true level of support for the Bill, I would hazard that we might get 10 or 12 Members voting out of 659.

Jim Dowd: There are 11 Members here.

Mr. Forth: I had been intending to mention the hon. Gentleman, but I am happy to bring forward my praise for him. He points out that there may be 11 Members present, and I happily concede that.

As you know, Madam Deputy Speaker, I am something of an anorak. I still believe in what the House does and in the legislative process. I am here every private Members' Bill Friday, but sadly not many of my colleagues are. I am not impressed by those who say that this or that Bill has the support of many Members of all parties—100 here, 150 there. The true test of support for a Bill, in the legislative sense, is bums on seats or, to put it more accurately, bodies in Division Lobbies. To me, therefore, the proper measure of that support is when we divide the House and see how many people are here. Very sensibly, our forefathers set the quorum for the House at 40 Members. I do not think that it is asking too much to say that 40 Members should be present to make law. Let us clear all that nonsense out of the way before we even get started.

I had been about to sing the praises of my near neighbour, the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Jim Dowd), who so persuasively introduced the Bill on behalf of the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Janet Anderson). He said that, were the Bill to make progress, the hon. Lady would be present on some future occasion to promote its interests. That is very encouraging, if I may say so. I am really rather pleased that a Member would be prepared to turn up to support his or her Bill at some stage. The hon. Gentleman did a magnificent job of promoting his colleague's Bill, and, who knows, we may yet find that he has persuaded the House—that remains to be seen.

Just to clear the decks before I get anywhere near my introductory remarks, never mind the substance of my speech—I am keen to follow others in making my little contribution to the debate—it emerged from the Minister's remarks that our aim today is to repair a cock-up by the Government. Apparently, the Countryside and Rights of Way Act—

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on 16 July.

Remaining Private Members' Bills

TELECOMMUNICATIONS (PERMITTED DEVELOPMENT RIGHTS) (AMENDMENT) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Second reading what day?

Jim Dowd: I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Derek Twigg). That is the last time I do him a favour.

Friday 16 July, Madam Deputy Speaker.

To be read a Second time on Friday 16 July.

WILD MAMMALS (PROTECTION) (AMENDMENT) (NO. 2) BILL

TELECOMMUNICATIONS MASTS (REGISTRATION) BILL

Madam Deputy Speaker: Not moved.

Royal Prerogative of Mercy

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Derek Twigg.]

2.31 pm

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton): First, I should like to put on the record how pleased I am to have obtained this Adjournment debate. The matters it deals with might seem somewhat dated, but I think that they are as relevant now as they were when I first became aware of them some eight years ago. The debate arises from a previous Adjournment debate that I had the privilege to introduce on 7 March 2001.

At that time, I expressed my concerns about the release from prison of two career criminals, John Haase and Paul Bennett, 10 months after they had been sent down for 18 years for conspiring to supply class A drugs. To date, no one in the Government or their agencies has been able to explain satisfactorily to me how that happened. I hope that today's debate will enlighten us as to part of the process involved—the use of the royal prerogative.

Since that debate, I have met representatives of Customs and Excise and the Home Office—two of the principal agencies involved—but they have added nothing to my understanding of the breakdown in justice. I have to assume either that those concerned are ignorant of the wider context of the Haase-Bennett case, or that they inadvertently stonewalled me in respect of relevant information that I believe should rightly be placed in the public domain.

I am assured that, since the previous debate, Customs and Excise has changed its rules on the handling of informants—something for which I asked at the time and went into great detail about. However, a Customs and Excise officer, Mr. Kevin O'Sullivan, of the law enforcement drugs policy section, wrote to Sir Andrew Turnbull alleging that there is still a culture of malpractice and, indeed, criminal behaviour within Customs and Excise. I hope that that matter will be pursued and resolved.

When I initiated that debate three years ago, however, the Paymaster General told me that I had "placed much information on the record."

I was told that she would ensure that the issue that I raised would be "properly scrutinised" and that I would be "kept fully appraised of action that is taken and information that is available."

Finally, I was also told that I was "making available additional information that requires a response, and I will assure that he gets one."—[Official Report, 7 March 2001; Vol. 364, c. 395–8.]

But, of course, I never did. Time moved on and so did Ministers. The forces of law and order remained mute on the travesty of justice that was the release of Haase and Bennett.

I had put on the record how Haase and Bennett set up stashes of guns from within prison to enhance their credibility as informants. I am talking about not just shotguns and small handguns, but assault weapons—AK47s, M16s, Kalashnikovs and Uzis. A large number of guns were set up in those stashes. Subsequently, the two men informed the authorities of where those guns were, thus enhancing their credibility as informants.

At the time, I pointed out that no convictions were involved in the retrieval of those guns. They were found in cars or empty houses. All the information came courtesy of Haase and Bennett from within prison while on remand. It beggars belief that those people could somehow be aware of those stashes in cars, which could be towed away and moved around, but they were always spot on, in the right place at the right time with the right weapons. Of course, the reason was that the stashes had been organised by them, through their confederates outside. That is common knowledge among the underworld fraternity in Liverpool, and I believe that it is commonly understood by the police.

In fact, I also pointed out three years ago that Scotland Yard's directorate of intelligence alerted the agencies to that scam. I believe that it was not new at that time. That information had come from a man known, oddly enough, as the Vulcan—a Turkish baba, or godfather, who was the Turkish connection in drug-dealing activities. I understand that he did the same thing when he was incarcerated in Italy, where he got himself out of prison by doing deals with the authorities in return for information on that kind of set-up gun stash.

No one questioned what was going on at the time because everyone was obviously a winner. The informants gained credibility. That was the purpose of the exercise. The officers involved could show the seized guns as successes. The media trumpeted position outcomes in the war against organised crime. However, I repeat that no one was ever convicted for involvement with all those guns. To anyone with any sense of what life is like on the street, the idea that those guns could somehow remain in the stashes for months and months, while those people were in prison, waiting for the informants to come along and say where they were just beggars belief.

When Paul Cooke, the men's Customs handler petitioned the judge in their case, David Lynch, it even caused consternation and outrage among some of Cooke's colleagues in the Customs and Excise squads—two squads were involved as it was such a big case—as it affected the arrests in a major crackdown on drug importation. I have spoken to members of those squads. They still do not understand why the recommendation was made to allow those two people out of prison. But of course, under normal procedure, Paul Cooke, the officer in charge, together with the defence counsel, approached the trial judge, David Lynch, to set out the reasons why they believed that those two people should be pardoned. In turn—again, under normal procedure—that information would be passed on to the Home Office for its consideration. Of course, the key in all this was the gun seizures—that was the supporting evidence.

Following that procedure, the net result was that the two prisoners were released under the royal prerogative. It was a very strange release, because there were only five pardons in 1996 in total—Haase and Bennett received two of them. I should have thought that, with such a small number of cases getting to that stage, there would be intensive scrutiny of the backgrounds to those cases, the people involved, the way in which their credibility had been established and how the guns had been seized by the police.

Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West) (Lab): It is unusual to intervene in such a debate, but the tale my hon. Friend is outlining is scandalous, to put it mildly. Can he remind the House of who was the Home Secretary when those releases were authorised?

Mr. Kilfoyle: That happened in 1996 when the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) was the Home Secretary.

What made the case so special as to merit the release of Haase and Bennett? My hon. Friend the Minister will rightly quote the judge. I know that he, in turn, quotes the arguments of what I would consider a rather undependable alliance of the defence counsel and Paul Cooke, the Customs and Excise officer in charge of what happened.

The repeated allegation on the streets of Liverpool—it is not a new allegation—is that in some way large sums of money were involved in arranging matters. After all, Haase and Bennett had it. The authorities had seized only half the stock of "brown"—heroin—from that importation. I put it on the record that the street value at the time was £18 million. They had a lot of money at their disposal, if that was the case, to buy weapons and to buy influence.

I should also put it on the record that one name that is always mentioned in this context is that of a local criminal, Simon Bakerman, a man who has done time for drug offences. He is the son of Warner Bakerman, who was also arrested on drug-related charges. I cannot argue the veracity of the claims that are made by people who I have already said are practised liars, well able to do deals, and always seeking to do deals to minimise the effects of the sentences handed down to them. Nevertheless, the allegation is repeated time and again, ad nauseam. It merits somebody, somewhere, looking into what, after all, would be conspiracy to pervert the course of justice. The people involved are not only well known to the underworld. They are well known to the police in the area, and I believe they are well known to senior members of national agencies.

That gives rise to the question that I am often asked: have those repeated allegations been investigated, and if so, what was the outcome? Back in 2001 when I first raised the issue, I asked a series of questions seeking information to fill in the blanks in this unsavoury tale. As the House has heard, the Minister responding for the Government at the time promised me answers, but sadly, for reasons that I am prepared to accept were in good faith, because the election came along and ministerial roles changed, I never got those answers. I repeat for my hon. Friend the Minister, to see whether he can be of assistance, some of the pertinent questions that go to the heart of the so-called information provided by Haase and Bennett in order to give credibility to their application for the royal pardon.

Was Paul Ferris interviewed about the gun purchases of Haase and Bennett? What information is available on John Lally, Dominic Donnelly and Roger Jordan in relation to the smuggling of a gun into Strangeways jail? Was a report compiled on the gun in Strangeways jail? Has it been or will it be published anywhere, and if not, why not? Was there a failure by Customs and Excise to liaise with Merseyside police about the arms stashes pointed out by Haase and Bennett while they were on remand? Finally, who in the Home Office, if anyone, made the recommendation that Haase and Bennett should be released back on to the streets to carry on their perfidious work?

Three years ago I asked for two inquiries. One was into the procedures of Customs and Excise for dealing with informers. As I have already said, I am assured that that has been done and the necessary changes effected. My second request was for an inquiry into those cases touched upon by Haase and Bennett and their information, relating in particular to their release, the basis for it and any questions arising from it, and also into cases where their evidence was allegedly used and was crucial in securing convictions.

There have always been problems with so-called supergrasses, and, as I have said before, criminals always argue that they are innocent of the crimes of which they have been convicted. Nevertheless, there remains a deep concern on Merseyside that no one in authority seems to care about the uncertainty surrounding the information allegedly provided by Haase and Bennett with regard to others convicted of serious crimes.

We live in an age of increasing violence and frequent resort to firearms on the street. That is a commonplace fact of life today in my home city, as it is in other cities in the United Kingdom, and it is a tragedy. Here is a case where hundreds of weapons were bought on behalf of Haase and Bennett and turned in to the authorities, yet no one appears to have asked the appropriate questions about the stashes and the arrangements surrounding them.

I cannot believe that everyone touching on this case missed the obvious. To a simple-minded lay person such as myself, there can be only two possible conclusions. The first is that Customs and Excise, the Prison Service, the police, the judiciary and the Home Office were all duped by Haase and Bennett. The alternative is that there was, at some stage, some truth in the allegations that bribery played a part in securing Haase and Bennett's release. I do not want to believe that. All of my instincts say that that is not possible. Yet I also find it difficult to believe that no one within the system smelled a rat in the way in which the gun stashes were set up. I just hope that today the Minister can throw some real light on this sordid saga, so that I can explain to my constituents why it is that these people were allowed out.

2.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) on obtaining this debate and providing the House with an opportunity to discuss an issue that reaches back into our history.

By constitutional convention, the Home Secretary is, in England and Wales, responsible for recommending to the Sovereign the exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy. Indeed, the Home Secretary is personally involved in all decisions relating to any application for the use of the royal prerogative of mercy.

The Home Secretary's discretion in providing advice on the exercise of the royal prerogative has to be exercised having regard not only to the legal restrictions on the prerogative power, but to those imposed by constitutional convention and the allocation of ministerial responsibilities.

It might be helpful if I set out my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's policy and powers, as well as the conventions relating to the royal prerogative, and the particular factors that have a bearing on the granting of the three different forms of pardon that exist.

A decision by my right hon. Friend to recommend the use of the royal prerogative of mercy to grant a free pardon is restricted to cases that meet the following conditions. The first is where it is impractical for the case to be referred to an appellate court, and the second is where new evidence has arisen that has not been before the courts, which demonstrates beyond any doubt that no offence was committed or that the defendant did not commit the crime.

The effect of a free pardon is that the conviction is disregarded to the extent that, as far as possible, the person is relieved of all penalties and other consequences of the conviction. Of course, only the courts have the power to quash a conviction, and length of sentence is entirely a matter for the trial judge. The sentencing process must be as transparent as possible. Only in the most exceptional circumstances would it be appropriate to recommend an exercise of the royal prerogative of mercy, subsequent to conviction, on the strength of mitigating factors that were in fact known to the sentencing judge. That is an important point to which I shall return later.

The criteria currently used by my right hon. Friend in considering whether to make a recommendation to Her Majesty appear to have been applied by his predecessors for the past 100 years. Those criteria reflect a proper regard for the constitutional position, namely, that the courts decide whether a person is guilty of an offence, not the Government.

Thus, the Home Secretary would not generally consider recommending the grant of a free pardon until an appeal had been dismissed or leave to appeal had been refused, and it would be impractical for the case to be otherwise referred back to an appellate court.

Three forms of the royal prerogative of mercy are used to grant pardons to convicted criminals. The first is what is commonly known as a free pardon, which in this context means that the pardon is free from any conditions. The last free pardon was granted in 1996 and involved summary driving offences. Hon. Members will recall that, at that time, there was no other form of redress for a miscarriage of justice in summary cases.

The second form is a conditional pardon, whereby the penalty is removed on condition that a lesser penalty is served. Back in the 18th century, this form of pardon was used to substitute transportation for life in place of the death penalty. With the withdrawal of capital punishment, such pardons are no longer required. Indeed, the last conditional pardon to be granted was given posthumously in 1993 in respect of the death sentence passed on Derek Bentley, although this did not, of course, pardon his conviction for murder.

The third form of the royal prerogative of mercy is what is known as a remission pardon. This provides for the mitigation of punishment by releasing a prisoner from having to serve some or all of the remainder of their sentence or releasing someone who has been subject to a monetary penalty from the obligation to pay all or part of it. Remission pardons are usually considered in cases where the applicant has provided assistance to the authorities or in recognition of meritorious conduct, such as saving the life of a fellow prisoner or a member of the prison staff. It is this form of pardon that I know is of particular interest to my hon. Friend, given his concerns about the cases that he has mentioned. It might be helpful, therefore, if I say a little more about how the procedures work in such cases.

In the case of an individual providing information or assistance to the authorities prior to sentence, it would be normal for those authorities to inform the trial judge of the nature and extent of the assurances given. The trial judge would then reflect these representations in any sentence handed down. In some cases, such as where doing that might draw attention to the fact that the offender had been very helpful to the authorities and in turn might place that particular individual at great personal risk, and especially where that risk might be life threatening, the judge may decide not to impose a reduced sentence but write instead to the Home Secretary asking him to consider the use of the royal prerogative of mercy.

When that happens, the Home Secretary should not simply take the information at face value, but seek a detailed report from all the authorities involved in order to satisfy himself as to the value of the assistance given, and indeed as to what use that information has been put, before going back to the trial judge for his opinion as to what level of reduction in sentence would be justified in the circumstances. In cases where information has been provided after sentence, the same processes should take place, in that the Home Secretary should seek a detailed report with regard to the validity and use of the information as well as any outcome that may have occurred.

With regard to recommendations for the use of the prerogative in respect of meritorious conduct, this would normally relate to behaviour in prison, such as preventing the suicide of a fellow inmate, rescuing prison officers during a riot, preventing a fire, or some similar highly creditable behaviour. In such cases, it would be for the prison authorities to confirm the action taken by the prisoner and to recommend a suitable period of reduction in sentence. In most cases, this is a matter of a few days.

My hon. Friend has reiterated his close interest in the cases of John Haase and Paul Bennett, both of whom were granted remission pardons in 1996. He has raised his concerns on a number of occasions in the years since; indeed, this is not the first Adjournment debate he has initiated on this particular topic. I appreciate my hon. Friend's deep disquiet that in this case both men—despite the sensitivities involved and the possible danger to themselves—decided to make public the fact that they had received a reduction in sentence. It will be of great concern to my hon. Friend and his constituents that those men continued, after their release, to engage in further serious criminal activity. I note, too, my hon. Friend's allegation that those two men had deceived the authorities in their efforts to obtain a reduction in sentence.

[Paul Goggins]

I know that the then Paymaster General wrote to my hon. Friend following the earlier debate, to assure him that Customs had re-examined its handling of the case and concluded that it had been dealt with appropriately. I also understand that earlier this year my hon. Friend met my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury to discuss his continuing concerns.

My hon. Friend asked a number of specific questions, but I am sure that he understands that I am unable to go into detail on the facts of those cases. In particular, I emphasise the well-established policy and practice that no one—whether they be the police, Customs, Home Office officials or indeed Ministers—should comment publicly on whether an individual has or has not given information in confidence to the authorities. However, the House should be in no doubt that the impetus for the reduction in sentence in those cases came entirely and properly from the trial judge, and in supplying material to the judge, Customs and the police were properly fulfilling their obligations to the court.

Indeed, the Court of Appeal in the case of Sinfield laid great emphasis on the public interest in ensuring remissions of sentences in such instances, making it clear that even if the defendant is a major criminal—as he was in that particular case—a reduction in sentence still remains appropriate. Given the concerns that my hon. Friend raised, he will want to know whether we are considering any changes to the procedures in relation to the use of the royal prerogative of mercy.

I know that my hon. Friend is aware that at the time of his Adjournment debate in March 2001, an internal Home Office review was in progress. The review was completed soon after the debate and, although the conclusions were never made public, I can inform the House that they confirmed an earlier decision of the then Home Secretary that the royal prerogative of mercy should not normally be used to shorten sentences in recognition of information supplied to the authorities and known to the trial judge at the time of sentence.

The review did not, however, conclude that the prerogative should never be used in such circumstances, given that there may be very rare cases in which it is important for the Home Secretary to retain this discretion. Take, for example, a case in which co-defendants were all sentenced together in open court for the same offences, and where all might expect to receive the same or at least very similar sentences. It might simply be too obvious, not to say dangerous, to be seen to be lenient with just one. There can be particular difficulties when co-defendants plead guilty, but not all have given assistance, since a marked disparity of sentence may be impossible to explain, and any attempt to explain it would put the informer and their families at risk and so discourage informers from giving assistance.

I am led to understand that there have been recent improvements in the way customs officers handle their informants. The Butterfield review of criminal investigations and prosecutions, conducted by Customs and published in July 2003, revised arrangements for handling human intelligence sources. These new arrangements were put into place in September 2003 and extensive new law enforcement training commenced in April this year.

There have, of course, also been legislative changes that have affected the use of the royal prerogative of mercy and provided alternative means of redress. Prior to the implementation of the Criminal Appeal Act 1995, the only way that those who were wrongfully convicted had to remove the stain against their character was to seek a free pardon. Now, such people are able to appeal against summary conviction to the Crown Court and in the case of indictable offences to the Appeal Court. If they are unsuccessful, they can also seek the assistance of the Criminal Cases Review Commission. The commission, having investigated an allegation of injustice, may, if it determines that it is appropriate, refer the case back to the Court of Appeal.

That has clearly reduced the need to resort to the royal prerogative of mercy, and as a consequence no free pardons have been issued since 1997, when the Criminal Cases Review Commission came into being. Remission pardons have continued to be granted, but as my hon. Friend is aware from replies to recent questions that he has tabled, they are extremely rare, and only five have been granted since 1997, excluding grants for meritorious conduct in prisons.

The royal prerogative of mercy is, therefore, used only sparingly, and only in cases that are truly exceptional in character, in which no other route of redress is available.

It should not surprise any of us when public controversy accompanies a remission pardon. The cases are rare, and the people involved are convicted offenders who have sometimes committed very serious crimes. I appreciate, therefore, not least in relation to his constituency responsibilities, why my hon. Friend continues to press his concerns, and I remain happy to respond should he have further questions in future.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Three o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Olympics 2012

1. Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton): If she will make a statement on progress on infrastructure in the Thames gateway in respect of London's bid for the 2012 Olympics. [174891]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): A master plan prepared earlier this year by the London Development Agency set out plans for the lower Lea valley. They are designed to accommodate staging the Olympics in 2012. Outline planning permission is being sought for those proposals.

Mr. Love: May I, on behalf of the House, add to the congratulations to the bid team on making the shortlist? May we also thank Barbara Cassani for her leadership and congratulate Lord Coe on taking on that mantle for the future?

The International Olympic Committee's report expressed concern about transport infrastructure. I know that the Government are about to invest £600 million in the Thames gateway; indeed, we were told earlier this week that they have earmarked £17 billion for transport infrastructure in future years. Can my right hon. Friend confirm that she will be working with her Ministers to ensure that the poor state of London's transport highlighted in the report will be dealt with?

Tessa Jowell: Yes, of course, there is close co-operation across Government on all aspects of the bid, including those that relate to transport for the Olympics. It is worth making the point that, by 2012, £17 billion will have been invested in London's transport. We will have the channel tunnel rail link during the Olympics, the dedicated link from King's Cross down to Stratford, a 45 per cent. increase in capacity on the Jubilee line and no fewer than 10 railway lines serving Stratford station, so we have a lot to be proud of in the transport infrastructure that we will be in a position to offer visitors to London when they come to the Olympics in 2012.

One final point, Mr. Speaker. I know that my hon. Friend has been very concerned to ensure that the regeneration effects benefit his constituents. He will therefore welcome the investment that the lower Lea valley regeneration intends to make in a retail park, for the benefit of jobs in his constituency.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): In echoing what the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) said in paying tribute to Barbara Cassani and her work with Lord Coe, does the Secretary of State recognise that while all Members on both sides of the House want the Olympic bid to succeed, we want to see progress with the City of London in terms of the business support that it can give to the infrastructure? Does she recognise that that has perhaps not been given sufficient priority? Does she also recognise that there is concern among people in east London that there is a shortage of facilities, particularly in terms of swimming—a sport in which I have a personal interest, as she is aware? Does she acknowledge that that too can helpfully be addressed?

Mr. Speaker: Order. No one is going to win any Olympic prizes for the length of their questions.

Tessa Jowell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

I would obviously like to join in what Members on both sides of the House want, which is to congratulate and thank Barbara Cassani, who is still very much part of the bid team, but also to welcome Seb Coe's leadership. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right: swimming facilities will be an important benefit of the bid, and the aquatic centre will be one of the first Olympic facilities to be developed. On business support, I met the CBI just two weeks ago. He is absolutely right that London's businesses want to support the bid and they have already made a handsome contribution to the cost of it. That is to be welcomed.

Mr. Tony Banks (West Ham) (Lab): My right hon. Friend knows that many facilities for the Olympic games are located in my constituency of West Ham, where there is enormous support for the bid. The legacy use of those sports facilities, if they are built, is pretty crucial, particularly that of the 80,000-seater Olympic stadium. What discussions has she been able to have with the football clubs of London that could use it, such as West Ham, Tottenham and perhaps, given its ambitious plans, Chelsea?

Tessa Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. I know that some preliminary discussions have been held with a number of football clubs that might take on the responsibility for and the tenancy of the main Olympic stadium, but I also want to underline the welcome that his constituents give to the prospect of the Olympics. For this purpose, the world divides into those who want to win and those who want to whinge. His constituents want to win, and if we work together, pull together and realise the possibilities that the Olympics can bring to London we will win, but too many people are whingeing on the sidelines. They will damage our bid.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): We on the Conservative Benches would like to begin by offering a warm welcome to Lord Coe as chairman of the 2012 bid. We also want to pay tribute to Mrs. Cassani for putting together an excellent technical bid and an excellent team. But we wonder why, given Lord Coe's past as a British Olympian, the fact that he is well known in the international sporting arena, and that he is a politician, he was not the first choice. However, he now has a very important job to do. Notwithstanding the first response that the Secretary of State gave to the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love), will she come to the Dispatch Box, bearing in mind the International Olympic Committee's criticisms of our transport arrangements, and guarantee that the east London line will be constructed in time for the Olympics, and that the upgrade of the Jubilee line will take place in time, too?

Tessa Jowell: On the hon. Lady's question about the east London line, feasibility studies are currently under way, both by the Strategic Rail Authority and Transport for London. The outcome of those studies will be considered as part of the spending round, so there will be no decision on funding for the east London line until the summer. We have always made it absolutely clear that the east London line would greatly enhance the hosting of the Olympics, but it is not essential to a first-class transport plan for the Olympics.

From memory, although I stand to be corrected, Lord Coe did not submit his name first time around. What we have, however, is Barbara Cassani's legacy, which was to set up the team, and now Lord Coe, who we hope will take us past the winning line in July next year.

Miss Kirkbride: I am sure that the 2012 bid team will have noted what the Secretary of State says about transport links, but there were other criticisms in the IOC report that she might also wish to address. For example, on Government support, we came eighth out of nine among the bidding cities, and on public support, we came ninth out of nine. The Secretary of State might like to consider whether she should stop whingeing about the whingers, and the Minister for Sport and Tourism should stop telling Londoners that they need to be disciplined about their attitude to the British Olympic bid and start winning the hearts and minds of the British public for a London bid for 2012.

Tessa Jowell: Of course, the 2012 bid team and all those who have a role to play, including Members on both sides of the House, will examine carefully what the International Olympic Committee said about the London bid. It is a constructive intervention, not one that should deter us. It is also worth recording that London came from nowhere and is at the moment standing third. There is little distance between the first three cities. In fact, we scored better than Paris on environmental conditions, we are equal with Paris on accommodation, finance and Government support, and we are better than Madrid on safety and security. There is an awful lot going for the London bid, and I hope that at every opportunity she will talk it up, not talk it down.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): I invite my right hon. Friend to look at the Order Paper, on which she will see that the question relates to the Thames gateway and infrastructure, and I invite her to consider that the boundaries of Greater London are wholly artificial and ridiculous, and that they relate to 1963. The Thames gateway includes Thurrock, where there is room to breathe and people are enthusiastic about the Olympic bid. Not only do we want a slice of the action but it would be in her interest, and that of my hon. Friend the Member for West Ham (Mr. Banks), if she were to look eastwards rather than just to the few miles round the centre.

Tessa Jowell: I take seriously my hon. Friend's advocacy for Thurrock. [Interruption.] Exactly. I greatly look forward to visiting it next month.

Archaeology

2. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): What assessment she has made of the all-party archaeology group's report on the state of archaeology in the United Kingdom. [174892]

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): The Government welcome the all-party archaeology group's report. Its recommendations will form a useful contribution to the ongoing review of heritage protection.

Tim Loughton: I welcome the Minister's comments, but her predecessor undertook to give a formal response to the report, and it has been out since January 2003. May I bring to her attention two points in it? First, the Illicit Trade Advisory Panel, which was set up in 2000, has been successful in its recommendations. The trouble is that only three of those 16 recommendations have so far been put into practice, and she is now recommending winding it up. Will she reconsider that? On the portable antiquities scheme, will she agree to accept an all-party delegation of those of us who are concerned that the Government should take the scheme fully under their wing after the funding ends in 2006? It has been so successful, as I saw in my area in Sussex last Friday, that it is in danger of being swamped as a result, and the Government need to take it under their wing and fund it properly after 2006.

Estelle Morris: I take the point about the report having been published in January last year. I believe that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Media and Heritage met the all-party group last October—I stand to be corrected if I am wrong—and I will pass the hon. Gentleman's comments to him.

I share the hon. Gentleman's enthusiasm for what the portable antiquities scheme has achieved, but all I can say now is that the funding is secure for another one or two years. Obviously we cannot make an announcement until we have the results of our spending review bid, but I hope very much that the Government will be able to bear the costs. The Department has put in £1.5 million so far. I shall say no more for the moment, but I will probably report in the autumn.

I shall shortly meet the chairman of the Illicit Trade Advisory Panel. I want to discuss with him what will happen following representations he has made to me. Perhaps I shall have further news after that meeting.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): Are the Government giving a friendly response to recommendation 7 on the framework and funding of the portable antiquities scheme?

Estelle Morris: I personally am giving it an exceptionally friendly response. The problem is persuading other Ministers to give a more friendly response to it than to other bids.

The £1.5 million invested by the Department is not a huge amount, but it has achieved a great deal. There were 87,000 finds last year, and 20,000 people are now taking part in the activity, of whom 4,000 are children. I think it would be a shame if the scheme did not continue. Perhaps my words will fall on favourable ears.

All I can say now is that the bid is there and the intention is to continue the funding. It would be silly to say more than I have dared to say thus far without knowing exactly what will happen to our settlement in the next spending review. More risk than that I am not about to take.

National Lottery

3. Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): How much is unallocated in the national lottery distribution fund. [174893]

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): The NLDF holds about £2.65 billion, of which less than 4 per cent. is unallocated. Forward commitments made by lottery distributors total £3.6 billion, making the fund 32 per cent. over-committed.

Mr. Swire: That is a welcome move in the right direction, but it still fails to meet the figures planned by the Government as long ago as 2002. As a matter of principle, however, is it not iniquitous that so much money can still be held centrally when up and down the country there are good causes, some of them time-limited? In my constituency the Weavers' Tales celebrate 250 years of carpet-making in Axminster, while the Norman Lockyer observatory in Sidmouth is crying out for money to improve access. Everywhere in the country are good causes for which local people want funds that currently sit invested and centrally held. Can the Secretary of State not give the Heritage Lottery Fund and other distribution bodies clearer guidelines so that the money can be given back to those from whom it originally came?

Estelle Morris: The Secretary of State has done exactly that. All lottery distributors receive guidance on not holding back too much in reserve. We should not give the impression that money that is waiting to be spent sits in the coffers owing to inefficiency. This is about managing cash flow as much as anything else. As I said in my answer, the fund is 32 per cent. over-committed. In reducing the reserves, we want to ensure that we spend what we can reasonably spend this year, and not make worthwhile projects throughout the country wait until next year or the year after.

The National Audit Office is currently considering what balance it is appropriate for distributors to hold. I think that its report, which will appear in the next few months, will give us extra ammunition in making sure that the distributors do not retain funds centrally. I should put on record, however, that they are held by the distributors and not by Government.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): Can the Minister assure me that any surplus funds will be spent on the arts—on sport rather than the arts, and will not be wasted on schemes for the London lobbies?

Estelle Morris: I much preferred my hon. Friend's initial comment; indeed, perhaps I should ask you to introduce a new rule, Mr. Speaker, stating "no corrections allowed". At the moment, the distributors themselves keep the money, and the real issue is where the interest on funds that are held is spent. There is a formula for the giving of lottery money to distributors, and currently there is almost an incentive for them to hold on to the reserves, given that they also keep the interest. As my hon. Friend will know from the relevant document, we intend to ensure that that interest is shared equally among all the funds. If I had time, I would list the many benefits of giving such money to the arts—not just for luvvies, but for people throughout the country in all communities, rural and urban. Indeed, without arts funding this country would be a much poorer place.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth) (Con): The Minister will be aware that in the east midlands, and in Leicestershire in particular, there is concern that less than the average number of bids from the region are successful. Why are we discriminated against in this way?

Estelle Morris: It is impossible to discriminate in terms of bids because the Government do not control the number of bids coming in, but the hon. Gentleman makes a very interesting point. On outcomes, the situation in the east midlands may well resemble that in my own constituency, in that it does not get what one might call its fair share of lottery fund money. The Government, together with the lottery distributors, have already embarked on the fair share initiative, through which we will work very carefully with those areas that are not receiving a fair amount of money.

I should point out that if the hon. Gentleman feels that applications from his area are not forthcoming, the lottery distributors would be more than happy to meet him, and perhaps to work jointly with his constituency and the neighbouring constituencies to encourage grass-roots organisations to make bids. If they do not make the bids, they cannot get the money. The hon. Gentleman has highlighted a very important point, and I very much hope that he will respond to that invitation. Lottery distributors are more than willing to work with any Member of this House to increase the number of bids from under-represented constituencies.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): Why is the bureaucracy associated with efforts to get money from the lottery so difficult to deal with? Does the Minister agree with the criticism offered by my local schools and Bedfordshire county council, which said that it has been exceptionally difficult to get lottery distribution money for new sports facilities from the New Opportunities Fund? Indeed, when the fund was set up in 2001, it was allocated a budget of £500 million, but until last month only £10.4 million had actually been spent.

Estelle Morris: We do need to reduce bureaucracy; indeed, there is nothing more frustrating than people being put off making bids because they feel that the process will prove too bureaucratic. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Sport and Tourism tells me that the programme to which the hon. Gentleman refers is now ahead of schedule. However, there have been bureaucratic problems, and I hope that they have been sorted out. In respect of the awards for all initiative, for example, the waiting time from application to making the grant has been significantly reduced. All lottery distributors are aware of the problems associated with too much form filling and lengthy waiting times for the making of decisions. I take seriously the point that the hon. Gentleman makes, and we need constantly to keep our eye on the situation, and to do all that we can to reduce form filling and bureaucracy.

Playing Fields

4. Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): What assessment she has made of the work of the playing fields monitoring group; and if she will make a statement on its monthly list of planning applications for building on playing fields. [174894]

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): Before I answer the question, Mr. Speaker, may I thank you and all Members of the House for agreeing to start the Westminster mile—hopefully, Roger Bannister will be involved—on 16 June from Abingdon Green? The BBC's Sport Relief is a very good charity, and I hope that many Members will participate in the event.

The Government have convened a meeting of the national playing fields monitoring group on 27 May to assess the work of the group and to discuss its future role. The Government will continue to publish playing fields statistics annually rather than monthly, because annual statistics provide a comprehensive picture of our progress in protecting these important resources.

Mr. Robathan: The Government set up the monitoring group only four years ago to report monthly on planning applications for the development of playing fields, so when it meets on Wednesday, will the Minister explain why it has not met for nearly a year? When the Secretary of State said in a speech in March to sports colleges that > "There is a great deal of misty-eyed sentimentalism about playing fields", and when she sneeringly spoke of

> "critics clinging to a world of jumpers for goalposts and small boys in the park", was she dismissing the value of healthy outdoor activity and the importance that most people attach to a large number of playing fields?

Mr. Caborn: We have explained many times from the Dispatch Box that we will have a dialogue with the National Playing Fields Association. We will consider the need to look at indoor facilities, too. Change has been significant since we brought in new rules about playing fields and made Sport England a statutory consultee. Well over 90 per cent. of all the applications referred to it end up providing equal or better facilities. In 2001–02, there was £270 million of investment and 447 new facilities were provided, and the year after, nearly 500 new facilities were provided. Since 1995, Sport England has created more than 320 new sports pitches and improved over 520 facilities, and that is just Sport England—that does not include local authorities and many other organisations that are involved in playing fields.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): Mr. Speaker, I was most disappointed to hear that you would not be running the mile. I will be happy to help if you do, hopefully next year.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that we need much more rounded statistics and much more depth in our learning? When I was chair of East Midlands Sport, many applications that came to us led to improved facilities. We should have rejected, where possible, the 10 per cent. where there was no improvement. Can the monitoring group ensure that, where there is no improvement, the bids are rejected because we need to see more playing fields? Will he recognise that, where bids will lead to improvements, they should be supported because, in many cases, particularly in my constituency, we have seen vast improvements and greater participation, which is the key to all this?

Mr. Caborn: I could not agree more. To that end, in July, we will be rolling out for the first time ever a facilities database. I have asked Sport England to come down before that starts in July and to present that to all Back Benchers. It will be available for about four or five hours on the day before we launch it, so that every hon. Member will be able to see what sports facilities are in their area.

The database will be updated regularly. I hope that, by the end of this year, local authorities and others will be able to use it to ensure that they can see supply and demand in their area, a point that was referred to by my hon. Friend. For the first time, we will be able to make informed decisions about the type of investment that is going into sports facilities across the board.

Mr. Boris Johnson (Henley) (Con): The Minister said in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) that there had been significant change in respect of playing fields since the Government came to power in 1997. That is certainly true. They came to power saying that they would halt the sale of school playing fields to arrest the decline of sport in schools, since when the number of applications to sell playing fields has gone up every year. Last year—this is the most relevant statistic—of the 807 successful applications, 440 led to the total extinction of those facilities. Given the threat to sport in schools, particularly contact sports, from litigation and all kinds of other matters, against which Ministers say not a peep, will the Minister now tell the House what measures he has in mind—apart from encouraging people to run down concrete roads, and apart from an annual meeting of the playing fields monitoring group—to arrest the sale of playing fields?

Mr. Caborn: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to the Dispatch Box. May I now inform him why no one should vote Tory again if they support playing fields? The planning applications that were made when his Government were in power were to shut playing fields. The planning applications for investment of £500 million are to build new facilities—we have to have planning applications to build new facilities. The simple answer to his question is: do not vote Tory—they will shut your playing fields down.

Amateur Sports Clubs

5. Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the take-up of rate relief support for amateur sports clubs. [174895]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): As of the end of April this year more than 1,100 local amateur sports clubs had registered with the community amateur sports club scheme. That scheme provides such clubs with an 80 per cent. relief on their non-domestic rates as part of a whole package of benefits intended to promote community and grass-roots sport. My hon. Friend will be aware that two clubs—a rugby club and a bowling club—in his constituency have opted to take advantage of the scheme.

Mr. Dhanda: I thank my right hon. Friend for her answer and I am pleased to hear about the 1,100 clubs, including no less august bodies than the Gloucester Old Boys rugby football club and the Gloucestershire Spar bowls club, that have taken advantage of the scheme. I also congratulate my right hon. Friend on introducing a simple one-page form for rates relief, which has made a huge difference and encouraged more clubs to apply. I urge her to use that as an example of good practice, cutting bureaucracy across government.

Tessa Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend. We are beginning to make progress on take-up and I hope that Members throughout the House will urge their local sports clubs to register in this way because of the tangible benefits and money to be saved, which can then be reinvested and spent on grass-roots sport. That is the objective: to promote participation and to improve facilities for grass-roots sport. I am very glad that my hon. Friend has recognised the success of the scheme.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I welcome the scheme and pay tribute to the contribution that it is making, but does the right hon. Lady not agree with the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Watts) and me that after the reduction and raiding of the sports part of the lottery funding, there is not the same amount of money coming into sport, particularly for rugby clubs, such as the York club at Clifton Moor. What more can the Secretary of State do to encourage clubs to invest when they have lost that source of funding?

Tessa Jowell: I do not accept the hon. Lady's assertion. Over three years, £1 billion is going into new sports facilities. That is a proud record, which outstrips anything that any Government have done in the past. Yes, every lottery distributor has faced a reduction in the level of lottery income, but the hon. Lady will have noticed, as I have, that the last quarter's figures reported by Camelot, showed an increase in lottery sales for the first time. That is good for good causes, good for sport and good for the sports clubs in the hon. Lady's constituency.

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the rate relief scheme is excellent news for amateur clubs such as the Palmer park velo cycling club in my constituency? Does she also agree that, if the London Olympic bid is successful, we should look not only east, as my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) has suggested, but west to Reading where the Palmer park velodrome would be proud to host the world's finest cyclists?

Tessa Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend for that generous offer. She makes an important point—that the benefits stemming from the Olympic bid will not be for London alone, but will help sport across the country. The community amateur sports club scheme is one practical way of extending the benefit.

Licensing Act

6. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): If she will make a statement about the implementation of the Licensing Act 2003. [174896]

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): The timetable for full implementation of the Licensing Act 2003 is dependent on parliamentary approval of the draft guidance to local authorities, which was laid before Parliament on 23 March. If Parliament is content, we expect to complete the implementation of the Act around late summer 2005.

Mr. Swayne: What will the fees be for licences under the new regime? If the Minister cannot tell us the fee level now, when will he be able to tell us?

Mr. Caborn: We are in discussion with the Local Government Association and others in the industry. I hope to be able to announce the fees in the not too distant future. We have already given an indication and I do not believe that it will prove to be far from the mark.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend is aware that several Labour Members are concerned that the new licensing law may not necessarily bring about a reduction in harmful alcohol consumption. Will he keep the new law under careful and close scrutiny with a view to reforming it yet again if it appears that it has brought about increased levels of harmful consumption rather than a reduction?

Mr. Caborn: All those consulted broadly agree with the 2003 Act. There is a misunderstanding about the extension of the flexibility of licensing. The police have said clearly on every occasion that they believe that the flexibility will bring alcohol-related crime down. All the indications to date within the UK—including Scotland, where the instance of such crimes has fallen—are clear. We have run three experiments. Over the new year period in the capital at the millennium, for example, we found that crime came down by 6 per cent. as a result of the 36-hour opening. I repeat that all the experience so far suggests that greater flexibility will reduce crime.

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay) (LD): One side effect of the Act for the professional football clubs—the Government have a good record of support for association football—is that stewards have to be trained, and the cost that has been cited is £500 a steward, which is an enormous amount for small second or third division clubs. Is the Minister aware of the problem?

Mr. Caborn: I am very aware of it. Several organisations representing the stewards have written to me, and I am seeking clarification from the Home Office. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we are pushing very hard and we will try to ensure that assurances given in the other place are adhered to.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton) (Lab): I welcome the Act, but some social and sporting clubs believe that the interpretation is such that their associates and visitors will not be able to participate in the social well-being of the club or purchase or partake of any beverages there. Is my right hon. Friend aware of that, and what does he intend to do about it?

Mr. Caborn: Again, I am very aware of it, and I must have signed off something like three dozen letters this weekend on what is clearly a misinterpretation by the English Golf Union concerning membership of golf clubs. In fact, there is very little variation from the previous Act. It is basically status quo for the over-18s, although there is a tightening for under-18s in clubs. There should be no change for golf clubs or indeed any other sports clubs.

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): It is all very well the Minister saying that the problem seems to have gone away. The English Golf Union wrote to us only today saying that it is still not happy with his and his civil servants' so-called interpretation about why, under the guidance and under the Act as written, many golfers who are neither members of other qualifying clubs nor guests in the strict definition of that term will not be able to buy a drink on the 19th hole.

Mr. Caborn: The English Golf Union has not got back to me personally on that. Nothing has crossed my desk—if it does, I will hope to answer the point more fully. I reassure the hon. Gentleman that the position remains the same as under the previous Act, when the 19th hole was quite well watered—and I expect that it will continue to be quite well watered in the future.

Football

7. John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): What discussions she has had on consumer and worker involvement in the future of the football industry. [174897]

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have met representatives from a number of organisations involved in football to discuss a range of issues, including, in broad terms, the recommendations of the all-party group's report on English football and its finances and the Independent Football Commission's annual report 2003. We will release the outcome of those discussions when we respond to both reports.

John Mann: Having left Bradford City at the knacker's yard, Geoffrey Richmond is now advising his son and others who are currently selling off the assets of Leeds United football club, and doubtless intending again to pay themselves handsome consultancy fees in the process. We have also seen Leicester City failing to pay 90p in the pound on its tax liability, yet still affording to go to La Manga for a week last season. The next time a football club goes into administration, will the Government take action to ensure that the taxpayer gets proper value for money by taking a slice of the club and handing it over to the supporters, allowing them to have some ownership of their team?

Mr. Caborn: My hon. Friend makes his points with some passion. It was this Government who set up Supporters Direct, which has given sound information to many fans and seeks good governance for football. Many of us believe that football is very important for our communities, so we will continue to work with Supporters Direct. When a club goes into administration, that is dealt with by the authorities, and it is for them to act as they see fit.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I thank the Minister for his response. Does he agree that another area of professional football that needs examining is the parasitic behaviour of agents? Whenever football transfers are carried out and salaries are creamed off, should not the sum taken out of the game and given to those parasites be made clear, so that supporters know exactly where the money is going?

Mr. Caborn: The wake-up call for football was what happened with ITV Digital, and I believe that the nationwide league, with its chair, Mr. Brian Mawhinney—[HON. MEMBERS: "Sir Brian!"] Thank you for that correction. Sir Brian is looking into the whole question of corporate governance, and has brought forward a number of actions that would bring about better governance. I note that the premiership is also considering such questions. The two reports that I referred to earlier bring into focus many of the points that hon. Members have raised, and we shall respond to them in due course.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): I am sure that the Minister is aware of the current difficulties of Wrexham football club, where the post of chairman is vacant—I mentioned that in case it might interest him. He probably will not be aware, however, that this very evening, consumers, workers and supporters who are concerned about the position of the club are meeting to found an organisation called Wrexham First, to ensure that the future of the club lies within its community rather than in the hands of property developers. What are the Government doing to embed such organisations and clubs in their communities, rather than in the hands of those who seek to exploit football clubs for property motives, and for their own commercial ends?

Mr. Caborn: As I have already said, we set up, or rather funded, the organisation Supporters Direct, and my very strong advice to Wrexham and those trying to rescue the club is to take counsel from Supporters Direct. I have no doubt that it will give them information that they will be able to work on to ensure that the club continues to play a major role in its community.

Stonehenge

8. Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): What matters were discussed when the Minister for Media and Heritage met the head of UNESCO at Stonehenge on 17 May. [174898]

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): Mr. Matsuura, director general of UNESCO, requested to see Stonehenge during his informal visit to the United Kingdom last week. He had a tour of the Stonehenge world heritage site with officials of English Heritage and the National Trust. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Media and Heritage, as the Minister responsible for world heritage sites, joined him to visit the stone circle itself.

Mr. Key: I am grateful for that information. All DCMS Ministers, whichever House they come from, are always welcome in my constituency, as is the director general of UNESCO. Can the Minister give an unequivocal commitment that, subject to planning conditions, the developments of the road in the world heritage site and the new visitors centre at Stonehenge are firmly in the Government's programme, that there will be no backsliding and no instructions from the Treasury, and that both will be completed?

Estelle Morris: I understand the hon. Gentleman's eagerness to ensure that firm commitments are made on this subject. Indeed, my officials tell me that we have got further with the current set of proposals than ever before. It is good news that the inspector's report was delivered a week ahead of schedule, which shows that in terms of time, we are still on target. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the developments are firmly in our spending plans for 2008, assuming that all planning applications and consents go accordingly.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I welcome the work that the Government are doing with UNESCO to support cultural heritage at Stonehenge and elsewhere, but when the Minister for Media and Heritage met people from UNESCO, did he take the opportunity to discuss ways, in which we could do more, through UNESCO, to support cultural reconstruction in war-torn countries such as Iraq? Does the Minister therefore think that it would be vital to persuade the American Government to do what we have done recently—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. That has nothing to do with Stonehenge.

Football

9. Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): What steps she is taking to encourage and support professional football clubs to develop community links and involvement. [174899]

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): The Government are working with the Football Association, the Football Foundation and other partners to encourage professional football clubs to develop stronger community links with schemes such as football in the community and playing for success.

Mr. Pike: My right hon. Friend has been to Turf Moor several times in the past 12 months, and I know that he has recently met directors and other representatives of Burnley football club; I believe that he is going to Turf Moor again soon. Does he not agree that the way forward for football clubs such as Burnley is to become community clubs, as they are anxious to do, and to form supporters trusts? Is it not that type of policy, rather than some of the others that we heard about earlier, that need the encouragement and support of the Government and local government if local football clubs are to succeed and survive into the future?

Mr. Caborn: I could not agree more. Burnley is a fantastic football club, and has always played a role in the community, and I hope that the discussions to make it a strong community club again are successful. We bash professional football quite a lot, but statistics show that every year 40,000 pupils take part in Playing for Success. Many young people have gained from that experience, and nearly 1 million people have contact with football in the community. Professional footballers do a great deal of good work in their communities, and help the sport at grassroots in many ways, so we ought to commend the Football Association, the premier division and the Football League.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, was asked—

Redundant Churches

20. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): What the policy of the commissioners is in relation to redundant churches for which dioceses have found no suitable alternative uses. [174911]

Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): Depending on the quality of the building, the commissioners have to decide between vesting the church in the Churches Conservation Trust for preservation or, as a last resort, demolishing it.

David Taylor: Since 1969, 10 per cent. of Anglican churches have been lost as places of worship. Over 300 have been demolished, of which one quarter were listed buildings. Does my hon. Friend agree that the Churches Conservation Trust should be given greater resources to protect threatened churches, especially in rural areas, where alternative uses are difficult to find? Their historic interest, architectural quality and landscape value, however, are often of the utmost importance to local communities. How will those communities benefit if a sale does take place?

Sir Stuart Bell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his question. To date, 332 high-quality and important churches have been passed to the trust, and 366 have been demolished. A sum of £33 million has been raised since 1969 from the disposal of redundant churches, 80 per cent. of which has been put back into the dioceses for the use of the living church, to answer the point made by hon. Friend. We have passed £6.4 million to the Churches Conservation Trust, which we finance jointly with the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. As my hon. Friend is asking for money, and as the Minister for the Arts is in the Chamber, let those who have ears hear his question.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that demolition is a counsel of despair and an admission of failure? Would he not further agree that in almost every imaginable scenario, with a degree of commitment and imagination it ought to be possible to refurbish an otherwise redundant church so that it can be made available to young people for amateur dramatics or other useful indoor activities?

Sir Stuart Bell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He should understand that redundant churches are demolished only as a last resort, and we are keen that they should be used for community purposes. In fact, that is one of the options that we have developed positively in the interest of local communities, and we take into account other factors before any decision on demolition is made.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): What about the graveyards next to abandoned or redundant churches? I find it very dispiriting indeed to see neglected and overgrown graveyards when the Church is spending money on bishops' palaces. It does not, however, have the money to maintain graveyards.

Sir Stuart Bell: Yes, of course, redundant churches sometimes have a cemetery next to them. The use of the word "graveyard" gives away the hon. Gentleman's age and experience. No one, of course, wants graves to fall into such a condition, and every effort is made to maintain those cemeteries in keeping with the Church's commitment and in keeping with the wishes of people whose lost ones are buried there. We will do our very best to take into account the point made by my hon. Friend.

Wayleaves

21. Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): What study the commissioners have made of moneys owed to church properties resulting from wayleaves. [174912]

Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows that I am an expert on wayleaves. The Church Commissioners, however, have not made such a study.

Mr. Swire: Many dioceses have benefited enormously from wayleave payments from private utility companies. The diocese of Exeter has received £33,500 from BT and Western Power, Salisbury received £18,500, St. David's in Wales got £10,000 and Wells cathedral £4,500. I am sure the hon. Gentleman would agree that those are all welcome moneys to hard-pressed ecclesiastical organisations. None the less, many ecclesiastical organisations remain unclear or uncertain as to their entitlement to wayleaves from public utility companies. Will he endeavour to spread the word to encourage them to go after wayleaves, to get the money that they are surely due?

Sir Stuart Bell: A wayleave is a terminable right of way over or under land, for which a rent is normally paid. Typically it would be used for an electricity supply line or some such. I did tell the hon. Gentleman I was an expert on the subject. The rural portfolio of the commissioners generated net rents of £6.1 million and capital receipts of £10.1 million last year. On the question whether there should be a study, we do not have a problem with the collection of wayleaves, so no study is necessary. However, on the pertinent point of the hon. Gentleman's question, I shall do my very best to ensure that all parishes understand the benefit that can come to them from wayleaves.

Parish Priests

22. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): How many parish priests were recruited in the first quarter of (a) 1997 and (b) 2004. [174913]

Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): The ministry division of the Archbishops Council does not record ordination figures on a quarterly basis. However, I can tell my hon. Friend—the hon. Lady has put so many questions to us over the past few years that she is now an hon. Friend—that in the whole of 1997 there were 262 newly ordained stipendiary deacons available for deployment, compared with 333 in 2003.

Miss McIntosh: I welcome the large upturn in recruits to parish priesthood. I hope that he will join me in recording the valuable role and the pastoral care that rural vicars in particular provide, especially in constituencies such as the Vale of York which suffered so much during the foot and mouth crisis and subsequently. To what does the hon. Gentleman attribute the change? Does he believe that it will continue for the foreseeable future?

Sir Stuart Bell: I am grateful for the hon. Lady's comments and her support for clergy, especially in her constituency, where I know she spends some time and follows these matters carefully. Although the number now deployed is up, there is still likely to be a fall in the stipendiary clergy due to retirements. That fall is from 9,109 in 2003 to 8,691 in 2007. However, the Church's commitment and the commitment reflected in the newly ordained stipendiaries is a reflection of a commitment to faith in the 21st century.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Is it not a fact that because the Church cannot afford ministers these days, fewer are coming into the ministry and many churches depend on retired ministers to meet their commitment to hold holy communion services on a Sunday?

Sir Stuart Bell: I surmise that the fact that there is a difficulty in securing clergy for every church is due to the numbers of clergy, rather than to the stipend levels. The stipend levels for clergy of incumbent status in 1996–97 were £13,940 and £18,110 respectively. The figures now are £13,910 and £17,140, so the issue of money is taken care of, but the number required is still a problem.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION COMMITTEE

The hon. Member for Gosport, representing the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission, was asked—

Elections

23. Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): What representations the Commission has received regarding increasing participation in elections. [174914]

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): I am advised by the Electoral Commission that it has received numerous representations suggesting how participation in elections might be increased from a broad range of individuals and organisations.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that answer. Does he share my deep concern about the low turnout that we may experience in the European and local elections that are to be held on 10 June? Does he also share my concern about the potential for misuse, manipulation and corruption through postal balloting? What is the Electoral Commission going to do to protect us from manipulation of the postal ballots?

Mr. Viggers: The expansion of postal voting since 2000 has allowed large numbers of voters to participate in elections at a time that is convenient for them, but my hon. Friend is right to focus on safeguards. In its publication "The Shape of Elections to Come", the Electoral Commission set out a range of measures that it believes should be implemented. Some of those measures have been introduced, but others have not, including the key proposal of individual registration of voters.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): Increased participation in absolute terms, if not percentage terms, could be improved by electoral registration, which was the last point that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. What is the Electoral Commission doing to increase registration to overcome the problems? Perhaps it could extend the provisions on rolling registration, which the Government introduced in 2000.

Mr. Viggers: It is the view of the Electoral Commission that individual registration and ensuring that the register of voters is accurate are key to our democracy. As I said, the key point in the view of the Electoral Commission is individual registration, but the hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point, and it will be noted.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Has the hon. Gentleman had the opportunity to read the seventh report of the Select Committee on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister: Housing, Planning and Local Government, which investigated postal voting? The report, which would have been valuable to the House during its consideration of the recent Bill introducing all-postal pilots, makes some very good suggestions for countering fraud, including not only individual voter registration, which he mentioned, but increased resources for electoral officers, the establishment of a national database and dissemination to police forces of information on electoral offences. Can the Electoral Commission now work with the Select Committee to develop those recommendations and, it is to be hoped, to persuade the Government to introduce them?

Mr. Viggers: Yes, the Electoral Commission believes that the Select Committee report is indeed valuable. As for the commission's own activities, following consultation with returning officers and political parties, it has recently released a draft code of conduct for candidates and party workers relating to postal voting. The code will be finalised later this year, following assessment of its use in the June elections.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, was asked—

Housing

24. Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): What the Church Commissioners' policy is for developing their housing estates. [174915]

Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): All the Church Commissioners' investments are managed according to their statutory responsibility to ensure the best long-term return from a diversified investment portfolio.

Sir Sydney Chapman: I am grateful to the Second Church Estates Commissioner for that policy statement, but in relation to developing the estates, can he give some specific examples to show what part the commissioners are playing in improving the housing stock of this country by their policy?

Sir Stuart Bell: Middleton house in Pimlico was upgraded and repaired in April 2003, and part of the Waterloo estate was completed in March this year. Work in Vauxhall began last autumn. Work differs between the estates, but, generally, the work that we carry out involves new or repaired roofs, windows, external repairs and improved communal areas. Some £19 million has been spent or committed to those three estates, and there is other ongoing work.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION COMMITTEE

The hon. Member for Gosport, representing the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission, was asked—

Boundary Review

25. Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) (Con): If he will ask the commission to take steps to ensure that as part of the current boundary review process, all parliamentary constituencies are as near to 70,000 constituents as possible. [174916]

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): The Electoral Commission does not have any responsibility for the process of reviewing parliamentary constituency boundaries. Section 16 of the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Act 2000 provides for the function to be transferred from the respective boundary commissions to the Electoral Commission, but this provision has not yet been implemented.

Mr. Steen: In view of the statutory duty of the boundary commission to ensure that all parliamentary constituencies are as near to 70,000 people as possible, can my hon. Friend explain how the playing field has become totally lopsided, and why 48 per cent. of parliamentary seats are either below 65,000 people or above 75,000? Is this a matter that he could take up with the boundary commission? Does he think that it is a coincidence that 43 per cent. of all the seats with fewer than 65,000 people are held by Labour incumbents?

Mr. Viggers: The facts that my hon. Friend reports are interesting, but I have to say on behalf of the Electoral Commission that it currently has no responsibility in that area.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, was asked—

Church Commissioners' Website

27. Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): How many (a) hits and (b) unique visits per day were received by the Church Commissioners' website in April 2004. [174919]

Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the Church Commissioners' website is part of a Church of England family of sites, which currently receives some 3 million hits a month.

Mr. Key: I look forward to hearing that that figure has jumped to 6 million, because the Church of England lags some way behind other churches in this respect. I hope not only that adequate resources will be provided centrally for the Church Commissioners' website, but that every encouragement will be given to all dioceses to use their websites much more effectively than at present.

Sir Stuart Bell: The hon. Gentleman makes an encouraging suggestion. I can tell him that the commissioners' website continues to develop. In 2003, guidance on the commissioners' residential lettings policy and available properties was added. I shall carry the hon. Gentleman's recommendation back to the Church, and I hope that he will see something exciting and interesting in the months to come.

Deepcut Barracks

3.30 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): Right hon. and hon. Members will be aware of the incident that took place in Iraq today. I am sure that they will understand that since the families of those involved are in the process of being informed, I cannot add any detail to the Foreign Secretary's statement in Brussels earlier today. However, I am sure that the House will join me in extending our condolences to the families of the two individuals who were killed and our best wishes for a speedy recovery to the person who was injured. British civilians are doing a valuable job in bringing stability to Iraq, and it is deeply shocking that they should be attacked in this way by the enemies of peace and democracy.

In the armed forces personnel debate on 13 May, I informed the House that I intended shortly to make a statement in response to the report of the Surrey police into the four tragic deaths at Princess Royal barracks, which was published on 5 March this year. I am grateful for this opportunity to do so.

It weighs heavily with me as to why we are here today. Between 1995 and 2002, four young people died tragically before their time. For the families of Privates Sean Benton, Cheryl James, Geoff Gray and James Collinson, these have been long and difficult years. I recognise that I cannot experience their grief, but I understand it and again pass my condolences on to them. The Army shares their sorrow. I also recognise that in some respects the families have not been as well treated as they should have been. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has apologised unreservedly for those failings, and I repeat these sentiments today.

I am grateful to the chief constable of the Surrey police for his report, which made the clear recommendation that the Ministry of Defence should consider a broader investigation into first, whether the risks identified at Deepcut are replicated across the wider Army Training and Recruiting Agency and how those may relate to the issues of self-harm, suicide and undetermined deaths; secondly, how the Army's care regime may be improved further; and thirdly, how independent oversight might help the Army to define and maintain appropriate standards of care for young soldiers.

The report also acknowledges the positive approach taken since August 2002 and states that

"if Army systems of accountability continue to be developed, then systemic and cultural change may be achieved and sustained."

That refers to the report by the deputy Adjutant General and the creation of the Army learning account—a systematic mechanism to learn and apply lessons that was put in place in 2002 following the tragic death of Private Collinson. In addition, on 3 October 2002, I commissioned the director of operational capability to conduct an audit of initial training across the armed forces. That was a hard-hitting, cross-cutting report that generated rigorous self-examination and was followed by a reappraisal last summer.

Those reports generated a comprehensive action plan against which progress could be measured. I can report that of the 58 recommendations, 48 are implemented and progressing satisfactorily and the remaining 10 are being addressed. They include improvements in staff to trainee ratios and improved welfare facilities. As right hon. and hon. Members will be aware, both those documents have been placed in the Library, as will be the report of the further re-appraisal planned for the autumn.

That commitment to improvement continues. I can announce today that I have committed further investment of more than £23 million to the training system. That will provide further instructor training, further improvement of supervisory ratios and increased opportunities for the use of recreational facilities and other welfare projects.

I believe that the work put in train as a result of the director of operational capability's appraisals and the deputy Adjutant General's report through the Army learning account, of which 25 of 26 actions have been completed, is significant. The publication of those reports and the supporting papers to the Surrey police report reflect our commitment to openness, improvement and accountability in the delivery of initial training across the armed forces.

The calls for a broader inquiry and independent oversight are difficult issues that I have had to consider carefully. The armed forces are rightly renowned for their ability. The performance of our servicemen and women in the most demanding operational situations is ample evidence of that. Such performance rests on rigorous training, which encourages character development, the acceptance of responsibility, discipline and the determination to succeed in adversity. However, I also recognise the need for public reassurance that the training is properly conducted and that the young men and women who join our armed forces are properly supported during that formative stage in their lives.

For that reason, we have decided to appoint the adult learning inspectorate—the ALI—to conduct independent inspection and oversight of the armed forces' training establishments. As hon. Members know, the ALI has a statutory responsibility to examine and report on the quality of education and training for adults and young people. It is entirely independent of the Ministry of Defence and is a widely respected body.

A memorandum of understanding will be drawn up with the ALI for an annual rolling programme of independent inspections to include the initial training establishments. The first inspection will begin in the autumn this year. I have asked for the first inspection to focus on initial training across all three services and to look specifically at care and welfare. It will include Deepcut. There will be no no-go areas. The inspectorate will report to Ministers by Easter next year and that report will be published. That will be followed by a rolling programme of inspections, which will cover all aspects of service training, including initial training and the environment in which it is conducted. It will include delivery of the training as well as the care and welfare of trainees. For the first time, all aspects of our training will be benchmarked against national standards and good practice. This will help reduce risks faced by young trainees not only in the Army but in all three services.

[Mr. Adam Ingram]

We must ensure that improvements are sustained. The ALI's recommendations will be tracked centrally in the Ministry of Defence. The inspectorate will be empowered to revisit areas to check on implementation of agreed recommendations and to ensure that progress is maintained. Throughout the process, its staff will have direct access to me if they have concerns that their recommendations are not being properly considered.

I believe that the ALI's involvement will enable us to build substantially on the work that we have already done, ensure continued and sustained improvements and enhance the transparency of what we are doing. It will complement the quality training provided by the armed forces and provide wider reassurance. It represents a positive and prompt response to the Surrey police recommendations.

I am aware also of the calls by the families and others for a public inquiry into the four deaths. I understand why the families and others feel strongly about a public inquiry, but we need to be clear about what a public inquiry would seek to achieve. I recognise that the families want to know exactly what happened to their loved ones and why.

In the first three cases, there have been investigations, coroner's inquests and subsequent intensive police reinvestigations. The Surrey police found no evidence to indicate any prospect of a prosecution directly related to the deaths. Private James Collinson's case, from the start the subject of an investigation by the Surrey police, has yet to be heard by the coroner. The coroner's inquiry will be held in public and is the proper place to examine the circumstances of sudden deaths.

The courts have made it clear that the coroner can and should make sure that the jury reaches a conclusion on all the central issues of a case and that the court considers relevant wider factors. We will of course co-operate fully in the forthcoming inquest, as we have done with other inquests.

I have weighed all these factors carefully. I do not underestimate the depth of feeling and the passion of the families who lost loved ones at Deepcut, but I am not persuaded, given the intensive investigations and inquiries, and the new measures that I have put in place, of what more a public inquiry would achieve. I know that this will be disappointing to the families but I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will recognise the openness and robustness of the approach that I am reporting to the House today.

I have made no secret of the fact that improvement was needed in the initial training regime, and we have now given the initial training system across all three services a thorough audit and overhaul. The audit led to substantive, sustained measures to improve it. With the closer engagement of the adult learning inspectorate, further audits will take place. This will ensure accountability and external oversight for the future. We have the finest armed forces, and they consistently act as a force for good in the world. The bravery and achievement of our service people on operations is testament to that. That would not be the case if the system that trained them was fundamentally flawed—quite the reverse. The gallantry shown by our personnel on operations bears testament to the underlying quality of the people we recruit, of the training that they receive and of those who provide the training. Like all large systems, this one needs improvement and regular maintenance, and I am determined that it will receive both.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): May I thank the Minister of State for providing me with an advance copy of his statement? I should also like to associate Her Majesty's Opposition with his remarks about the bombings in Baghdad involving British causalities today, and with his tribute to the very fine work that British civilians are doing on the reconstruction of Iraq.

The deaths of the four young people while training to take their place serving in Her Majesty's armed forces is, above all, a terrible personal tragedy for each of the families concerned. The hearts of all of us in the House, not least those of us with children of our own, go out to those parents and families. It is also, as the Minister suggested, a tragedy for the Army, because it has damaged public confidence in its ability to fulfil its required duty of care towards the young men and women in its charge—a duty which I know it takes very seriously.

We note the Government's decision to introduce some independent oversight. Perhaps, for the better assistance of the House, the Minister could remind us of some of the individuals involved in the adult learning inspectorate. Who runs it, for example? Who are some of its key members? Will he also ensure that those in the agency, who will be given substantial powers of inspection, will be familiar with the way in which the armed forces operate and with the need for the robust training of which he spoke? Will he publish the memorandum of understanding that he is about to sign with the agency? How does the Minister see the role of the current Defence Select Committee inquiry into more or less the same thing as he is setting up with the adult learning inspectorate, and will he ensure that the Committee's report is made available to the inspectorate in due course?

During a debate in Westminster Hall last month, the Secretary of State cited the higher incidence of suicide among young males under the age of 20 in the Army compared with society at large, and said that he would order further studies. How are those studies progressing? The Minister of State stated that lessons had been implemented since 2002, but is it not the case that there have been no fewer than six internal inquiries into the Army training regime, some of which predated the recent deaths, and that too little was done to implement the resulting recommendations? In particular, the report by Lieutenant-Colonel Haes in 2001 criticised the shortage of supervisors. What is the ratio of supervisors to recruits at Deepcut today? Above all, has the Ministry of Defence accepted the serious charge levelled by Lieutenant-Colonel Haes that "the Army Training and Recruitment Agency is failing in certain aspects as a result of reduction in the military workforce and increased obligations"?

Ministers cannot go on demanding of our armed forces that, in the words of General Lord Guthrie, they do "more and more with less and less".

What action has been taken to ensure that young recruits do not have unsupervised access to live ammunition?

Finally, the Surrey police noted in their excellent report:

"It is important to recognise the significant challenges faced by the Army in reconciling the potentially conflicting demands of maintaining a necessarily robust training regime, designed to sustain it among the most professional armies in the world, while at the same time discharging its duty of care to young recruits".

Young recruits such as 18-year-old Trooper Christopher Finney of the Blues and Royals, who was awarded the George cross for his bravery in Iraq, are testament to the overall success of the Army's training mission. As a nation, we can be justly proud of the magnificent job that Britain's young men and women are doing today in Iraq.

Mr. Ingram: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for both his opening and his closing remarks. He highlighted the true excellence of our training system, which produces such high quality young men and women.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether the MOU relating to the ALI will be published, and the answer is yes. He also asked about the ALI, which is a Government body responsible for raising standards of education and training for young people and adults in England by inspecting and reporting on the quality of learning provision. It is well resourced and highly respected, and people with particular experience staff it, but it says that it must bring in people with particular expertise to assist it in its new role, which is why it must increase its staff. The process commences in the autumn, and the hon. Gentleman will understand the need for a pause after the announcement to allow the ALI to obtain the expertise it needs.

The hon. Gentleman says that the House of Commons Defence Committee inquiry is similar to the ALI inquiry, but it is not. The HCDC report can cover any matter, and I cannot direct what it examines—nor should I be able to—and I am not responsible for its course. My ministerial colleagues and I are responsible only for addressing any key issues it raises, so the HCDC's position is different from that of the ALI. The ALI reports directly to a Minister, and the MOD directly resources it. If it makes recommendations, the MOD must address them and examine how it can best implement them. The difference between the ALI and the HCDC is fundamental, although we welcome the HCDC inquiry and look forward to its conclusions.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the Haes report, but he could have referred to all the reports, which cover a considerable time. We have published the documents in order to ensure transparency. Lessons were learned, but in many cases the solutions were sadly not implemented. It is worth bearing in mind paragraph 4.20 of the Surrey police report, which states:

"Surrey Police has not sought to link any of these risk factors", which were mentioned in previous reports,

"specifically to the four individual deaths."

The report goes on to make other points, too.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the ratio of supervisors to recruits at Deepcut. Ratios differ depending on the type of training establishment. The immediate improvements that have been implemented established a ratio of about 1:38, which is believed to be appropriate and is the level that should have been maintained over previous years.

The hon. Gentleman asked about training with live ammunition, by which I suppose he also means handling firearms. Those matters must be dealt with properly, but he understands that we are training soldiers, not social workers. At some stage, soldiers must be trained, because they must use firearms and live ammunition confidently. The training system is robust, and I think that the hon. Gentleman agrees with my opening comment that it is tried and tested. Failures have occurred, but we are addressing them, and we must get them right.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Hull, North) (Lab): May I associate myself with right hon. Friend the Minister's opening remarks about the tragic deaths and woundings in Iraq?

There will be a great deal of disappointment and, indeed, anger at the decision not to hold a public inquiry. The Deepcut families, along with those from Catterick and beyond, will feel deeply disappointed, because they want to know why and how their loved ones died.

The thing that joins together all these families is a failure to provide mechanisms for effective inquiry and investigation of the deaths and often the cavalier treatment of the families seeking further information. Is my right hon. Friend aware that as a result of his statement the families will be seeking a judicial review based upon the Army precedent? Will he bear in mind that there will be grave suspicion about the point that he has raised over the independent examination of training procedures? It will not be fully independent of the MOD. It will not be established by legislation. The process will not be seen as other than an examination of training courses. It will not be seen by the families as a way of dealing with individual cases.

Finally and specifically, is my right hon. Friend aware that there will be great disappointment that in his statement he made no reference to the need to have an independent means of complaint by recruits and others that is outside the chain of command, which would enable their grievances to be properly examined?

Mr. Ingram: As my hon. Friend has said, I recognise the anger and disappointment that there will be following my statement. At a meeting that I had with my hon. Friend and the families, I tried to walk them through why I had come to this particular conclusion. We must look at the past and consider the impact of that on the present and the future. We have to separate out these particular issues.

I was able to point out to my hon. Friend that he is part of a campaign in which some are saying that there have been 1,748 unnatural deaths in the Army since 1990 and are arguing that all of those deaths should be subject to some form of inquiry. I appreciate that there might be a narrowing down to another number. Where would such a public inquiry end, how long would it take, what would it achieve and how would it impact upon the present and the future? I had to consider how to make things better. We are putting thousands of young people through the training regime year upon year and I cannot wait for a public inquiry. I want to do things now if things need to be improved upon. That is why I have decided to appoint the adult learning inspectorate. Its work will be fully independent. It is a calumny to suggest that because something is not laid down by statute there cannot be independence and that those involved cannot be robust, cannot be interrogative and cannot criticise a Government Department. I do not accept that.

The ALI will be given resources. If it is felt that that is not happening, the ALI will have immediate access to me as a Minister. If there is a blockage within the Department, I want to know what is going on. I have no doubt that the ALI will make sure that the public are aware if there are any failings on the part of the MOD. We will be held to public account.

My hon. Friend asked about an ombudsman for the armed forces. I think that that is a step too far because there is a chain of command. The armed forces are a unique set of people—there is no doubt or question about that. They are asked to do things that no one else is asked to do. That respect of the chain of command is vital. We have a zero tolerance policy towards bullying, harassment and racial discrimination. Does that mean that we are perfect? No, it does not. Does it mean that we can try to be better? Yes, it does. I think that the ALI is an important step towards achieving that. My hon. Friend said that the families may wish to seek a judicial review. That is a matter for them and the courts.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): I thank the Minister for an early sight of the statement. I concur with him on sending condolences from the House to those members of the armed forces and British citizens who have been killed today in Iraq.

I welcome the statement but like other hon. Members I am disappointed. We should note the great work that has been done by hon. Members on both sides of the House in pursuing these matters. The families have been so stoic and so strong in their campaign.

On behalf of the Liberal Democrats, I welcome what the Ministry of Defence has already done—the Army learning account, the audit by the director of operational capability and, today, the £23 million addition for training. Will the Minister tell us whether that is for the Army specifically or whether it will be used across all three armed services?

I also welcome the adult learning inspectorate report. Again, can the Minister for the armed forces say whether it will carry out a one-off inspection of training bases or is that inspection to be ongoing? If so, for how long? While I accept that that is all very good for the future, the central question as to what happened in the past has not been addressed. I suspect that none of us is any closer to knowing what happened at Deepcut.

I too pay tribute to our armed forces for their professionalism and gallantry, and I accept that their training has to be different from any other, but sadly, I suspect that eventually there will be some form of independent inquiry into what happened at Deepcut, although that will come after more delay, more heartache and more legal wrangling. Does the Minister not believe that it would have been better to have announced such an inquiry today—better for the families, better for the MOD in the long run and, most importantly, better for the members of our armed forces?

Mr. Ingram: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his opening comments. He asks what the £23 million is for. I indicated in the statement broadly where it would go—into the initial training environment. It will go where it is primarily needed in those areas. The balance has to be struck and like all resources, they have to be properly allocated.

The hon. Gentleman also asks about whether the ALI will make one report or whether this will be the first of a series. Again, I made that clear, I hope, in my statement, a copy of which I gave to him. There will be an initial inspection during which the ALI will visit Deepcut. It will make a report by Easter, so there will be a six-month study period after which there will be a rolling programme of inspections. Again as I said in my statement, the ALI will also be entitled to go back and look at what it has already studied, ensuring—if a recommendation has been made and we have said that something will be fixed—that it has the right to reinvestigate.

I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman takes the view that he does not know what happened at Deepcut. I suggest that the Surrey police report tells us a lot. What we cannot do is say with certainty precisely what happened. He is of the view that a public inquiry will be able to achieve something that Surrey police did not—after 900 interviews and taking 1,500 witness statements—and decide that there is new evidence. Well, I have to say that the Surrey police report, after 15 months of investigation, has given us a good overhaul and examination. I recommend that he read it again; it may help him.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley) (Lab): The Minister is aware that I raised a case last week regarding Catterick camp. I understand the idea of an independent review, but it would not make any difference to the recruit whose case I raised. When he went to see his commanding officer—the Tuesday after I raised it on the Monday—he was told that his career was in jeopardy. He was told by the military police, in front of his mother, that his career could be in jeopardy. I can tell the Minister now that he has left the Army. If that is the attitude at that level, how can an independent inquiry, or anything independent, get to the bottom of anything that goes on in the Army?

Mr. Ingram: I am sorry to hear about that series of events. When my hon. Friend raised them with me, we immediately launched an investigation of the circumstances. I have not had a report on that, but his words today will again be subject to examination. It is a matter of regret that the young person has decided to leave the Army.

Mr. Campbell: He was told his career was in jeopardy.

Mr. Ingram: I am not saying that my hon. Friend is not telling me accurately about the matters that have been reported to him, but I have to find out the veracity of this from the other side, as we all have to do: when we are dealing with any constituent, we should try to seek the balance to the argument. It may prove to be the case that what he says is right. If that is the case, it is unacceptable.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): First, may I associate myself with the Minister's words about the tragic deaths in Iraq and, of course, the four deaths at Deepcut in my constituency?

Does the Minister agree that Surrey police have done an excellent job in producing such a thorough report? Will he recognise that in my constituency there is huge support for our local regiment, the Royal Logistic Corps? The senior officers now at Princess Royal barracks, Deepcut, who have been responsible for the co-operation with the Surrey police investigation, but were not, of course, the senior officers in command at the time of any of the deaths, have had an enormously difficult job to do, both in terms of retaining local confidence in the Army and in rebutting a great deal of uninformed, prejudicial and sometimes even hysterical media reporting. Will the Minister recognise that those local people who support the Army want the Royal Logistic Corps to stay in our area, want the Princess Royal barracks, Deepcut to have a good future and are concerned about the risk that, in order to remove an embarrassing name, Deepcut might be disposed of? Is he prepared to examine that and, if necessary, meet me and leading local councillors and council officers, to discuss the long-term future of the Army in my area?

Mr. Ingram: I echo the hon. Gentleman's sentiments about the Surrey police. It was a thorough investigation. They honestly recognised the failings of the civilian police in matters of this nature in the opening section of the report. The civilian police should take immediate primacy in all such investigations and it is a matter for the civil courts to deal with through the coroner's inquest or whatever else may follow. I repeat, however, that the 15-month report, with 900 witnesses and 1,500 witness statements, was, without question, very intensive.

The hon. Gentleman is also right about the officers, non-commissioned officers and instructors of the RLC at Deepcut. I have spoken to many of them and I know how hurt they are by all this. When criticisms are made, we must examine the past and the impact on the present and the possible future. We put thousands of young people through that training system, not just at Deepcut but elsewhere, and those who are recruited into that process, and those who run it, must have certainty about its quality. As has been recognised in statements to the House, there is a high quality that is evidenced by what is produced. As to the future of the barracks, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence has responsibility for training establishments and I am sure that he will be only too happy to meet the hon. Gentleman and whoever else he may want to bring along at the appropriate time.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will know that his decision to deny a public inquiry will distress people such as my constituents, Harry and Linda Benton, who still need to find an answer to what happened to their son, Sean. My right hon. Friend said in his statement that the place for that was within the inquest system. Is he really suggesting that, after eight years, the only answer is to reopen inquests so that they may get to the truth?

Mr. Ingram: Yes, I am. I have faith in the coroners' system. Now, with the European convention on human rights, the Government can take great credit for putting into place that corpus of law, which defined how such bodies should operate in the interests of victims to get at the truth and examine key areas. One of the cases, that of James Collinson, has still to be considered by the coroner and I suggest that we should wait to see what comes out of that. Clearly, if there are criticisms of the MOD or matters that we have to address, we must take them on board. To those who may think that that is already the case, I have to say that that is not a proven case and we must wait for the findings of that inquest. Legal remedies are open to others if they wish to return to the civil courts.

Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): I associate myself with the remarks about the tragic deaths in Iraq made at the outset. Since James Collinson was found dead at Deepcut on 23 March 2002, his mother Yvonne and his father Jim are no nearer to finding out the truth as to how and why their 17-year-old son died. Surrey police have apologised to all four families for not maintaining primacy in the investigation and for delegating that to the Army. The Army concluded that it was suicide after only three days, with no proper forensic evidence gathering having been carried out. Does the Minister therefore accept that, by refusing a public inquiry today, he is prolonging the anguish of the Collinson family and the other families, who will now be forced to go to the courts to seek a ruling on the issue? Surely this is manifestly unjust and fails to restore public confidence in the Army and the MOD.

Mr. Ingram: I do not accept that there is distrust of, or lack of confidence in, the Army. Some feel that they have a particular grievance because of the sad tragedies with which they have had to deal, but that should not be extended across the whole community. To do so would constitute an unfair criticism.

The hon. Lady is right that the Collinson family are no nearer to discovering the truth. The inquest is a mechanism by which that may be achieved, but whatever course is adopted, there is no certainty that the truth will materialise. Perhaps we shall never get to the truth.

The hon. Lady mentioned the investigation into James Collinson's death, which is being conducted by the special investigations branch and the Royal Military Police. Following a meeting only an hour and a half ago I have checked again and found that the Surrey police did have primacy, as they should have had in the other three cases.

The hon. Lady said that the lack of a public inquiry was prolonging the agony. I could have decided—and have been asked—to arrange an inquiry into only one case, into all four, into 50 or into some greater number. An inquiry into that greater number would have been very long-running, while an inquiry focusing on a specific group would no doubt have led to repeated judicial requests to open the lines of inquiry elsewhere.

[Mr. Ingram]

It is important to ensure that we employ the right processes. I would have expected the hon. Lady to acknowledge all we have done through the report—the director of operational capability, the Army learning account and the new adult learning inspectorate. She should at least give us some credit for taking on the issues and trying to make things better.

Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): I pay credit to my right hon. Friend for introducing openness and accountability to the initial training regime, but will he acknowledge that openness and accountability, and indeed the duty of care, should extend beyond that regime and must follow young people when they go into their units and regiments so that their parents can be reassured about the responsibility of the Army? When, tragically, a young person such as my constituent Derek McGregor dies in barracks, his family too should be able to get the answers they so desperately need.

Mr. Ingram: I agree and I think that that applies to any untimely death. We have a responsibility to try to give the best possible information to the families of victims. I approve of my hon. Friend's approach, but there is unquestionably a strong duty of care and responsibility throughout the armed forces, for the simple reason that if there were not, we would have a failed, broken system. Soldiers depend on a command structure that knows what it is doing and can deal authoritatively with difficult situations. Providing proper resources will help to ensure that people work as a cohesive team as far as is possible. The chain of command has that duty of care and I think that it is discharged extremely well. We are not perfect. Mistakes will happen, and when they do we must find out the truth.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): Of course, our hearts go out to those killed in Iraq and especially to the families of the young people who lost their lives at Deepcut. Does the Minister agree that the Adjutant-General and his staff are delivering for this country the best military training available anywhere in the world? If, like me, the Minister has spent time with the Army training regiment in Winchester or at the Army foundation college in Harrogate, he will have been amazed at the commitment of those young people and their families, who have complete confidence in the Army. It would be a travesty if this tragedy led to a lack of confidence among the families of young people who are considering joining the military.

Mr. Ingram: I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman. That is why I wrote to more than 200 Members of this House and the other place to invite them to visit training establishments. To date, only about 12—a handful of Members—have taken up that opportunity, although several proposed visits were cancelled. I wish that everyone would make such a visit. Like the hon. Gentleman and me, they would find at those establishments tremendous commitment right through the command structure—not just among instructors but, importantly, among the young people. I had the privilege of being involved in a passing out parade and talking to the parents. They spoke of how the young ones whom they gave into the care of the Army were turned around into mature, forward-looking, confident and well-trained young adults with a future ahead of them. We could all learn from making such contact.

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk, West) (Lab): I welcome my right hon. Friend's remarks about the potential improvement in systems. Of course, it is true that all systems can be improved, but does he agree that it is vital that we do not forget that the Army Training and Recruiting Agency is an enormously successful training organisation and that its training regime is among the most systematic of any employer, not just in this country but in the world? It is precisely that on which the performance of our troops in the field is built and based.

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend's experience gives him intimate knowledge of this issue. He is right about ATRA, which is not only a high achiever but respected worldwide for what it achieves. That is why we are consistently asked to help other countries to develop training regimes that meet the high standards and quality that we set. There is nothing more that I can add to that eulogy. There is much in ATRA's training regime of which we can be proud.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I am encouraged that all the letters, parliamentary questions, Prime Minister's questions and meetings, along with the Adjournment debate on this issue, have finally caused some movement in the Ministry of Defence. Nevertheless, does the Minister accept that resisting a public inquiry into the four deaths at Deepcut just because of the many other deaths in the Army simply is not acceptable? The Government should be willing to investigate any death in uncertain circumstances. Does he recognise that we are calling for a public inquiry into the four deaths at Deepcut specifically to answer the question of why and how these young people died? Does he accept that if one's child were shot five times in the stomach or twice in the head, one would reasonably expect the Government to leave no stone unturned in answering the question whether the death was the result of murder, manslaughter or suicide and why it happened?

Finally, Bob Quick, author of the fifth report and deputy chief constable of Surrey police, confirmed to me today that, although it may not be appropriate for him to define the type of inquiry, he believes that it must be broad and independent. Does the Minister accept that we need to investigate the past in order to understand the future? Does he further understand that if the Government refuse to provide an inquiry of their own volition, they are likely to be forced to do so by a court?

Mr. Ingram: I appreciate the intensity of interest and effort on the part of the hon. Gentleman, who has been very active on this issue; indeed, he and I have discussed it many times privately, on the Floor of the House and elsewhere. I am intrigued by what he said about the comments of Bob Quick, the senior police officer involved. Mr. Quick is not saying that what we are doing is wrong and I doubt whether the hon. Gentleman asked him that question. Mr. Quick would recognise that we have a well-structured approach to dealing with the current and future situation; indeed, that is what the Surrey police asked of us. They asked for a broad inquiry into the duty of care regime and for oversight, both of which the ALI will provide. I do not wish to get into an unnecessary conflict with those outside this House who are commenting on the matter, but I shall find out just what the view of the Surrey police is.

In trying to find out the facts of the situation and why someone died in a given set of circumstances, the police engaged two independent forensic teams of experts to look at that, so that one could check on the other. They could not come to the firm conclusions that other people may have come to. Some of those people have experience but have not published their findings. Others may just have a view on all this. Through their intensive and comprehensive approach, the police have trawled over all this, both in forensic terms and in speaking to all the people about the day of, or the day prior to, the sad event. Therefore, I recommend that those who have not read the Surrey police report read it and await the inquest into James Collinson's death.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): The reasons for the four deaths at Deepcut remain obscure, which is unsatisfactory, but may I question the Minister on two aspects of his statement? First, I welcome the role that he is giving the adult learning inspectorate. That concerns training, but what about improving counselling for members of the armed forces? Counselling should not be seen as a sign of weakness. For example, people in the upper and middle classes use it regularly. Why cannot we have improved counselling?

Secondly, the Minister acknowledges that the families were treated poorly. Why cannot we have better treatment? Will that be addressed so that families are treated better when there is a bereavement? For example, can we have bereavement counselling, a 24-hour link to a liaison officer for the unit concerned and access to all the information in relation to a death?

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend raises two important issues. He raises first the ALI's role and implies that it will be interested only in the training modules that young people will undertake. That is not the case. It will look at care and welfare aspects, too. It is not for me to direct the ALI on how to do that—my role is only to establish the mechanism by which it can be done—but I am sure that it will approach it on the basis that, for people to be best trained, they need to have a roundness of environment. Again, those in the armed forces are in unique circumstances. That is why they will bring in specialists to assist them in their understanding of all that.

My hon. Friend is right about the better treatment of families. We have recognised that the Deepcut families were not well treated. We cannot rewrite history but it sits heavy on us that those things happened and that certain things were said that should not have been said. What I have tried to do in terms of this is to meet with the families. We have learned in the recent past—this is the approach that we now have—that we need to have a better and quicker system of communicating with families and a more sensitive way of dealing with them and that we need to give them the best support we can. They have given their loved ones into our care and we have a duty of care to them as well.

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): As another supporter of the armed services, may I say that people will be grateful for the Minister's constructive suggestions, but they have not gone any way to answering the questions about the recent past? Two of the three inquests have returned an open verdict. I would be grateful if he considered looking over the history of the Stephen Lawrence case, where the Home Office resisted an inquiry, saying that there was a prosecution option and an inquest option, but eventually gave in and there was great benefit from the public inquiry. In the Marchioness case, the responsible Department resisted an inquiry, saying that there was an inquest option and a prosecution option but gave in, to the great benefit of everyone The case and demand for the inquiry will not go away until the families have their chance in public to put the questions that they want to put and those responsible have the obligation in public to answer those questions.

Mr. Ingram: I recognise that, but we should not take one given set of circumstances and say that, when something goes wrong anywhere within government, we should automatically proceed to a public inquiry. I think that we are moving inexorably towards that—people are arguing for that. It has been reported to me that, in the "Today" programme this morning, there were three items relating to the MOD and what was the request on each of those issues? It was for a public inquiry.

We cannot run the Government on the basis of public inquiries. They may be good for lawyers, but they are not for the good governance of this country.

I remind the hon. Gentleman about the Surrey police report. He will have read it and know how exhaustive it is. He will also know that the evidence gathered is not for Ministers. I have not seen the evidence; it is a matter for due process. If a coroner has decided that one case is still to be determined through an inquest, let us wait and see what comes out of it. The hon. Gentleman's suggestion that it may not go away may be right, but he may be wrong. It may, in that particular case, be resolved.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): The case mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell) raises an important question: how can we enable troops facing abuse from their colleagues or superiors to become whistleblowers to the adult learning inspectorate? Will the process be restricted to training? In the past, I have had to put anonymous complaints to the Minister because my constituents did not want their details revealed. I realise that, when complaints are anonymous, it makes it more difficult to do anything about them. It is easier for my right hon. Friend to deal with cases when he knows what the information is, where it applies and to whom it relates. It is important for complaints to be followed up and for troops to be assured that their complaints will be dealt with independently.

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend misses a fundamental point. The adult learning inspectorate is not the only organisation that will be doing this and it has a much bigger remit in the day-to-day care of individual trainees. In each and every establishment, young people will have access to welfare services—to the chaplaincy and other ports of call—and be able to report any matters that concern them.

I hope that my hon. Friend accepts that we have zero tolerance towards bullying and harassment, but I must make the point that that will not stop bullying. It will not stop it in the Army, any more than it will stop it in the BBC, the health service or other walks of life. Bullying goes on out there; what we must do is put in place mechanisms that encourage people confidently to raise their concerns and take them forward. My hon. Friend mentioned the case referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell), but I have already answered his question. We will find out exactly what happened there. If those events did occur as recounted, they are unacceptable.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): Can the Minister give an assurance that the ALI will be given every support and resource to enable servicemen and women who have left the armed services because of problems that they experienced during their recruitment to provide evidence. It should be done through a confidential phone line or another process whereby they are actively encouraged to present their experience.

I echo the views of many hon. Members in expressing my disappointment about the fact that a public inquiry is not being established. It was apparent throughout the Deepcut activities that a duty of care applied to the armed forces in respect of those young people and their parents—and they failed miserably to exercise that duty. Is the Minister certain that what happened will never occur again—that a 17-year-old who might later be found to have a psychological disorder that made him unsuitable for work in the armed forces will not be given a loaded weapon with live ammunition and sent out on guard duty alone?

Mr. Ingram: The ALI will be given every support and resource. The screening of trainees is one of the issues that are being considered. However, it is not an exact science and that applies to all walks of life—even, I would suggest, in this place. It is not easy to identify people who cannot take stress and who may react in a particular way under pressure or because of other factors. We cannot screen out everyone through those processes. The hon. Gentleman is asking for the impossible.

In terms of singleton guard duty, that will not be the case for young 17-year-olds.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): I associate myself with the remarks made about Iraq and with the Minister's comments—and the dignified response of my hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth)—about the tragic events at Deepcut.

How will the Minister ensure that efforts to improve the care of young men and women at a very vulnerable stage in their career do not impact on the Army's ability to deliver relevant and tough training—precisely the sort of training that attracts thousands of people to the armed forces and, critically, saves lives on operations afterwards?

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman has an intimate knowledge of these matters. He is right that a fine balance must be struck. We cannot run the armed forces in a politically correct way, to use the jargon. The situation is unique, because we put people in harm's way and expect them to kill on our behalf. We have to train them in very particular ways. I am not an expert in that, but I have every confidence in those who perform that role on our behalf. I repeat that many thousands of the young people who go through the training are of the highest quality. Some may not make it in life, but many have been given opportunities that they would never have thought of had they not joined the armed forces. I pay tribute to all that is done within the training regimes, to all the commanding officers, the instructors and everyone involved in the process.

Points of Order

4.25 pm

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I notice that the Daily Mail has a report under the title "Watchdog to combat the Army bullying", which accurately predicted the content of today's statement. One of the good things about the campaign as a whole has been the trust among parents, MPs and the Department in maintaining confidentiality, so that disturbs me. May I ask, through you, that the Minister—I do not believe that he leaked or spoke to the press himself—ensures that there is no prospect of any such leak from those in the know, because wherever we stand on the specifics of the case, such leaks are detrimental to the overall spirit of trust that we have in general enjoyed among all the parties?

Mr. Speaker: I cannot institute an inquiry, but I can say that the Minister came to the House and I appreciate that.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Both the Minister and the Opposition spokesman referred to Iraq during the statement, but I sensed that you would not wish the subject to be pursued in detail on this occasion. Given the seriousness of the situation, may I gently suggest that perhaps the Department for International Development, the Foreign Office or the Ministry of Defence should make a statement to the House tomorrow on events in Iraq?

Mr. Speaker: I have no doubt that the matter will be considered.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is there anything you can do to protect the relevance of the House? You will know from a glance at the business that is about to commence that we face the absurd prospect of debating the 12 groups of new clauses and amendments that you have selected in only four and a half hours. By my calculation, that is something like 25 minutes per group, and at least two of the groups contain 25 amendments and new clauses. This is in danger of bringing of the House into disrepute, and I wonder whether it is not time to look at all this again and find some way of not getting into the position of neglecting our duty properly to examine legislation.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman could not be accused at any time of neglecting his duty, but his point of order is simply taking more time out of the main business, because it is not a matter for me.

Orders of the Day

Civil Contingencies Bill

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

New Clause 11

SCOTLAND: CROSS-BORDER COLLABORATION

'(1) Where a person or body listed in Part 1 of Schedule 1 has a duty under section 2 or 4, the Scottish Ministers may make regulations—

(a) permitting or requiring a person or body listed in Part 2 or 4 of that Schedule to co-operate, to such extent and in such manner as may be specified, with the person or body listed in Part 1 of that Schedule in connection with the performance of the duty;

(b) permitting or requiring a person or body listed in Part 2 or 4 of that Schedule to provide information, either on request or in other specified circumstances, to the person or body listed in Part 1 of that Schedule in connection with the performance of the duty.

(2) The Scottish Ministers may issue guidance about a matter addressed in regulations under subsection (1).

(3) Where a person or body listed in Part 2 of Schedule 1 has a duty under section 2 or 4, a Minister of the Crown may make regulations—

(a) permitting or requiring a person or body listed in Part 1 or 3 of that Schedule to co-operate, to such extent and in such manner as may be specified, with the person or body listed in Part 2 of that Schedule in connection with the performance of the duty;

(b) permitting or requiring a person or body listed in Part 1 or 3 of that Schedule to provide information, either on request or in other specified circumstances, to the person or body listed in Part 2 of that Schedule in connection with the performance of the duty.

(4) A Minister of the Crown may issue guidance about a matter addressed in regulations under subsection (3).

(5) If a Minister of the Crown makes an order under section 5(1) imposing a duty on a person or body listed in Part 1 of Schedule 1, the Scottish Ministers may make an order—

(a) permitting or requiring a person or body listed in Part 2 or 4 of that Schedule to co-operate, to such extent and in such manner as may be specified, with the person or body listed in Part 1 of that Schedule in connection with the duty;

(b) permitting or requiring a person or body listed in Part 2 or 4 of that Schedule to provide information, either on request or in other specified circumstances, to the person or body listed in Part 1 of that Schedule in connection with the duty.

(6) If the Scottish Ministers make an order under section 5(2) imposing a duty on a person or body listed in Part 2 of Schedule 1, a Minister of the Crown may make an order—

(a) permitting or requiring a person or body listed in Part 1 or 3 of that Schedule to co-operate, to such extent and in such manner as may be specified, with the person or body listed in Part 2 of that Schedule in connection with the duty;

(b) permitting or requiring a person or body listed in Part 1 or 3 of that Schedule to provide information, either on request or in other specified circumstances, to the person or body listed in Part 2 of that Schedule in connection with the duty.

(7) A person or body shall—

(a) comply with regulations or an order under this section, and

(b) have regard to guidance under this section.

(8) In this Act, except where the contrary intention appears—

(a) a reference to regulations under section 2(3) includes a reference to regulations under subsection (3) above,

(b) a reference to regulations under section 2(4) includes a reference to regulations under subsection (1) above,

(c) a reference to regulations under section 4(2) includes a reference to regulations under subsection (3) above,

(d) a reference to regulations under section 4(3) includes a reference to regulations under subsection (1) above,

(e) a reference to an order under section 5(1) includes a reference to an order under subsection (6) above, and

(f) a reference to an order under section 5(2) includes a reference to an order under subsection (5) above.'.—[Ms Blears.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.28 pm

The Minister for Crime Reduction, Policing and Community Safety (Ms Hazel Blears): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 82 to 89.

Ms Blears: I am delighted to have the opportunity to participate in this debate. I want first to put on the record my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office, who cannot be with us this afternoon because he is on paternity leave as the proud father of a daughter, Eve, I think, born about 10 days ago. I am sure the House would wish to join me in that.

I am very much looking forward to the debate this afternoon. Having briefed myself fairly rapidly over the weekend, I know that the Bill has already undergone a huge amount of scrutiny, including pre-legislative scrutiny and two forms of public consultation. There is a plethora of information before us, but I am sure that we will have more extremely good scrutiny this afternoon.

As the House will be aware, the Government, working closely with the devolved Administrations, seek to ensure that civil protection is delivered in a coherent fashion throughout the United Kingdom. New clause 11 and Government amendments Nos. 82 to 89 seek to address the issue of cross-border co-operation and information sharing.

Co-operation and information sharing are absolutely fundamental to effective civil protection arrangements. Emergencies are no respecters of boundaries, and it is important that collaboration take place across borders as well as within them. The amendments that I now propose follow from further discussions that the Government have had with the Scottish Executive. We have looked again at the circumstances in which co-operation and exchange of information should take place, and have concluded that a number of changes to the Bill are required.

As a product of the devolution settlement, in this Bill, Scottish responders not exercising reserved functions come under the jurisdiction of Scottish Ministers. Local responders in England and Wales—and responders performing reserved functions in Scotland—come under the jurisdiction of UK Ministers. At present, Scottish Ministers can require Scottish responders to co-operate with other Scottish responders, and UK Ministers can require English, Welsh or UK-wide responders to cooperate with each other, but there is no power to require cross-border co-operation and information sharing.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) is not in his place today, as he highlighted the lacuna in the legislation in Committee. It would appear to be an important gap in our legislative armoury.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): I am grateful to the Minister for crediting my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) with having picked that point up in Committee on 29 January, with his typically detailed eye. Unfortunately, he had a constituency engagement today that he could not cancel, but he is devastated not to be here. I hope that the Minister will understand.

Ms Blears: I am sorry to hear that he is devastated, but we are grateful to him for his sharp and keen eye. I understand that proceedings on the Bill have been non-partisan, and I am happy to continue in that vein and give credit where it is due.

An example of the problem is that if the Maritime and Coastguard Agency required information held by a chief constable or a local authority in Scotland, there is currently no power for Ministers to require such disclosure. I understand that two other organisations that exercise reserved powers in Scotland—the Health and Safety Executive and the British Transport Police—could have similar problems. There is also currently no means of imposing an obligation on responders to collaborate across borders. When planning for any incident—not just a terrorist incident, but perhaps a plane crash or spread of an infectious disease—it is important that all relevant authorities be familiar with each other's plans, whether or not there is a national boundary separating them. There need to be clear powers to ensure that that happens.

New clause 11 and amendments Nos. 82 and 83 will allow Ministers to ensure that such collaboration takes place, thereby ensuring the coherence of the UK civil protection framework. Amendments Nos. 84 to 86 supplement these provisions by ensuring that the general provisions in the Bill relating to enforcement and information sharing apply to cross border situations.

Given their respective roles in managing the civil protection framework across the UK, it is also important to ensure that communication between the UK Government and the Scottish Executive works well.Amendments Nos. 87 to 89 are technical amendments intended to clarify the requirement to consult each other where that is appropriate. The effect of those amendments is to establish a clear requirement on UK Ministers to consult Scottish Ministers when making provisions affecting responders exercising functions in Scotland. There is also a clear requirement on Scottish Ministers to consult UK Ministers when making any order under part 1 of the Bill. That will ensure that, while the UK Government and the Scottish Executive have responsibilities in the Bill that rightly reflect the devolution settlement, they will exercise those responsibilities in a coherent and consistent fashion.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): I associate the official Opposition with the good wishes to the Minister for the Cabinet Office and his wife and baby girl. I am sure that he will find this a busy time, although not, I hope, as noisy as it is in Parliament—although you never can tell with babies.

In Committee we had a detailed discussion of the relationships between the parts of the United Kingdom in connection with emergencies and the way in which they should be tackled under parts 1 and 2 of the Bill. The principle of reciprocity, and of ensuring that each part of the United Kingdom was capable of responding effectively, was discussed at considerable length by all members of the Committee, including my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), who made a great deal of it, and the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael), who has already been mentioned.

Our particular concern was that in border areas there are, for example, hospitals, strategic health authorities and other authorities that provide services on both sides of the border. The Minister has mentioned one or two of the other authorities, such as maritime authorities and the Health and Safety Executive. We were keen that the Bill should make such arrangements more transparent than they originally were, and I am pleased that it has been possible, in consultation with the Scottish Parliament, to agree on more effective and better defined wording. I welcome the new clause and the amendments, but I hope that the Minister will be able to give a bit more detail about how the arrangements would work—with a hospital authority, for example.

Mr. Allan: I, too, associate myself with the good wishes that have been offered to the Minister for the Cabinet Office. We shall miss him today, and also my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael), because in the good-humoured proceedings in Committee they traded lawyerly tales about places in Scotland of which I know nothing. It is a pleasure to be able to speak about the first group of amendments on a note of concord, rather than the discord that we often experience in the House.

The amendments are indeed welcome. My hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland had asked me to draft some amendments to pick up the issues that he raised in Committee; I am relieved that the Government have been able to do that, so that I did not have to tackle the job myself. We identified the problem, but the solution was clearly going to be complex in drafting terms, and the amendments before us deal adequately with that complexity.

I am pleased that the Minister cited word for word the example offered by my hon. Friend in Committee. There is a true spirit of cross-party co-operation when the Minister's speech quotes elements of Opposition Members' concerns when she responds to them. That reflects the fact that my hon. Friend precisely identified a difficulty with the original wording, and I am comforted by the Minister's assurance that her amendments seek to address that precise difficulty. There is no more to be said about this group of amendments. I welcome them.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): The Minister said that there had been consultations with the Scottish Parliament. Were there similar consultations with the National Assembly for Wales? The Assembly says that the problem is that > "the Bill does not take into account the constitutional and practical implications of devolution in Wales and does not provide the National Assembly with adequate powers to ensure the proper preparation and implementation of emergency plans in Wales."

That is not a party view; it comes to the House from the appropriate Committee—the Local Government and Public Services Committee, chaired by the appropriate Minister. The Committee continues:

> "The contradiction implicit in having political accountability for matters for which legal responsibility has not been devolved has since been recognised, with the Welsh Assembly Government requesting the transfer of animal health and welfare powers to the Assembly. The Secretary of State for the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs has confirmed that the UK Government does not expect to have difficulty with this proposal and the transfer of powers is now scheduled for autumn 2004."

A specific example of the constitutional contradiction that is written into the Bill appears in clause 9, which allows Ministers of the Crown to require category 1 and 2 responders to provide information on compliance with part 1 of the Bill and to specify how and when such information should be provided.

At present, however, the Bill does not require the UK Government even to notify the National Assembly that they are obtaining such information from agencies in Wales. Many such bodies obtain funding from the National Assembly, and work in partnership with it to deliver services in devolved areas. As a result, their performance in those areas is already monitored by the National Assembly.

The Local Government and Public Services Committee believes that the Bill should be amended to confirm that monitoring powers under clause 9 will be given to the National Assembly for Wales or at the very least to require the UK Government to consult the National Assembly before exercising those powers. The Committee recommends that part 1 should be amended to confirm that the powers of the National Assembly regarding Wales are roughly equivalent to those given to Scottish Ministers regarding Scotland. In turn, that would remove the need for clause 15, which requires the National Assembly to be consulted or give its consent before Ministers or the Crown act under certain provisions in part 1 relating to Wales.

Similarly, to ensure that practical issues arising from an emergency in Wales can be dealt with swiftly and efficiently, the Committee recommends that clause 19 be amended to allow the National Assembly to make emergency regulations concerning events or situations. I shall not deal with the matter at further length, because time is short, as the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) has pointed out. However, I wanted to put the issue on the record, as Ministers in Cardiff and the Committee have been asking for the change. If the Minister cannot give me a reply today, I should be grateful if she could write telling me what consideration and what meetings, if any, have taken place on those important issues.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): I am glad that the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) has disrupted what was becoming a cosy, consensual, self-congratulatory session all-round. I always become suspicious when Front Bench spokesmen congratulate one another on how marvellous everything has been, how productive their discussions have been, how wonderful the Committee debates were, and generally what a jolly good job they have all done. The hon. Gentleman has, in his inimitable way, put his finger on the downside of devolution. That is not what he meant to do, but he has done so none the less.

We have been told all too often about the wonders of devolution and how our relatively small country will do so much better if it is broken up into its constituent parts. We have extra bureaucracies, additional Governments and Assemblies and so on, and for the first time, a statute has set out how difficult such an arrangement can be.

It is a great challenge in a genuinely integrated state to respond to the horrors of terrorism, but it is much more difficult to do so when we must deal with the multifarious bureaucracies that we have been crazy enough to set up in the United Kingdom. Proposed subsection (1)(a), for example, says that regulations may be made

"permitting or requiring a person or body listed in Part 2 or 4 of that Schedule to co-operate, to such extent and in such manner as may be specified, with the person or body listed in Part 1 of that Schedule in connection with the performance of the duty".

That is just for starters, and sets the tone for pages of jargon that attempt to identify the ways in which we will achieve the laudable aims that the Minister set out at the beginning of our debate—collaboration, familiarity with each other's plans and so on. However, we must remember that we are discussing a complex set of organisations that, in normal circumstances, it would be difficult to encourage to co-operate with one another, including category 1 responders—local authorities, emergency services, health services and so on—and category 2 responders, including electricity, gas, and water and communications suppliers, railway and underground companies, airports, harbours and highways.
